The following passages in Narcissus Luttrell's MS. "Brief Historical Relation," &c. relate to these proceedings:

"June 15, 1687. Magdalen College, in Oxford, appeared before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and gave in an answer why they had not elected Mr. Farmer: and one Dr. Fairfax was very bold there, for which he was severely reprimanded, and told he was fitter for a mad house.

"November. The Commissioners at their late being at Oxford, did upon the refusal of the fellows of Magdalen college to own their power, or the bishop of Oxford to be their President, or subscribe the Paper acknowledging their crime, they did actually expel about 25 fellows, and ordered their names to be struck out of their books; and it is said the under graduates treat the President and the new Mandamus Fellows with all imaginable scorn.

"December 9. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners met the 10th at Whitehall, and taking the affair of Magdalen college into consideration again, they declared and announced Dr.
Hough and the 26 Fellows of that college worth, gave notice to all the fellows present in the chapel, on Thursday, the 31st of March, proceed to the election of a President on Wednesday the 13th of April following, at nine o'clock in the morning, in the chapel: and in all archbishops and other ecclesiastical officers to take notice of the sentence, and yield obedience thereto. This severe and unheard of sentence was opposed by some of the Commissioners.

"It is said as if baron Jenner would have his quietus; some say he boggled at the late sentence against the Magdalen fellows.

and induction, and it is thought he will have it.

lows of Magdalen college, in Oxford, and given the bishop of Winchester, their visitor, order in many gracious acts in restoring things to their old legal foundation, which hath been the work of some years past to unhinge.

order thereto, the Vice-President caused a Citation to be fixed on the chapel-door of the said college, signifying the vacancy, time and place of the election, according to the direction of the statutes. But before the day of election, being credibly informed that his majesty had been pleased to grant his Letters Mandatory in behalf of Mr. Anthony Farmer, they most humbly represented to his sacred majesty, in their petition bearing date April the 9th, That the said Mr. Farmer was incapable, by their statutes, of being president; and therefore did most humbly pray his majesty to leave them to a free election, or recommend such a person to them as was capable by their statutes.

Monday, April 11, his majesty's Letters Mandatory were delivered by the hands of Mr. Robert Charnock,* master of arts, and fellow of the said college, directed to the Vice-President and fellows of Magdalen-College in Oxon, requiring them forthwith to elect the said Mr. Farmer, and admit him president: which letter the Vice-President read in the chapel of the said college, between the hours of four and five o'clock in the same day, after evening service, before the fellows of the college, there present, and asked them, Whether they, in obedience to his majesty's letters, would forthwith elect and admit Mr. Farmer president? Who all agreed, in consideration to Mr. Farmer's not being qualified, and the danger of expulsion to any of the fellows that should be absent from the election, and that the time of election, according to the Citation, was so near, to defer their Answer till Wednesday following: Whereupon the Vice-President required all the fellows to be present in the chapel the said Wednesday morning at nine o'clock.

All the fellows being then met, the Vice-President read the statute 'De Electione Presidentis;' and the statute 5 Eliz. against corrupt elections was read also: after which the Vice-president read the king's Letter, in behalf of Mr. Farmer, and the second time demanded an Answer of the fellows thereto. Their Answer was to this effect: That having a Petition now lying before his majesty, they ought not to proceed to election, till they had received his majesty's answer to the same: and thereupon they all agreed (except Mr. Charnock) that the election should be deferred; which was accordingly done, until the next morning nine o'clock.

Thursday April the 14th, at nine o'clock in the morning, all the fellows being met, the Vice-President told them, That the election of a President had been deferred upon account of their Petition to his majesty; in answer to which, they had not then received his majesty's pleasure; that the next day was the utmost time they could defer the election by the statutes, and therefore it was necessary they should come to some resolution. He told them farther, That the king had commanded them to elect Mr. Farmer, and asked their sense therein: which was unanimous (except Mr. Charnock) that the election should be deferred till the next morning eight o'clock; and in order thereunto, the sacrament was to be administered first; and accordingly it was adjourned.

Friday, April 15, at nine o'clock in the morning, the Vice-president and fellows being met, Dr. Thomas Smith and captain Bagshaw, two of the Fellows, acquainted the rest, from my lord-president of the council, That in answer to their Petition, his majesty had sent his letter to the college, 'that he expected to be obeyed.' After which, the Vice-President read again the king's letter to them, and asked, whether, in obedience thereunto, they would elect and admit Mr. Farmer president? They answered, That they desired they might proceed to an election. Then the Vice-President having proposed whether having received his majesty's pleasure in answer to their petition, they would make any further address? the Vice-President, Dr. Fairfax,* Dr. Pudsay, and Dr. Thomas Smith, were for a second address: but all the rest declared immediately for proceeding to the election.

Then the Vice-President proposed, whether they would go to an election viva voce, or by scrutiny? The Vice-President, Mr. Thompson, and Mr. Charnock, were for proceeding to an election viva voce; all the rest were for going to an election by scrutiny except Dr. Thomas Smith, who was not for going to election, until the king should again be petitioned.

This, therefore, being the sense of the majority, That they ought to proceed to the election of a president, according to the statutes, and this the last day limited for election; in order thereunto, the holy sacrament was solemnly taken by all except Mr. Charnock. Then the statute 'De Electione Præsidentis,' and 5 Eliz. against corrupt elections, was read by the Vice-President. Every one took the oath prescribed in the statutes to be taken, in order to the nomination of a president (except Mr. Thompson and Mr. Charnock, who refused it:) and the two senior fellows were sworn scrutators in the scrutiny of the whole society. For the nomination of a president, Mr. Hough†, and Mr. Maynard had each of them the major part of all the voices; and were accordingly pronounced by the senior scrutator, 'Nominati in Ordine ad Electionem Præsidentis.' Then the thirteen senior fellows being met to elect one of these two President; and every one of them sworn according to the statute; eleven of them elected Mr. Hough, who was accordingly pronounced President of St. Mary Magdalen College in Oxon, by the senior scrutator, in the presence of all the fellows: And Mr. Maynard was appointed by the thirteen senior fellows to present the said President elect to the visitor, in order to his admission. After this, Mr. Thompson and Mr. Charnock declared viva voce for Mr. Farmer according to his majesty's letter.

Saturday, April 16th, Mr. Hough, president elect, was presented to the visitor [the Bishop of Winchester, Dr. Peter Mews], by Mr. Maynard, who at the same time delivered to his Lordship an instrument under the College-seal, containing the proceedings of the election: after a sight whereof, Mr. Hough was sworn and admitted President by his lordship, according to the statutes.

Sunday, April 17, Mr. Hough, at his return to the College, took the same oath again before the Society, and afterwards as President took his seat in the chapel, at four o'clock prayers in the afternoon.

A Copy of the King's Mandate to the Fellows of Magdalen-College.

'JAMES R. Trusty and well-beloved, We greet you well. Whereas we are well satisfied of the piety, loyalty, and learning, of our trusty and well-beloved Anthony Farmer, Master of Arts, of that your College of St. Mary-Magdalen, We have thought fit hereby effectually to recommend him to you for the place of President of our said College, now void by the death of Dr. Clark, late President thereof; willing and requiring you forthwith, upon receipt hereof, to elect and admit him, the said Anthony Farmer, into the said place of President, with all and singular the rights and privileges, emoluments and advantages thereunto belonging, any statute, custom, or constitution, to the contrary notwithstanding, wherewith we are graciously pleased to dispense with in this behalf. And so, not doubting of your compliance herein, we bid you farewell.

'Given at our Court at Whitehall, the fifth day of April, 1687, in the third year of our reign.'

A Copy of Magdalen-College's Petition.

To the King's most excellent Majesty;

The Humble PETITION of the Vice-President and Fellows of St. Mary-Magdalen-College in Oxon.

'Most humbly sheweth,
'We have been credibly informed, That Mr. Anthony Farmer, who was not of our foun'dation, has obtained your most excellent Majesty's recommendation to be President of your majesty's college, in the room of Dr. Henry Clark, deceased.

'We, therefore, with all submission, as becomes your most dutiful and loyal subjects, most humbly represent to your sacred majesty, That the said Mr. Farmer is a person in several respects incapable of that character, according to our founder's statutes: and do most earnestly beseech your majesty, as your majesty shall judge fittest in your most princely wisdom, either to leave us to the discharge of our duty and consciences, according to your majesty's late most gracious toleration, and our founder's statutes, or to recommend such a person who may be more serviceable to your majesty, and to this your majesty's college.'

A Copy of the Lord Sunderland's Letter to the Fellows.

'Gentlemen; The king being given to understand, That notwithstanding his late mandate sent to you, for electing Mr. Farmer to be President of your college, you have made choice of another person; his majesty commands me to tell you, He is much surprized at these proceedings, and expects you should send me an Account of what passed on that occasion, and whether you did receive his majesty's said Letters Mandate, before you chose Dr. Hough. I am, Gentlemen, Your affectionate and humble servant,

SUNDERLAND.'

The CASE of the Vice-President and Fellows of St. Mary-Magdalen-College in Oxon, in their late Election of a President.

Upon notice of the death of Dr. Henry Clark, late President of St. Mary-Magdalen-College in Oxon, the vice-president called a meeting of the fellows in order to appoint a day for the election of a new President. The 13th of April was the day prefixed, with power to prorogue the election to the 15th, as they should see cause, beyond which time it was not in their power to defer the same. This being agreed, a citation or premonition was fixed upon the chapel-door of the College, signifying the same; and summoning all the absent Fellows to repair home to the ensuing election, as the statute in that case directs. After this, upon the 11th of April, they received his majesty's letter in behalf of Mr. Farmer, requiring them to elect and admit him President: but he having never been Fellow of that College, nor New-College, in which are the only persons capable of being chosen by the statutes; and wanting likewise such personal qualifications as are required in the character of a President, they did not imagine it was, or could be his majesty's pleasure, that they should act so directly contrary to the express words of their statutes, to which they are strictly and positively sworn: but did humbly conceive they were bound in duty to believe, that his majesty had been misinformed in the character and capacity of Mr. Farmer. And therefore on the 15th of April, the last of those days within which they were confined to finish the election, they proceeded to a choice; and having first received the blessed eucharist, and taken an oath, as the founder enjoins, to choose a person so qualified, as is there specified, they did elect the reverend Mr. John Hough, batchelor in divinity, who is a person every way qualified by the statutes of the said college: and if it shall be objected that his majesty did in his letter for Mr. Farmer graciously dispense with all the statutes that rendered him incapable of being elected; and that therefore they might have obeyed without breach of their oaths: they humbly beg leave to represent, that there is an express clause in that oath, which every man takes when he is admitted Fellow of the College, wherein he swears, not to procure, accept, or make use of, any dispensation from his oath, or any part thereof, by whomsoever procured, or by what authority soever granted. As to their former practice, when they have elected in obedience to the king's letter heretofore, it has been always in such cases where the persons recommended have been every way qualified for the office by their statutes: in which cases they always have been, and ever will be, ready to comply with his majesty's pleasure; it not being without unspeakable regret, that they disobey the least of his commands. They know how entirely their welfare depends upon the countenance of their prince; nor doth any thing more deeply affect and grieve their souls, than when they find themselves reduced to this unfortunate necessity, of either disobeying his will, or violating their consciences by notorious perjuries.

April the 18th, 1687.*

May it please your Grace;

We the president, and fellows of Magdalen-College in Oxon, sensible of the benefits and honour we enjoy under your grace's patronage, and how much it imports us to have your advice in all the difficulties wherewith we are pressed; having, as we fear, displeased his majesty in our election of a president; do humbly beg leave to represent to your grace, a true state of our case, and hope you will please, to inform the king how incapable we were to perform his commands.

His majesty was pleased, on the death of Dr. Henry Clark, president of St. Mary Magdalen College, to command us, by his letter, to elect and admit Mr. Anthony Farmer in that office, a person utterly incapable of it by our statutes, as we are ready to make appear in many particulars; and since we have taken a positive oath of obedience to them, and that exclusive to all dispensations whatsoever; we humbly conceive we could not obey that command in favour of Mr. Farmer, unless he had brought those qualifications with him, which our founder requires in the person of the president; and being confined as to the time of election, we have been forced to proceed to the choice of one, who has approved his loyalty in the whole course of his life, and whom we think suitably qualified for the place.

May it therefore please your grace to interpose with his most sacred majesty for us, that we may not lie under the weight of his displeasure, for not being in a capacity for obeying his commands. We know him to be a prince of eminent justice and integrity, and cannot think he will value any instance of duty to himself, which manifestly breaks in upon the obligation of our consciences. And your grace's extraordinary unblemished loyalty to the crown; and that regard which, we assure ourselves, our most honoured lord and chancellor has to the peace and welfare of this place, induceth us to presume your grace will omit no endeavours to set before his majesty the true reason and necessity of our proceedings. That God Almighty protect your grace, shall be the daily prayers of,

May it please your Grace, &c.

*The Bishop of Winton's Letter to the Lord
President of the Council.*

My honoured Lord;

The obligation I have upon me as visitor of St. Mary Magdalen College in Oxon, occasions this address: for I am informed that great endeavours are used with his majesty to recommend one Mr. Farmer, who is not at present, nor ever was fellow of the College, to be president of it; which is directly contrary to the statutes of the founder (as I am confident some, who promote Mr. Farmer's interest, cannot be ignorant of.) And were there not many persons now actually fellows, and several who have been (in particular the bishop of Man,* and Dr. Jessop) very eminent for learning and loyalty, and every way qualified according to the statutes, I should not press your lordship to lay the concern of the College (which hath upon all occasions expressed its zeal and forwardness in defence of the crown, and, as I particularly know, in the great affairs of the succession) before his majesty; who, I hope, will leave them to their rules, as the statutes, which have hitherto (excepting in the times of rebellion) been conscientiously observed, and which will be the highest satisfaction to the truly loyal university, and promote his majesty's service; which has always been the endeavour of Your Lordship's most humble servant.

* Dr. Baptist Living. He appears to have been an intimate associate of Henry Earl of Clarendon, in whose Diary he is often mentioned.

A Copy of the Citation to the Vice President and Fellows, for to appear at Whitehall, June the 6th, 1687.

By his Majesty's Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Causes, and for the Visitation of the Universities, and of all and every Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, Colleges, &c.

Complaint having been made unto us, that the Vice President and Fellows of St. Mary Magdalen College in Oxon, have refused to comply with his majesty's letters mandatory, for electing and admitting Mr. Anthony Farmer president of the same College, in the room of Dr. Clark deceased, and that, notwithstanding his majesty's letters, they have elected Mr. John Hough president of the said College: you and either of you, are hereby required to cite and summon the said Vice President and fellows, requiring them, or such of the said fellows as they shall depute in their behalf, to appear before us in the council chamber at White Hall, upon Monday the 6th of the next month of June, at four in the afternoon, to answer to such matters as shall be objected against them, concerning the premises; and of the due execution thereof, you are to certify us then and there.

Given under our Seal, May 28th, 1687.

To Thomas Atterbury, and Robert Eldows; or to either of them.

The ANSWER of the Vice President, and other Fellows, of Magdalen College in Oxon, who were deputed by the said College, to the Question propounded by the Right Honourable and Right Reverend the Lords Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Affairs, viz.

Why they did not obey his majesty's Letter, requiring them to elect and admit Mr. Anthony Farmer president of the said College?

The said Vice President, and other deputed fellows, answered and said, That the said college of St. Mary Magdalen in Oxon, is a body corporate, governed by local statutes, granted and confirmed to them by his majesty's royal predecessor, king Henry 6, for him and his heirs and successors, under the Great Seal of England; which are also since confirmed by several other patents of others of his majesty's royal predecessors, under the Great Seal of England. That by the said statutes of the college (to the observation of which each fellow is sworn) it is ordered, that the person elected president thereof, shall be a man of good life and reputation, of approved understanding and good temper, discreet, provident, and circumspect, both in spiritual and temporal affairs. And at the time of election of a president, the said fellows are bound by the said statutes to take an oath, that they shall nominate none to that office, but such as are, or have been fellows of the said college, or of New College in Oxon, or if they are not actually fellows at that time of election, that they be such as have left their fellowships in their respective colleges upon credible [qu. creditable] accounts. And when two qualified persons shall be nominated at the time of election, by the greater number of all the fellows, to the said office of president, the thirteen seniors also swear that they will elect one of them, whom in their consciences they think most proper and sufficient, most discreet, most useful, and best qualified for the place; without any regard to love, hatred, favour, or fear. And every fellow, when he is first admitted into his fellowship in the said college, swears that he will inviolably keep and observe all the statutes and ordinances of the college, and every thing therein contained, so far as does or may concern him, according to the plain, literal, and grammatical sense and meaning thereof, and, as much as in him lies, will cause the same to be kept and observed by others; and that he will not procure any dispensation contrary to his aforesaid oath, or any part thereof, nor contrary to the statutes and ordinances to which it relates, or any of them; nor will he endeavour that such dispensation shall be procured by any other, or others, publicly or privately, directly or indirectly. And if it shall happen that any dispensation of this sort, of whatsoever authority it shall be, whether in general or particular, or under what form of words soever it be granted, that he will neither make use of it, nor in any sort consent thereunto. That upon notice of the death of Dr. Clark, late president of the said college, the vice president called a meeting of the said fellows, in order to the appointing a day for the election of a new president, and the 13th of April was the time prefixed, with power to prorogue the same, as they should see cause, till the 15th, beyond which time they could not statutorily defer their election; and in pursuance thereof a citation or premonition was fixed upon the chapel door of the said college, signifying the same; and by which the absent fellows were summoned to repair home, as the statute in the case requires. And the said vice president and other deputed fellows farther say, that on the 11th of April aforesaid, they received his majesty's Letters mandatory, to elect and admit the said Mr. Anthony Farmer president of the said college: But forasmuch as the said vice president and fellows apprehended the right of election to be in them, and believed his majesty never intended to dispossess them of their rights: and forasmuch as the said Mr. Farmer had never been fellow either of Magdalen or New college in Oxon, and had not those qualifications, which in and by the said statutes of the college are required in the character of a president, as they in their consciences did, or do verily believe; and in regard that they could not comply with his majesty's letter, without the violation of their oaths, and hazard of their legal interest and property, wherewith they are by their statutes possessed, and which by their oaths they are bound to maintain, they represented the same by their humble petition to his majesty. And having deferred their election of a president to the last day limited by their statutes, then they proceeded to election, and having first received the eucharist, and taken the said oaths, as the statutes enjoin, to choose a person so qualified as before expressed, they did elect the reverend Mr. John Hough, B. D. and one of the fellows of their college, a person every way qualified to be president, who has been since confirmed by the bishop of Winton, their visitor, as the statutes of the said college direct.

And that they might not lie under his majesty's displeasure by their proceedings, they did on the 18th of April, make an humble representation thereof to his Majesty, by his grace the duke of Ormond, Chancellor of the university of Oxon, setting forth their indispensable obligations to observe their founder's statutes.

All which matters the vice-president, and other deputed fellows, do humbly offer to your lordships, and pray to be dismissed with your lordship's favour.

This Answer was signed but by five of the deputed fellows, Dr. Fairfax not consenting to it, who desired their lordships to hear him apart, and take his Reasons why he could not subscribe. After the reading the answer, the lord-chancellor Jeffries being in hopes he would submit, gave him leave to speak, saying, 'Ay, 'this looks like a man of sense, and a good 'subject; let's hear what he will say.' But finding his mistake, and that Dr. Fairfax chiefly insisted, 'That in Ecclesiastical courts 'there should be a libel given to the party 'appealed, that he might know what he is accused of; that he desired that libel, and did 'not know what he was called there for; and 'that the matter did not lie in that court, but 'in Westminster-hall;' the Chancellor endeavoured to baffle his plea, by telling him, 'He 'was doctor of divinity, but not of law.' To this the Doctor replied, 'That he desired to 'know by what commission and authority 'they sat?' Which put Jeffries into such an excessive passion, as made him cry out, 'Pray 'what commission have you to be so impudent 'in court? This man ought to be kept in a 'dark room. Why do you suffer him without 'a guardian? Why did not you bring him to 'me to beg* him? Pray let the officers seize 'him †.'

† "This University will be always very careful of any neglect to your lordship, of whose good will and favour to us we have had so much experience.

"My lord, his majesty expressed a fatherly care to us in recommending your lordship to be our chancellor; and your lordship were the most desirable person in the world. But, as we had no notice of your lordship's inclinations that way, or that you would accept of that office; so" &c. Letter, July 1683, from Dr.

Then the Fellows were ordered to withdraw, and after an whole hour's debate, the Vice President was called in alone, and ordered to attend the Court, with the rest of the deputed Fellows, on Wednesday the 23rd of the same month. On the appointed day, the Fellows attended, and gave in the following REASONS against Mr. Farmer.

Whereas the Vice President, and other deputed Fellows of St. Mary Magdalen college in Oxon, have, in their Answer to your lordships, set forth, that by the statutes of the said college it is ordered, That the person to be elected president thereof should be a man of good life and reputation, and of good manners and temper; and likewise, that Mr. Anthony Farmer hath not those qualifications, which in and by the said statutes are required in the character of a president, as they in their consciences did and do verily before believe: they humbly crave leave to represent to your lordships some of those Reasons which induced them to such belief, viz.

That Mr. Farmer did misbehave himself in Trinity college in Cambridge; that he received admonition from the master of the college, in order to his expulsion; which remains in the register of the said college, under his own hand.

That having left Cambridge, he taught school at Chippenham in Wiltshire, under a nonconformist minister, without licence.

That in September, 1683, the said Mr. Farmer was entered into St. Mary Magdalen hall in Oxon, where such frequent complaints were brought against him to the principal, for his troublesome humour and unquiet temper, that, to preserve the peace of the society, he was desired to leave the said hall.

That after his leaving Magdalen hall, he was admitted into Magdalen college; where discoursing about religion, he declared, That there was no Protestant but would cut the king's throat. Notwithstanding which, at other times, he declared to some of the fellows of the said college, That whatsoever he pretended, he was really a member of the church of England; and that he made an interest with some Roman Catholics, only to get preferment by their means, and for that reason was willing to be thought of their religion.

That at the very time when his majesty's Letter came to the college in his behalf, the said Mr. Farmer was at Abingdon in very ill company, where he continued drinking to excess two or three days and nights together; and amongst other disorders, was one of those that then in the night-time threw the town-stocks into the river: and that in general, the said Mr. Farmer hath had the unhappiness to lie under an ill fame, as to his life and conversation, as by several Letters and Certificates, ready to be produced, will more largely appear.

"1. I Anthony Farmer, bachelor of arts, and scholar of this college, do confess, That I have behaved myself very unlike a member of this college, and even a Christian, at the dancing school: for which I humbly ask pardon, and do acknowledge before the seniority, that I have deservedly received of the master my first admonition in order to expulsion.

These are to certify, that Mr. Anthony Farmer was usher to Mr. Benjamin Flower, a nonconformist preacher in the town of Chippenham in the county of Wilts, for the space of half a year or upwards, the said Mr. Flower keeping school without licence from the bishop, and the said Mr. Farmer continuing his usher for the time mentioned, without any licence also. "3. Mr. Anthony Farmer was entered of St. Mary Magdalen hall in Oxford, September, 1683. Where, after he had been some time, frequent complaints were brought to me by some of the masters that he raised quarrels and differences among them; that he often occasioned disturbances, and was of a troublesome and unpeaceable humour. Whereupon, that love and friendship might be preserved and continued in the society, as it used to be, I advised the said Mr. Farmer to make trial if he could live more easily and quietly in some other house. Accordingly he did voluntarily leave the hall, July 13th, 1685, and got himself admitted into Magdalen college.

"4. I do certify, That Mr. William Bambrigg, gentleman commoner of Magdalen hall, Oxon, did say, that Mr. Anthony Farmer, master of arts, did entice him from his studies in the university to go to London, where he the said Mr. Farmer did attempt to draw the said Mr. Bambrigg into several debaucheries, both at taverns and bawdy-houses. "6. I am very willing to justify any thing I have formerly said, relating to so serious a matter as this you enquire after. Mr. Farmer, one night in the cloister, asked me why I did not get a commission? I told him truly, I had not friends to do it for me. He then asked me, what I would do for one; I told him, I would fight for my king, and whatsoever he should command me. He then asked me, if I would fight for the king's religion? I told him, there would be no occasion for that, nor would it ever be required of me. He asked me of what religion I was? I told him a Protestant. And then he said, there was no Protestant but would cut the king's throat; and that he should lose 3,000*l.* for being of that religion he intended to be of, which he said was a Papist. This, to the best of my remembrance, is the full of what he said. If I have omitted any thing, it is my care not to write more than I would honestly and justly swear to. I am, Sir, &c.

JOHN BRABOURN.

7. "In or about January last, 1687, Mr. Anthony Farmer declared before us, That the report of his being a Papist was false; but that he was willing to be thought so, because it might do him a kindness: That the reason of his acquaintance with Mr. Brent and Mr. Walker, was to get preferment by their interest: that he had not forsaken the Protestant religion; adding, we should call him a rogue, if ever he did: that he would not make any public declaration of this, but would declare it amongst friends, when and where he pleased.

9. "Upon Monday April the 3rd, Mr. Farmer came to the Lobster in Abington with Mr. Clerk, Mr. Gravener, and Mr. Jennyfar, about eight in the morning, and staid some time in the house, and went from thence to the tavern; returned again about eleven at night, and sat up till one in the morning: the next day they went to the Bush Tavern, and sent for a quarter of lamb for their supper, and there Mr. Farmer, Mr. Clerk, Mr. Gravener, and two troopers and others, continued till past eleven at night, and so returned to the aforesaid place, and sat up till past three in the morning. This I do assert, was the company that the said Mr. Anthony Farmer kept, and these were the unseasonable hours. In witness whereof I am ready to swear, whenever a subpoena shall be sent to me.

GEORGE MORTIMER.

10. "Mrs. Mortimer is ready to assert, That when Mr. Anthony Farmer returned to the Lobster about eleven at night, he came much concerned in drink, and was for kissing the said Mrs. Mortimer, which, he being a stranger, she permitted him to do; but in doing of it, he the said Mr. Anthony Farmer put his tongue in her mouth, which was such a rudeness, that she immediately went out of his company, and would not come nigh him any more.

MARTHA MORTIMER.

11. "Being in company with William Hopkins of Abington, the 12th of June last, 1687, I heard him declare, That himself, with one Mr. Farmer, of the University of Oxon, and some others, did in a frolick, at an unseasonable time of night, take away the town stocks from the place where they constantly stood, and carried them in a cart a considerable way, and threw them into a pool, commonly called Mad Hall's pool.

Some Clauses of particular Statutes to which the Case relates.

In their Statutes concerning their Election of a President, his character is thus described: That he must be a man of good reputation, and good life, and circumspect both in spiritual and temporal affairs.

In the same statutes the Oath which every fellow is obliged to take before he can give his vote in the nomination of a president, is this: viz. 'That he will name one or two of St. Mary-Magdalen-College, or of those who have been fellows there, or have left their places upon a legal and credible account: Or that he will name one or two of the fellows of St. Mary-Winchester College, commonly called New-College in Oxon, or of those who have been formerly fellows there, and have left their places upon a credible account.' After this, the thirteen senior fellows swear, 'That out of the two thus nominated, they will, with all speed, elect one to exercise the office of a president, whom in their consciences they think most proper and sufficient, most discreet, most useful, and best qualified for it, either without any regard to love, hatred, favour, fear, &c. as in the fore-mentioned Statute is more largely expressed.'

Part of the Oath which every Fellow takes when admitted.

Item. I do swear, that I will not procure any dispensation contrary to my aforesaid oath, or to any part thereof, nor contrary to the statutes and ordinances to which they relate, or any one of them; nor will I endeavour that such dispensations be procured by any other or others, publickly or privately, directly or indirectly: and if it shall happen that any dispensation of this sort shall be procured, or freely granted or obtained, of what authority soever it be, whether in general or particular, under what form of words soever it be granted, I will neither make use of it, nor in any sort consent thereto. So help me God.

A Copy of Dr. Hough's Deprivation, by his Majesty's Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Affairs, &c.

Whereas it appears to us, that Mr. John Hough, B. D. hath been unduly elected president of St. Mary-Magdalen College, in the University of Oxon: we have thought fit, upon mature consideration thereof, that the said election be declared void, and the said Mr. John Hough be amoved from the said presidentship; and accordingly we do hereby declare and decree, that the said election is void; and do amove the said Mr. John Hough from the place of president of the said college. Given under our Seal this 22d day of June, 1687.

A Copy of Dr. Aldworth's and Dr. Fairfax's Suspension.

Whereas Charles Aldworth, doctor of Laws, vice-president of St. Mary-Magdalen College, Oxon, and the deputies, fellows of the same House, have been convened before us, for their contempt in not obeying his majesty's letters mandatory for electing and admitting Mr. Anthony Farmer president of the said College; and the said Dr. Aldworth and Deputies having been heard thereupon, we have thought fit to declare, pronounce, and decree, That the said Dr. Aldworth shall for the said contempt be suspended from being vice-president of the said college: and that Henry Fairfax Doctor of Divinity, one of the fellows of the said College, shall for the said contempt be suspended from his fellowship; and accordingly we do hereby suspend Dr. Charles Aldworth from being Vice-president of the said college, and the said Dr. Henry Fairfax from his fellowship in the said College. Given under our Seal the 22d day of June, 1687.

'JAMES R. Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well: Whereas we are informed, That a sentence or decree lately made by our commissioners for ecclesiastical affairs, touching an election in that our college, hath not been obeyed, our will and pleasure is, that no election or admission be made of any person or persons whatsoever, into any fellowship, demyship, or other place or office in our said college, till we shall signify our further pleasure, any statute, custom, or constitution to the contrary notwithstanding. And so, expecting obedience herein, we bid you farewell.'

A Copy of his Majesty's Mandate for the Bishop of Oxon to be President.

'JAMES R. Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. Whereas the place of Pre'sident of our college of St. Mary-Magdalen is now void, our will and pleasure is, and we do hereby authorise and require you forth-with upon receipt hereof, to admit the right reverend father in God, Samuel lord bishop of Oxon into the said place of president, to hold and enjoy the same, with all the rights, privileges and profits, emoluments and advantages thereunto belonging, any statute or statutes, custom or constitution, to the contrary, in any wise, notwithstanding, where-with we are graciously pleased, and do accordingly hereby dispense in his behalf: And so expecting your ready obedience herein, we bid you farewell.'

A Copy of the Lord Sunderland's Letter to the Senior Fellow, Dr. Pudsey, of St. Mary-Magdalen College in the University of Oxon, or in his absence, to the Senior Fellow residing there.

The king having been pleased by his letters mandatory, to require the fellows of St. Mary-Magdalen college, to admit the lord bishop of Oxon president of that college; his majesty commands me to let you know, That immediately upon the receipt hereof, he would have you assemble the fellows, and communicate to them his majesty's said letters: And I am further commanded to tell you, That his majesty expects a ready obedience to be paid to his pleasure herein. I desire you would send me an account of your proceedings as soon as you can, that I may acquaint his majesty therewith. I am, yours, SUNDERLAND.

A Copy of the Bishop of Oxon's Letter to the Senior Fellow of St. Mary-Magdalen College in Oxon, or in his absence to the Senior Fellow residing there.

Sir; You will receive herewith his majesty's mandate to admit me president of your college of St. Mary-Magdalen in Oxon, together with a letter of my lord Sunderland's, pursuant to his majesty's commands. I am indisposed, as I have been for some time, and not in a condition as yet to travel; and therefore my request to you is, That upon receipt of the king's pleasure, you would do me the favour to admit me by proxy (i. e.) either the next senior fellow under yourself, resident, or either of my chaplains, Mr. William Wickens or Mr. Thomas Collins, whom I depute in my stead, which is as valid in law, as if I were present myself; and is the most usual and customary practice. And by so doing, you will oblige, Your very loving friend, and brother, SAMUEL OXON.

Oxon, September 4, 1687.

The lord Sunderland sent an Order to the fellows of St. Mary-Magdalen college to attend the king at Christ-church, at three in the afternoon. They attended accordingly.*

King. What is your name? Are you Dr. Pudsey?

Dr. Puds. Yes, may it please your majesty.

King. Did you receive my letter?

Dr. Puds. Yes, Sir, we did.

King. Then you have not dealt with me like gentlemen; you have done very uncivilly by me, and undutifully.

Here they all kneeled, and Dr. Pudsey offered a Petition, which his Majesty refused to receive; and said,

King. Ye have been a stubborn turbulent

* Reresby, who more than once adverts to king James's policy of attempting to create divisions among the different descriptions of Protestants in order to advance Popery, says of this case:

"The president of Magdalen college, in Oxford, being dead, the king sent them his Mandamus, requiring them to chuse the bishop of that city in his stead, but they answered 'Locus plenus est.' The king taking Oxford in his progress, and the master and fellows of that college waiting on him, he told them the people of the church of England had used him ill, that they had behaved neither as gentlemen or good subjects, and ordered them to go presently back to their election and chuse the bishop, or he would let them feel how heavy a hand a king had. They went, but returned this answer, That they were sorry they should be so unfortunate as to fall under his majesty's displeasure; but that they could not proceed to a new choice without actual commission of wilful perjury, and thereupon hoped he would excuse them. Now, in this progress, it was an observation generally made, that the king courted the dissenters, and discountenanced the church of England: for the Papists being by no means a body of themselves numerous enough to cope with the national church, he thought to strengthen them by a junction with the dissenters, whom he blinded with his liberty of conscience, and with telling them that he desired a repeal of the test and penal laws, for their ease and security, as much as in behalf of the Papists.

"A strange look it had, that the very people, who had lately been so indefatigably busy to divest him of his right, and even to deprive him of life, it having been, in one parliament, attempted to impeach him of high treason, upon the statute against a reconciliation with the church of Rome, I say it looked strange, that these very men should be preferred to those who had preserved him out of their hands, not in parliament only, but in the field also; but it seems all considerations are of no worth or validity with a hearty zeal for the priesthood of Rome, and that oblivion is so far from being ingratitude, that it is highly to be commended, a most salutary expedient, when for the advantage of mother church."

College; I have known you to be so these six and twenty years. You have affronted me in this. Is this your Church of England loyalty? One would wonder to find so many Church of England men in such a business! Go home, and shew yourselves good members of the Church of England. Get you gone; know I am your king. I will be obeyed, and I command you to be gone. Go and admit the bishop of Oxon head, principal, what do you call it, of the College—[One who stood by, said President] I mean President of the College. Let them that refuse it look to it; they shall feel the weight of their sovereign's displeasure.

The Fellows going out of the Lodgings, were called back.

King. I hear you have admitted a fellow of the College, since you received my inhibition. Is this true? Have you not admitted Mr. Holden fellow?

Dr. Puds. I think he was admitted fellow. But we conceive—

Mr. Cra. May it please your majesty, there was no new election, or admission, since your majesty's inhibition, but only the consummation of a former election. They always elect to one year's probation, then the person elected is received or rejected for ever.

King. The consummation of a former election! it was downright disobedience; and it is a fresh aggravation. Get you gone home, I say again; go, get you gone, and immediately repair to your chapel, and elect the bishop of Oxon, or else you must expect to feel the weight of my hand—

The Fellows offered again their Petition on their knees.

King. Get you gone, I will receive nothing from you till you have obeyed me, and admitted the bishop of Oxon.

Upon which they went immediately to their Chapel. Dr. Pudsey proposing, Whether they would obey the King, and elect the bishop of Oxon? They answered in their turns, 'They were as ready to obey his majesty in all things that lay in their power, as any of the rest of his subjects. But the electing the bishop of Oxon being directly contrary to their Statutes, and the positive Oaths they had taken, they could not apprehend it in their power to obey him in this matter.'

A Copy of the Petition offered at Oxford, September 4th, 1687.

To the King's most Excellent Majesty, &c.

Humbly sheweth;

That upon the 27th of August we received your majesty's letters mandatory, dated August 14th, requiring us to admit the right reverend father in God Samuel lord bishop of Oxon to be our president; and dispensing with all statutes and constitutions to the contrary. It is an unexpressible affliction to us, to find ourselves reduced to such an extremity, that either we must disobey your majesty's royal command, contrary to our own inclinations, and that constant course of loyalty which we have shewed in all instances hitherto upon all occasions whatsoever, or else break our Founder's Statutes, and deliberately perjure ourselves.

For our Founder hath obliged us under oath, when we came in fellows, inviolably to observe his statutes; and one clause therein enjoins us never to admit or make use of a dispensation granted by any authority whatsoever, whereby we may be absolved from the same. In this statute for the election of a president, he commands us upon oath to elect such a person into the place of president within fifteen days after the vacancy, who either is, or has been fellow of our own, or New College: which we represented to your majesty in our humble Petition, signed April 9th, wherein we offered ourselves ready to elect any person capable of the same, who your majesty should be pleased to recommend; and having waited the utmost time limited by our statutes, and received no answer to that effect, we did then, according to the exigence of our statutes (having first taken the holy Eucharist, and our several oaths to that purpose) nominate and elect such a person as we in our consciences did believe to be every way qualified for the place. By which act of ours we have conveyed all that right to him which our Founder hath entrusted us with, and it does not lie in our power to admit any other. Our Founder in another statute obligeth us, under the pain of perjury, a dreadful anathema, and eternal damnation, not to suffer any of his statutes to be altered, infringed, or dispensed with, and commands us under the same sacred obligations, not to execute any orders or decree whatsoever, contrary or repugnant to the said statutes; by which said statutes and oaths, we are utterly incapacitated to admit the said reverend father in God to be our president.

May it please your sacred majesty, to give us leave to lay this our case, and ourselves, with all submission, at your royal feet, most earnestly beseeching your sacred majesty, to extend to us your humble petitioners, that grace and tenderness which your majesty hath vouchsafed to all your other subjects, and not to believe us guilty of any obstinacy or undutifulness, crimes which our souls abhor; but to receive us into your majesty's grace and favour, the greatest temporal blessing which our hearts can wish.

And your humble Petitioners shall always, as in duty bound, pray to Almighty God, to bless your Majesty with a long and happy reign over us, and afterwards to receive you to an immortal crown of Glory.

A Copy of the Address which the Fellows of St. Mary Magdalen College gave to the Lord President of the Council, Sept. 6, 1687; and which was delivered his Majesty at Bath.

We your majesty's most humble and most dutiful subjects, the fellows of St. Mary Magdalen College in Oxon, being deeply afflicted with the late sense of your majesty's heavy displeasure, grounded, as we in all reason humbly presume, upon a most unkind misrepresentation of our actions, in relation to an election of a president into your majesty's said college; do humbly beg leave to prostrate ourselves at your royal feet, offering all real testimonies of duty and loyalty. And as we have never failed to evidence both our principles and practices to be truly loyal, in obedience to the commands of your royal brother, and your sacred self, in matters of the like nature; so whatsoever way your majesty shall be pleased to try our readiness to obey your royal pleasure in any instance that does not interfere with, and violate our consciences, which your majesty is studious to preserve, we shall most gladly and effectually comply therewith; a stubborn and a groundless resistance of your royal will and pleasure, in the present, and all other cases, being that which our souls eternally abhor, as becomes

Your Majesty's most loyal and most obedient Subjects, &c.

A Copy of a Letter directed to Dr. Bayly, Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxon, supposed to be writ by Mr. William Penn.

Sir;—Upon an inquiry made of your present fellows of Magdalen College, I am informed that you are a person eminent in that learned body, for your temper, prudence, and good conduct in affairs; and therefore very fit to be addressed to by me, who do not send you this to trepan you and your brethren, but out of a passionate concern for your interest, to persuade you either to a compliance with his majesty's letters mandatory, or to think among yourselves of some expedient to prevent the ruin of your college, and yourselves: And to offer it to his majesty's royal consideration, that the order for the Quo Warranto against the college may be recalled, before it be too late; for you cannot but be sensible how highly his majesty is incensed against you, neither can you give one instance whether ever that sort of proceeding was judged against the crown. Your cause most think it very hard; but you are not in prudence to rely on the goodness of your cause; but to do what the present instant of affairs will permit, and in patience to expect a season that will be more auspicious to persons of your character. Every mechanic knows the temper of his present majesty, who never will receive a baffle in any thing that he heartily espouseth; and that he doth this, yourselves have had too late and manifest an instance, to doubt of his zeal in the affair.

Where there are so many statutes to be observed, it is impossible but some must be broken at one time or another; and I am informed by the learned of the law, that a failure in any one point, forfeits your grant, and lays your college open to the royal disposal.

I could give many other prudent arguments that might possibly incline you to a speedy endeavour of putting an end to your troubles, almost at any rate; but I shall suggest this one thing to you, that your fatal overthrow would be a fair beginning of so much aimed at reformation, first of the university, then of the church, and administer such an opportunity to the enemy, as may not perhaps occur in his majesty's reign.

Your affectionate servant, &c.

The Answer to the afore-mentioned written Letter, dated Oct. 3, 1687.

The enclosed paper is a copy of a letter, which, by the charitable purpose of it, seems to be writ by you, who have been already so kind as to appear on our behalf, and are reported by all that know you to employ much of your time in doing good to mankind, and using your credit with his majesty, to undeceive him in any wrong impressions given him of his conscientious subjects, and where his justice and goodness have been thereby abused, to reconcile the persons injured to his majesty's favour, and secure them by it from oppression and prejudice. In this confidence, I presume to make this application to you, desiring your excuse for not subscribing it: For if you did write the letter, you know to whom it was directed: and if you did not, I hope your charity will induce you to make such use of your light you have by it into the affairs of our college, as to mediate for us with his majesty, to be restored to his good opinion, as the only thing which is desired by us, who are zealous, above all earthly things, for his felicity and glory.

We are not conscious of ever giving his majesty any just offence, as it will appear with you, when you shall have perused the enclosed papers; and have therefore no reason to fear the issuing out of a quo warranto against us. And though you are pleased to apprehend it, no instance can be given of a judgment against the crown, upon the process of that writ: the learned in the law tell me, there is nothing more common, and whereof many cases are reported by Kellaway, from page 128, to page 152, of his Book of Reports: and I think I have heard of a Case in Coke's ninth Report of the abbess of Prata Marcella, which evinces the same; wherein also there is a recital of judgment given against Roger Mortimer for the king, upon a quo warranto in Court of Eyre, reversed for Error in the King's-Bench. We hope, though we have many statutes, it will be found that we have not wilfully transgressed any of them; for all our present troubles are derived to us from our adherence to them, and our fear to offend God, and blemish our consciences, by departing from them.

His majesty is intentionally righteous and just in all his proceedings; he will never knowingly invade any man's property, as he was solemnly pleased to declare in his excellent Speech made in Council, on the 6th of February, 1684, at his accession to the government; which is again repeated in his gracious Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, of the 4th of April last past. It is upon his sacred, inviolable, and royal word and promise, we must depend; not doubting but when his majesty shall be rightly informed of our case, in reference to both his mandatory letters to our College, his anger towards us will be totally extinguished. Our compliance to the first (which was Mr. Farmer's election) would have involved us in the guilt of manifest perjury, and the wilful violation of our statutes: and we are confident his majesty would never have granted the second on the behalf of my lord bishop of Oxon, if he had known we were then possessed of a President duly elected according to our statutes, and confirmed by the bishop of Winton,* our Visitor (as the statutes require); and if he is thereby invested with a lay-freehold under the protection of his majesty's laws, which we cannot undo, or attempt to invade, without subjecting ourselves to suits at law, and doing an apparent injury to the President, who doth not conceive himself to be affected with the sentence of the Lords Commissioners (to which he was no party) whereby his place is declared void, without any citations, summons, or hearing of him.

I believe no instance can be given of a Quo Warranto brought against a college or hall in the universities, from the first foundation of them to this day, or any other ecclesiastical corporation: for the abuses of some constitutions of franchises in them, and the misdemeanours of particular persons, will not destroy a college: and if the corporation of a college should be dissolved, the revenues thereof will return to the founder's heirs, and not devolve to the crown. And if our college must be the first example of that kind, we shall be better justified by the strict observation of our statutes (at least to God and our own consciences) than we could have been by a voluntary and deliberate breach of them.

It was loyalty and conscience, that, in the reign of king Charles I. made thirty-four of our forty fellows, and most of the scholars of our foundation, rather quit their places, and embrace misery and ruin, than to submit to the government of the usurpers of the crown. And in Monmouth's rebellion, the same inducements prevailed on us to raise a company at our own charges, under the command of one of our Fellows, to engage against him. And we hope that these, and many other the like instances, which may be given of the loyalty and zeal of our society to the royal family, will be received as evidences thereof, and that our good and gracious sovereign will not exclude us from that liberty of conscience which he was pleased to extend to all his subjects.

* "Peter Mews, bishop of Winchester, who had borne arms for Charles 1, in the civil war, acted once more in a military character against the rebels in the west, under the command of the duke of Monmouth. After the prince and princess of Denmark had deserted the king, and was in the utmost perplexity and distress, not being able to distinguish his friends from his foes, he was inclined to put himself into the hands of the archbishop of Canterbury, or the bishop of Winchester. He accordingly sent a certain lady, in whom he could confide, to these prelates, to know if they would receive and secure him; but they neither accepted nor rejected the motion." 4 Granger, p. 235.

Sir, I am your most affectionate Servant.

Some QUERIES sent to the Fellows of Magdalen College from Windsor, September 15, 1687.

1st. Whether, waving your election of the bishop of Oxon, you cannot, without violence to your conscience, signify to his majesty, or the above reverend bishop, your willingness to admit the lord bishop president of your college?

2ndly, Whether it be not more interest to the Protestant religion, to have a suspected Popish President, than to have all the places of the college refilled by the king's sole authority, with Popish novices and priests?

3dly, Whether you are not under a mistake, in thinking you should render yourselves more acceptable to the Protestant nobility and gentry, by your being turned out of your Fellowships by injustice and violence, as you conceive; or rather will they be not very cautious how they receive you into their families, for fear of giving offence?

4thly, Whether his majesty, as supreme Visitor of the university, cannot place or displace there ad libitum? or whether you have a right notion of the proceedings which have been practised against you? Whether you suppose that the Lords Commissioners proceeded against you as Lords Commissioners, or Visitors? Which notion, I am sure, will overthrow some body's plea and exception against their authority.

5thly, Whether you acted like men skilled in business, when you refused Mr. Penn's mediation, who you may be sure had good authority for what he did? You could not but know that man, and therefore must needs be fore-armed against any wiles that could be offered to you. Whether an unanimous subscription for an expedient (which indeed I think you ought not to refuse in good manners, since the king was pleased to propose it) presented to his majesty by Mr. Penn, or another favourite, would prevent the destruction of the best foundation in Europe?

Lastly, Whether you be not drawn beyond your knowledge by some hot-headed advisers, which never consider the present state of his majesty's Court of Justice? *

* See Mr. Serjeant Heywood's account of the Judges inserted in a Note to the Trial of the Seven Bishops.

An ANSWER to several QUERIES to the Vice-President and Fellows of Magdalen College in Oxon, sent from Windsor, dated the 25th of September, 1687.

To the 1st, We cannot, without violence to our consciences, and deliberate perjury, admit any person to be President of our College, that is not elected thereunto, and qualified according to our statutes; whereby the bishop of Oxon is in no sort capable; nor is there any memorial in all our register of any admission of a President without election, but of one Dr. Nicholas Bond, whose case was as followeth; viz. Upon the death of Dr. Lawrence Humphreys, about the 30th or 32d of queen Elizabeth's reign, the queen recommended Dr. Bond (being a Fellow of our college) to be elected President. Many of the Fellows inclined in their judgment to elect one Smith, (another of the Fellows) and at their meeting for election, the contention was so great, that they rose without electing, and the obstinacy continued till the place became lapsed: and there being no provision in our statutes to direct us what to do in such a case, the queen, by her letters patents, constituted the said Dr. Bond to be President; and therein declared, That her majesty being informed that the Fellows had neglected to make election of a President in due time (as their statutes required) and those statutes having made no provision for such an omission, she, out of her princely care for the place, and indulgence for those persons who had been guilty of that neglect, did, by advice of the bishop of Winton, their Visitor, constitute Dr. Bond their President; with protestation nevertheless, that she did not thereby pretend to supersede their statutes, or invade their right of election, which was thereby invested in them, but took this course as the only means left to supply their defect of election.

To the second. We must not make ourselves guilty of deliberate perjury, for any considerations whatsoever, both in respect to our consciences, and that we may not, by such a breach upon our statutes, expose our constitution to a forfeiture, nor do evil that good may come on it.

To the third. We conceive we shall be more acceptable to all good men for acting honestly according to our consciences, than for voluntarily and unjustly departing from our right.

To the fourth. We pretend not to make it a question, whether his majesty, by his authority royal, as supreme visitor, can grant a commission for visitation of any college that has a local visitor by their statutes, and are not royal foundations: But we are advised, that no commission can be granted under the great-seal to visitors, to place and displace members of colleges (whose places are freeholds) ad libitum or discretum; but they must proceed according to legal discretion, that is, by the laws and statutes of the land, and the local statutes of the college: And places concerned for the headships and fellowships of colleges, are temporal possessions, and cannot be impeached by summary proceedings. One Dr. Thomas Loveney, president of our college, was deprived in queen Elizabeth's time, by the bishop of Winton, the legal visitor thereof, established by royal authority, and he appealed to the queen: But by the advice of all the judges it was held, that the queen, by her authority, as supreme visitor, could not meddle in it, but he must bring Westminster-hall, because deprivation was a cause merely temporal. The king has a great authority spiritual as well as temporal; but no commissioners can be authorized by the crown to proceed in any commission under the great seal or otherwise, but according to law; in spiritual causes by the canon law; in temporal by the other laws and statutes of the land. And wherein the proceedings in some commissions are directed to be 'summarie et de plano &c.' those words are to be applied to shorten the forms of process, and not for matter of judgment: For Magna Charta provides for our spiritual liberties, as well as our temporal.

An ACCOUNT of the VISITATION of St. Mary Magdalen college in Oxon.

On October 19, Mr. Atterbury, the king's messenger, fixed a citation on the college and chapel-doors, requiring the pretended president and fellows, and other members of the college to appear before the lords commissioners, * bishop of Chester, lord chief justice

* This seems to be the subaltern commission which Burnet mentions to have been "sent from the Ecclesiastical Commission to finish the matter." According to Hume's representation [vol. 8, p. 265, edit. of 1807], it appears as if the whole proceedings had been before an inferior commission, which certainly was not the case.

The Ecclesiastical Commission is printed in bishop Compton's Case, vol. 11, p. 1143.

Roger Coke says, that the Commission of Ecclesiastical Affairs "was granted in the beginning of the year 1686, but was not opened to act till the third of August following: why it lay so long dormant," continues he, "I do not find; but only guess that the king might the better settle his dispensing power in the country, by such judges as he had made, as well as in Westminster-hall; and that he might be more at leisure to carry on the design for surrender of charters." And he tells us, not perhaps without some liability to ridicule, "how unwarily the commission was drawn: for though," he proceeds, "I believe every one understands the design of this commission was to introduce a Roman Hierarchy, which assumes a power over the temporal in order to the spiritual good: yet here this commission grants the temporal power (viz. the chancellor and any other two, viz. my lord treasurer, president, or chief justice), a power of excommunication, which is a pure spiritual act."

Wright, and Mr. Baron Jenner, in the chapel, at nine of the clock on Friday morning, Nov. 21.

On Thursday the lords commissioners came to Oxon, attended with three troops of horse, which quarter there.

On Friday morning at nine they went into the chapel: The president and fellows thinking they had designed to sit in the choir, made no preparation of seats in the outward chapel: Upon which their lordships adjourned to the Hall, where their commission was then read, which, in general, was the same with the former: These three being added to the other lords commissioners, and particularly impowered to visit Magdalen-college only.

This done, the names of the president and fellows were called over; Dr. Hough being first called. All in town appeared (except Dr. Fairfax) and excuses were made for the absent.

Then a speech was made by the bishop of Chester,* and in it his lordship was severe

* This Bishop of Chester was Dr. Thomas Cartwright, the same, I apprehend, who had attended Walcot, Rouse, and Hone, (and according to Luttrell's account, the duke of Monmouth) at their executions, and was author of the sermon mentioned by Fountainhall (Decisions, vol. 1, p. 416,) "that the king could dispense with the laws in cases of necessity, whereof he was the sole judge."

I find concerning him the two following passages in Narcissus Luttrell's MS. "Brief Historical Relation," &c. in All-Souls College, Oxford:

"February, 1688. The bishop of Chester, in a drunken humour, having spoke reflecting words on the lord chancellor and lord Sunderland, that they would deceive the king, received a check for the same.

"April 23, 1689. The Irish letters say, that the bishop of Chester died lately there, not without suspicion of poison."

In Granger's Biog. Hist. vol. 4, p. 294, is the following character of Cartwright:

"Thomas Cartwright, who had been a forward and confident preacher at the time of the Interregnum, and proceeded in exact conformity with the powers then in being, struck in with the royal party at the Restoration, and was no less forward upon all occasions to express his loyalty. He was made one of the king's chaplains; was successively a prebendary of St. Paul's, and of Durham, and had a hard struggle with Dr. Womack, for the bishopric of St. David's. In the reign of James, he enlisted himself on the side of the prerogative, and was made bishop of Chester for boldly asserting in one of his sermons, that the king's promises to his parliament were not binding. It is probable, that on such slavish terms he might have been made archbishop of Canterbury, if that prince had continued on the throne. He sat in the Ecclesiastical Commission, and was one of the judges sent by the king to intimidate the fellows of Magdalen college in Oxford, in the affair of Dr. Parker, whom they had refused to elect their president, according to the royal mandate. Upon the Revolution he fled into France, where he officiated as minister to the protestant part of the king's household. Upon the death of Seth Ward, he became titular bishop of Salisbury. James, who looked upon him as neither protestant nor papist, had little or no esteem for him. He died of the flux in Ireland, whither he had followed the royal adventurer, the 15th of April, 1689. He is misrepresented in Richardson's "Godwin," as having publicly professed the faith of the church of Rome. See the contrary, in "Athen. Oxon." ii. col. 830."

The Court was then adjourned till two in the afternoon.

In the Afternoon were called over the names of the Demies, Chaplains, Clerks, Choristers, and College servants.

The President then interposed, desiring leave to speak before they proceeded any farther; which being granted, he told their lordships, that the time betwixt your citation and appearance was so short, that the society had not time to advise with counsel how to behave themselves on this occasion; therefore desired of your lordships a copy of the commission, and time to consider of it.

Bishop Ch. It is upon record; you may have it above.

mission, and was one of the judges sent by the king to intimidate the fellows of Magdalen college in Oxford, in the affair of Dr. Parker, whom they had refused to elect their president, according to the royal mandate. Upon the Revolution he fled into France, where he officiated as minister to the protestant part of the king's household. Upon the death of Seth Ward, he became titular bishop of Salisbury. Pres. Is it the same the other lords commissioners had?

Bishop Ch. Yes, for the most part it is.

Pres. Then, my lord, I do assure you (and will make oath, if you please) that I have often endeavoured to get a copy of it, and could not procure it.

L. C. J. Have you not heard it read, or will you hear it again?

Pres. I am not capable of making a judgment of it myself; but it is possible there may be errors and defects in it, such as the society may make use of to their own advantage; and I am confident, it is neither his majesty's intention, nor your lordships', we should be debarred from it.

A Copy was then denied.

Bishop Ch. Dr. Hough, will you submit to this visitation?

Pres. My lords, I do declare here in the name of myself, and the greater part of the fellows, that we submit to the visitation, as far as it is consistent with the laws of the land, and the statutes of the college, and no further. I desire your lordships that it may be recorded.

This was twice repeated.

L. C. J. You cannot imagine that we act contrary to the laws of the land; and as to the statutes, the king has dispensed with them: do you think we come here to act against laws?

Pres. It does not become me, my lords, to say so; but I will be plain with your lordships. I find that your commission gives you authority to change and alter the statutes, and make new ones as you think fit: now my lords, we have an Oath, not only to observe these Statutes [laying his hand on the book] but to admit of no new ones, or alterations in these: This must be my behaviour here; I must admit of no alteration from it, and by the grace of God never will.

Bishop Ch. Do you observe all these statutes?—Pres. Yes, my lord, I hope we do.

Bishop Ch. You have a statute there for Mass, why don't you read Mass?

Pres. My lord, the matter of this oath is unlawful; and in such a case no man is obliged to observe an oath: besides, the statute is taken away by the laws of the land.

Bishop Ch. By what law?

Dr. Stafford. By that which obliges to say Common-Prayer.

Bishop Ch. What, the Act of Uniformity? I have often considered it, and don't remember one word of mass in it.

Dr. Stafford. But that obliges us to use the liturgy of the Church of England in all collegiate churches and chapels. And, I hope, my lords, you do not imagine that we can say Common-Prayer and mass together.

Bishop Ch. Do you allow that act of parliament can free you from the obligation of a statute?

Pres. I do not say but that his majesty may alter our statutes, nor do I know but a parliament may do the same; I dispute not their power; only this, my lord, I say, that I, who already have taken an oath to observe these statutes as they now stand, and am sworn not to admit of any change or alteration by any authority whatsoever [And then turning to the Oath, where they were to observe those statutes and no other, according to the literal and grammatical sense, &c. and reading it to their lordships] can obey none: but then those who come after such limitations and restrictions are made, are not obliged to observe them: and that, my lords, is our case, as to the statutes of the Mass.

Then the Decree of the 22d of June was read, declaring the President's election null and void.

Bishop Ch. Did you know of this commission, &c.?

Pres. Yes, my lord, I have heard of it.

Bishop Ch. Why then did you not obey it?

Pres. I was never cited before their lordships, nor was either heard by them in person or proxy; and I think I am the only instance that is extant, of any man that was ever deprived of a freehold, wherein he was legally invested, and of which he was quietly possessed, without being summoned or heard.

Here mention was made of Dr. Fairfax's suspension.

Pres. My lord, he is absent, and if your lordships give me leave, I have somewhat to say on his account. Your lordships may please to observe in that decree, that the reason given why Dr. Fairfax was suspended from his fellowship, was, because he had not obeyed his majesty's command, in not electing Mr. Anthony Farmer president of the college: now, the charge of immorality given in against Mr. Farmer by the college-delegates was made out, and their lordships fully satisfied in it, on the 29th of July; notwithstanding which, this decree for suspension of Dr. Fairfax was fixed on the college-gates August 2.

Bishop Ch. The king hath for the most part recommended to the Presidentship of this college.

Pres. I am the twentieth president, and only four of that number have been recommended by the kings and queens of England, whereof three were every way qualified for that office.

Bishop Ch. Who were those?

Pres. My lord, there was one in the time of Edward 6. one in queen Elizabeth's, and two in the late king's reign.

Bishop Ch. Was there never a one in king Charles the first's reign?

Pres. Not that we know of.

Bishop Ch. What think you of Dr. Oliver?

Pres. It doth not appear to us, my lord, that he ever had a mandate.

Bishop Ch. But it appears to us, and that I will bring you one to swear, that he had a mandate.

Pres. The truth is, we have lost the register of Dr. Oliver's election and admission; the register betwixt the year 1640, or thereabouts, and 1660, being taken away by those who were turned out of the college at that time; but I believe, my lord, we are able to prove that he was elected and admitted according to the statute.

Bishop Ch. Was Dr. Clark a statutable person?—Pres. Yes, my lord.

Bishop Ch. Do not the statutes require that he should be in orders? was he in orders?

Pres. My lord, the statutes only require that he should be doctor of divinity, physic, law, or master of arts. There is indeed one statute, which says, The president or senior-fellow should read prayers upon such certain days; from whence we conclude, that the founder supposed we might have a president that might not be in orders; and in such a case he takes care that the senior-fellow should do his duty.

Mr. Char. My lord, will you be pleased to ask Dr. Hough, whether Dr. Clark was married, or not?

Pres. No, Sir, he was a widower.

Then a Petition was read from the society to his majesty, signed the 9th of April, and presented the 10th to the earl of Sunderland, by the hands of Dr. Thomas Smith, and captain Bagshaw, wherein it was set forth, That having heard that his majesty would recommend Mr. Farmer to them, a person incapable, they did humbly beseech him, either to leave them to a free election, or to recommend a qualified person.

Bishop Ch. Was this the petition?—Ans. Yes.

Bishop Ch. Why then did you not stay for his majesty's answer?

Pres. My lord, we did till the very last day wherein we are limited to finish the election; and my lord Sunderland returned in the king's name this answer, That his majesty expected to be obeyed. Now, my lord, we did no longer defer the election, because our statutes enjoin us within such a time, and we staid to the utmost: nor could we choose the person his majesty did recommend, knowing him to be so unfit, as we afterwards made him appear to be. The society was therefore to proceed to the election of another person, and did agree on such as you see.

Bishop Ch. A mandate always implies an inhibition.

Pres. My lord, I cannot conceive that.

Bishop Ch. But I can; and if you question it, here is the king's counsel ready to argue it.

Pres. My lord, whilst the person his majesty recommends appears duly qualified for the place, it seems indeed to imply that we should not proceed to the election of another; but when he is known to be utterly incapable, it seems to be the same as if there were no letter at all.

Some other things and questions less material were put, and then the Court was adjourned to Saturday the 22nd, at nine in the morning, to the common room, the hall being, as they said, too public and incommodious.

Saturday, October 22, 1687.

As soon as their Lordships met in the common room, and the Society before them, the first word was 'Withdraw;' and after a little time, the President was called in alone.

Bishop Ch. Do you submit to the decree of the commissioners, whereby the election is declared null?

Pres. As to that decree of the lords above, it is a nullity in itself from the beginning to the end, as it relates to me, I never having been cited, nor having ever appeared before them, either in person or proxy. Besides, my cause itself was never before them; their lordships never enquiring or asking one question concerning the legality or statuteness of my election; for which reasons (as I am informed) that decree was of no validity against me, according to methods in the civil law: but if it were, I am possessed of a freehold, according to the laws of England, and the statutes of the society, having been elected as unanimously, and with as much formality as any one of my predecessors, presidents of this college, and afterwards admitted by the lord bishop of Winton, our visitor, as the statutes of the college require; and therefore I cannot submit to that Sentence, because I think I cannot be deprived of my freehold, but by course of law in Westminster-hall, or by being some ways incapacitated by the founder's statutes.

Bishop Ch. Will you deliver up the keys of the president's office, and lodgings, to the use of that person whom the king has appointed your president, as the statutes require?

Pres. I will immediately do it, if that appears.

Bishop Ch. Turn to that part of the president's oath, where he promiseth to submit quietly if he shall be expelled, either for his own fault, 'vel ob aliam causam.'

Pres. My lord, that statute only concerns me, if I am expelled for any fault committed by me.

Bishop Ch. 'Vel ob aliam causam?'

Pres. Then, my lord, to be short, here is no cause at all.

Bishop Ch. I ask you again, will you deliver up the keys to the president whom his majesty hath appointed?

Pres. There neither is, nor can be a president so long as I live, and obey the statutes of the college; and therefore I do not think fit to give up my right, the keys and lodgings.

Bishop Ch. We may demand them of you as visitors.

Pres. My lords, we never deliver up the keys to the bishop of Winton. and we own no greater visitatorial power than his: he hath the king's authority. It is by virtue of a royal charter that we live together, and enjoy the benefit of this place, that empowered our founder to give us a rule, and obliged us by oath to act suitable unto it: And the bishop of Winton is hereby constituted to be our visitor; and all this we own from the king's authority. The bishop of Winton is our ordinary visitor; the king (I presume) our extraordinary. But your lordships know it hath been controverted, Whether the king can visit a private college or not? The authority of the President is made by delivering up the Statute-book, and Keys; and therefore I look upon them as an essential badge of my office. But I humbly beg that I may ask your lordship one question. Your lordship is pleased to demand of me to give up these things: does your lordship own my right? For if not, what is it your lordships would have me give up?

Bishop Ch. No, we look upon you as an intruder.

Pres. If I am an intruder, the bishop of Winton made me one; and I thank God for it. My lords, the time we have been allowed for this appearance has been very short; but one day betwixt it and the Citation. We are men ignorant in the laws, and I must confess it of myself in particular, that I have endeavoured to give your lordships a plain satisfactory reply to such questions as your lordships have been pleased to put to me. It is very probable, that through ignorance and inadvertency, I may express myself unwarily. If so, I beseech your lordship let no advantage be taken of it; my intention has been always to express myself with all imaginable duty to the king, and respects to your lordships. If I have done otherwise, I beseech your lordships' candour in a favourable interpretation of what I said, that nothing may be taken amiss, where all was dutifully intended. And now, my lords, thus far have I appeared before you as judges; I now address to you as men of honour, and gentlemen; I beseech you to represent me as dutiful to his majesty to the last degree, as I always will be, so far as my conscience permits me, to the last moment of my life; and when I am dispossessed here? I hope your lordships will intercede that I may no longer lie under his majesty's displeasure, or be frowned upon by my prince, which is the greatest affliction can befall me.

Upon this the President was ordered to withdraw, and after a little time, he and the Fellows were called in again. Then the Bishop repeated this question.

Bishop Ch. Dr. Hough, will you deliver up the keys, and quiet possession of the lodgings, to the person whom his majesty has appointed president? [To which no Answer was returned.] The Bishop repeated a second time.

Pres. My lords, I have neither seen nor heard any thing to induce me to it.

Bishop Ch. Dr. Hough, will you deliver up the keys, and quiet possession of the lodgings, to the person whom his majesty has appointed president?

VOL. XII.

Whereupon the King's Proctor stood up and accused Dr. Hough of Contumacy. Then the bishop of Chester admonished him in these words, three times.

Bishop Ch. Dr. Hough, I admonish you to depart peaceably out of the lodgings, and to act no longer as President, or pretended President of this College.

Which being so done, they struck his name out of the Book, and admonished the Fellows, and others of the Society, that they should no longer submit to his authority.

Oxon, Saturday, October 27, 1687.

Dr. Fairfax's Case before the Commissioners.

At the first sessions Dr. Fairfax purposely absented himself; but Mr. Atterbury making affidavit he was in town, and that he advised him to appear, the doctor accordingly did so the next day. The doctor being called in alone, and the doors immediately shut, he begged of their lordships some company might be let in, because, as all had observed, the Bishop in his speech, at the opening their commission, promised to transact every thing in the face of the world. The Bishop complained of the crowd. The doctor then desired to fetch in but two or three, at length but one, and him at the door, viz. the college steward, a public notary.

Bar. Jenner. You must not think to prescribe to the court.

Bish. Ch. What is the cause of your contempt, in not appearing at either sessions yesterday?

Dr. Fairfax. No contempt, my lord, but for the ensuing reasons. First, I thought my suspension above had eased me of that trouble. [The doctor tendering a copy of it, which was read by the Commissioners. The doctor insisted very much on the reasons their lordships at Whitehall gave for this suspension; viz. for not obeying his majesty in electing Mr. Farmer, he tendering a copy of articles made good against him; and yet their lordships ordered his suspension to be fixed on the college gates five days after that famous hearing. Second reason for his non appearance, that upon the first day of the ensuing term, he intended to meet the lord chief justice, at his court of King's Bench, for relief against the sentence, his fellowship being a freehold; witness Coveny's Case.]

Bish. Ch. You will find but little favour there.

Dr. Fairfax. My lord, in courts of judicature, I only expect justice (and turning to the lord chief justice) I have myself, said he, been above four years in all the courts of Westminster hall, and found excellent justice, and I will see how it is now.

L. C. J. You shall have justice.

Dr. Fairfax. But your lordship may save me the labour of two journies and my charges, by improving your lordship's deserved interest with my lords commissioners there, and get them now to take off my suspension: It is ill travelling at this time of year; and besides I am not rich.

Bar. Jenner. To sue in Westminster hall requires a purse.

Dr. Fairf. My lord, I did not say I was poor.

L. C. J. You must make your supplication and submission to the king.

Dr. Fairf. My lord, they tell me, that this business lies in your lordship's court, and only there. Besides the trouble I am otherwise to give your lordship, what a noise will the cause make, that Dr. Fairfax is suspended for this very reason; viz. not obeying the king, in electing Anthony Farmer, such a virtuoso! And under correction, your lordships are obliged to take off my suspension, to take off the shame from that body, whose number by a common adjunct you yourself have lately increased.

Bar. Jenner. We must not endure these reflections on the court.

Bish. Ch. But will you submit to this visitation?

Then Dr. Fairfax read a Paper, subscribed by him, dated October the 22d, in these words:

'My lords, I have been summoned, and appeared in this cause before the Lords Ecclesiastical at Whitehall, with whom your lordships are now joined in commission; and then gave in my answer: I have nothing to add to it, and find no reason to retract it.'

'HENRY FAIRFAX.'

Bish. Ch. Will you admit of the Bishop of Oxford?

Dr. Fairf. I am suspended.

Bish. Ch. Have you done no collegiate act since your suspension?

Dr. Fairf. My lord, I have gone into the hall, and laid in my chamber: I did not think their lordships, when they suspended me, ever intended that I should not eat, drink, or sleep.

Bish. Ch. If your suspension was off, would you submit to the Bishop of Oxford?

Dr. Fairf. Truly, my lord, I cannot do it.

Then all the Fellows were called into court.

The President being withdrawn, the Bishop put the question to all the fellows; viz. Whether they would assist at the admission of the bishop of Oxford to be installed President, by virtue of the king's mandate? To which was answered by all the Fellows, to this effect (except Dr. Pudsey, and Dr. Thomas Smith, who answered doubtfully, and Charnock, that he would assist) That they were under oaths to the contrary, and therefore could not do it.

Then all were ordered to withdraw; and Dr. Pudsey being called in alone, they asked him concerning the manner and form of Installing a President; which he instructed them in.

The Court adjourned till two in the afternoon.

As soon as they met, a Letter from the earl of Sunderland to Dr. Pudsey was read, dated the 2d of August, signifying, that the society in answer to his majesty's Letter, commanding them to admit the bishop of Oxford, agreed unanimously in this Answer, That the place was full. Their lordships were pleased to ask the Fellows singly, whether that was their answer? And as many as were there, owned that it was.

During this examination, the President came into court, and having waited until it was ended, and their lordships at a pause, he made his application to them: 'My lords, if your lordships please to give me leave, I would gladly speak a few words.' They were all pleased to put off their hats, and say he might. Whereupon he said, 'My lords, you were pleased this morning, in pursuance to a decree of the lords commissioners at London, to deprive me of my place of president of this college, and to strike my name out of the Buttery book: I do hereby protest against all your proceedings, and against all that you have done, or hereafter shall do, in prejudice of me and my right, as illegal, unjust, and null; and therefore I appeal to my sovereign lord the king in his courts of justice.' Upon which, the strangers and young scholars in the room gave a hum; which so much incensed their lordships, that notwithstanding all the protestations the president and fellows could make, the president in particular offering to purge himself by oath, that he was no way accessory to, or abetting of it, and declared that he was heartily ashamed and troubled at it; yet the Lord Chief Justice was not to be pacified, but charging it upon the president, bound him in a bond of 1,000*l.* and security to the like value, to make his appearance, at the King's-bench bar, the 12th of November. At the same time baron Jenner took occasion to pun on the president (Hough's) name, saying to him, 'Sir, you must not think to huff us.'

After this, was read the Answer the fellows returned to his majesty upon his command to them, upon the 4th of September, to elect the bishop of Oxford: the answer was under the hand of a public notary, subscribed by all the fellows then present, except Mr. Charnock. The bishop of Chester was pleased to charge the fellows of unmannerliness, for sending such an answer to their prince after such a manner.

So they adjourned till Tuesday the 25th, at eight in the morning.

Tuesday, October 25, 1687.

When the court met, Dr. Stafford offered a paper in Answer to what was objected on Friday, that a mandate implied an inhibition; which their lordships having perused, would not suffer to be read publicly, but asked the fellows whether they would sign it, bidding them do it at their peril.

Then the fellows had leave to withdraw into the hall, and not being satisfied that it was necessary to sign a plea, which their lordships refused to have argued, they returned the paper into the court, subscribed only by Dr. Fairfax and Dr. Stafford. The latter, after some debate, desired to withdraw, but Dr. Fairfax stood to it.

A Copy of Dr. Stafford's and Dr. Fairfax's Plea.

"To the Right Reverend and Right Honourable his Majesty's Commissioners for the visiting St. Mary Magdalen College in Oxon.

"May it please your lordships;

"On Friday last in the afternoon you seemed to insist very much on this; viz. That his majesty in commanding the fellows of the said college to elect Mr. Farmer president, did thereby inhibit them to elect any other person whatsoever; which has not yet been made appear to be law either out of the books of civil, canon or common law: neither is it agreeable to reason, that a command to elect a person incapable, should include in it an obligation not to elect a person capable, that being a kind of contradiction in terminis. Yet this being granted, it cannot in the least affect the said fellows, or invalidate their election of Dr. Hough, notwithstanding his majesty's mandate in behalf of Mr. Farmer, who being incapable of the place, the fellows cannot be said to be guilty of any disobedience or disloyalty, in proceeding to the election of another person who was qualified according to the statute, being forced to make an election. For they are obliged by the statutes of their college (when called together) to elect a president, or any officer, under pain of perpetual expulsion from the college, to meet and make an election; which punishment they incur ipso facto, who either refuse to meet when so called, or being met, to nominate or elect a person into the office void, as appears by the statutes of the said college: 'Titulo de numero scholarium & electione præsidentis.' Now according to the founder's direction in the said statute, on the 15th of April last, the fellows were called together by the vice president to elect a president in the place of Dr. Clark deceased, and the oath desired to be taken, before the election was administered by the vice president to them, whereby they are obliged to nominate and elect a person that either is, or has been fellow of Magdalen college, or New college in Oxon. Which oath, when the fellows had taken, it was not in their power to elect Mr. Farmer; and yet they were then obliged to make an election, under pain of perpetual amotion from the college; as appeared by the forecited statute. And it cannot be imagined, that his most sacred majesty did expect that the fellows should be either perjured, or forfeit their right to their fellowships, rather than disobey his command; his majesty having most graciously declared, that conscience ought not to be forced, and that none of his subjects should be molested in the enjoyment of their rights and privileges, &c. Now, that our proceedings at the election cannot lay any imputation of our disobedience or disloyalty upon us, will thus be made appear. Either we had the power to elect a president, or we had not; if we had not, to what end or purpose did his majesty command us to elect one? if we had, our power was either restrained to persons so and so qualified, or we were at liberty to choose whom we pleased: but we could not do the latter, as appears by our statutes; and therefore we could not elect Mr. Farmer, being not invested with any power to elect a person unqualified. And if we had so done, our election would have been null and void in itself, and the person elected liable to be turned out by our visitor.

"As for the decree of his majesty's commissioners (in pursuance of which your lordships have admonished Dr. Hough to recede from the place of president, and quietly to resign the keys of his office, and have his name struck out of the college book) we humbly conceive it to be null and void in itself, to all intents and purposes, Dr. Hough being thereby deprived of freehold for life (of which he was duly and legally possessed) without ever being called to defend his right, or any misdemeanor objected against him. Wherefore we humbly beg leave of your lordships, that Dr. Hough may be permitted to defend his right and title to the presidentship at common law, before any other person is put in possession of the place.

THOMAS STAFFORD,
HEN. FAIRFAX."

After this, Mr. Wiggins, chaplain to the bishop of Oxford, was called in, who delivered a Paper, empowering him, as proxy, to be installed president for his lord; which being read, together with the king's mandate for the bishop of Oxon, the question was put to two or three of the seniors, Whether they would assist at this instalment? Which they refusing, the court adjourned to the chapel, where the bishop of Chester put Mr. Wiggins into the president's stall, where he took the oath which the statutes enjoin the president at his admission, and the oaths of allegiance and supremacy; the latter of which he was ordered to take upon his knees, which he accordingly did. Then their lordships conducted him to the door of the president's lodgings, where knocking three times, and the door not being opened, they returned to the common room, and commissioned Atterbury, and a tipstaff, to fetch a smith to force it open; which was done, their lordships being present all this while: none of the fellows, except Mr. Charnock, assisting, or being so much as present at either of these performances. Then the commissioners being returned to the common room, Dr. Fairfax desired leave, at their leisures, to speak; which was granted.

Dr. Fairf. My lords, your lordships have been doing of what I can by no means consent to.

Bish. Ch. You are big to be delivered of your own destruction. Will you submit to the bishop of Oxon, as now installed president, by virtue of the king's mandate?

Dr. Fairf. I will not; I cannot; because we have a statutable and legal president already.

Then the same question was put to the society, which being a business of moment, they desired time till the afternoon to consider it.

Then the Court adjourned till three o'clock; at which time the answer was given in by the society (except Dr. Fairfax, who had given his in the morning) "That whereas his majesty hath been pleased, by his royal authority, to cause the right reverend father in God Samuel bishop of Oxon, to be installed president; we whose names are hereunto subscribed, do submit, as far as is lawful and agreeable to the statutes of the college, and no way prejudicial to the right and title of Dr. Hough."

This Answer was accepted, except the last clause, which the lord chief justice, and baron Jenner declared, as judges, to be insignificant, since nothing they could do, could any way invalidate Dr. Hough's title; but left them still at liberty to be witnesses for him, or any other way be serviceable to him in the recovery of his right. Upon this assurance, the society was prevailed with to leave out the last clause.

Then all were commanded to withdraw: And Dr. Fairfax being called in, the bishop asked him what he meant by his paper above-mentioned, dated October the 22d, and whether he did submit to the authority of the court?

Dr. Fairf. As I have denied it above, so I do here.

Then the court was opened, and the Doctor complained before them all, that he was twice closeted; and being asked, Whether he would obey the court, and bishop of Oxon? he plainly denied both. Upon which the Buttery book was called for, and the bishop of Chester commanded his name to be struck out, and this sentence passed; viz.

'Forasmuch as you have denied the authority of the court, and refused to obey the bishop of Oxon, whom the king hath made your president, and taken commons after your suspension; we declare your place void, and command you quietly to depart the college within 14 days.'

Dr. Fairf. My lords, all the huge calamities that have befallen me, are on the sole account of a religious and conscientious observation of our pious founder's statutes, whose bread I have eaten almost these 30 years.

L. C. J. No speeches: besides, if you have any papers, instead of reading them, leave them in the court.

Then, with much ado, the doctor prevailed with them to let him read his protestation, which he left in the court.

'I Henry Fairfax, fellow of St. Mary-Magdalen College, do under my former an'swer heretofore made, and to the intent it may appear that I have not consented, nor agreed to any thing done against me, and to my prejudice, I protest that your sentence given here against me, is lex nulla, and so far as it shall appear to be aliqua; I do say it is iniqua et injusta; and that therefore I do from it, as iniqua et injusta, appeal to our sovereign lord the king, in his courts of justice, as the laws, statutes, and ordinances of the land will permit in that behalf.

Subscribed,

HENRY FAIRFAX.'

October 25, 1687.

This Protestation was over-ruled, and a copy of the Sentence denied, though most earnestly desired at the instance of Dr. Hedges, and Mr. Vice-Chancellor, two days after.

At the close of the sessions, their lordships declared, that they were very well satisfied with the answer the society had given them; and though before they had laid a libel to their charge, yet that night they declared, they had met with nothing from them but civility, and that they should receive the same from them; that they had shewn themselves men of excellent tempers this day and before; and that they would represent it faithfully above to their advantage, and that if it any way lay in their power to serve them, they should be very ready to do it.

Then they adjourned till Wednesday morning, ordering them to bring in their answer to the following questions:

1. What gifts and provisions have you for entertainment of strangers?
2. What is the value of it?
3. How is it applied?
4. And where is the place of entertainment?

Wednesday, October 26, 1687.

In the morning they made it appear to their lordships very satisfactorily, that they were obliged to give in charity money, 2*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* and that besides that, they gave, communibus annis, almost 100*l.* as appeared by a paper they then delivered in. Upon this their lordships were pleased to expatiate upon their generous bounty and liberality, saying the complaint of this account was groundless, and that it would induce the king to a better belief of them in all other matters.

Then a petition of Dr. Rogers, late organist, was given in, desiring to be restored, which was read; but several misdemeanors being proved against him, it was thrown out, and he advised to rest satisfied with 30*l.* per annum, which the College had bestowed on him, when they turned him out of his place.

Thursday, October 27, 1687.

This morning they received a list of leases, &c. which had been renewed two years last past. Mr. Charnock, the new convert, asked their lordships, whether those leases stood good, which had been sealed since Dr. Hough's election? The lord chief justice answered, Yes; for corporations always stick by their seals. Then their lordships perused the College Registers, and finding nothing in them to object against, they were returned, and the court adjourned till the afternoon. At which time their lordships told them, that having received no express from above, as they expected, they would adjourn till Friday at eight in the morning.

Friday, October 28, 1687.

The Commissioners being seated, all were commanded to withdraw: then only the fellows were called in, and the bishop of Chester said they had represented them fairly to the king, but his majesty expected some farther submission, which they advised them to make, by acknowledging their contempt to his sacred majesty in person, and to his letters; and that they should promise to behave themselves loyal for the future; and that they should some ways own the proceedings and legality of the court, and implore his majesty's pardon, and lay themselves at his feet.

The fellows making a little pause, the bishop of Chester told them, they might word it themselves; or, if they thought fit, Mr. Tucker should assist them in a form. Then all the fellows withdrew into the hall, and drew up the following Answer:

"May it please your Lordships;

"We have endeavoured in all our actions, to express our duty in all humility to his majesty; and being conscious to ourselves, that in the whole conduct in the business before your lordships, we have done nothing but what our oaths and statutes indispensably oblige us to, we cannot make any declaration, whereby we acknowledge that we have done any thing amiss, having acted according to the principles of loyalty and obedience, so far as we could, without doing violence to our consciences, or prejudice to our rights (one of which we humbly conceive the electing a president to be) from which we are sworn upon no account whatsoever to depart. We therefore humbly beg your lordship to represent this favourably, with our utmost duty to his majesty, whom God grant long and happily to reign."

Upon their lordships perusing of the Answer, they expressed their dislike of it, saying, it did not come up to the address sent to his majesty at Bath, which was read. To this it was replied, that they hoped their behaviour since had been every way answerable to what they therein promised. Then their lordships said, That it did not come up to what they delivered in on Tuesday.

Dr. Bayly. My lords, we have acted conformable to ourselves; and truly, my lords, I cannot possibly confess any crime.

Bishop Ch. We do not expect of you to confess any capital crime, only to make some acknowledgement.

Mr. Fulham. My lord, we were ordered to address ourselves, as having acted in contempt of his majesty's authority, which, my lord, I look upon as so great a crime, that on no account I would be guilty of it. My lord, we have endeavoured to obey his majesty to the utmost of our power, and seeing your lordships were pleased to accept our answer on Tuesday, I humbly conceive your lordships' honour is engaged, that nothing further be required of us.

Bishop Ch. You are a very forward speaker, and abound in your own sense.

Mr. Fulh. My lord, I hope your lordship will give me leave to speak, when our fortunes are so considerably at stake.

Then Dr. Bayly desired of their lordships to give him leave to explain what he meant by the word 'submit,' in his answer on Tuesday; because (saith he) I hear your lordships understood more than was meant, and lest your lordships should go away under a mistake, by the word 'submit,' in the former answer, I did not intend any future obedience to the bishop of Oxford; but meant it in reference to the king's authority, inasmuch as I did not oppose or resist the bishop of Oxford's instalment.

Upon this, a fresh question was put to the fellows, whether they would obey the bishop of Oxford, as their president, 'in licitis et honestis?' To which all, except one or two, answered, they could not obey the bishop of Oxford as their president.

Then Mr. Fulham was particularly asked the question.

Mr. Fulh. Dr. Hough being duly elected and admitted president, doth thereby obtain a right, which I am not satisfied he hath any way forfeited, and therefore can obey no other person as president.

Bish. Ch. Will you obey the bishop of Oxford as in possession?

Mr. Fulh. I cannot, because the bishop hath not lawful possession.

Then he was asked, wherein?

Mr. Fulh. He had not possession in due form of law, nor by proper officers. I am informed that the proper officers to give possession of a freehold, is the sheriff with a Posse Comitatus.

L. C. J. Pray, who's the best lawyer, you or I? Your Oxford law is no better than your Oxford divinity. If you have a mind to a Posse Comitatus, you may have one soon enough.

Mr. Fulh. My lords, I intend nothing but respect to your lordships, and have endeavoured to speak and behave myself with due reverence; and I hope your lordships will put a favourable construction on what I said.

Then all were commanded to withdraw, and the Buttery book was called for, and after that, Mr. Fulham was sent for in; and by the bishop of Chester suspended as followeth:

Bishop Ch. 'Mr. George Fulham, We have thought fit to suspend you from the profits of your fellowship during his majesty's pleasure, for your contempt and opprobrious language.'

Then they adjourned till Wednesday the 16th of November, ordering the absent fellows to be sent for home against that time. So they immediately went for London.

Wednesday, November 16, 1687, at nine in the Morning.

The Lords Commissioners being sat, the first thing they did, sent for the Buttery book; then called for Mr. Joyner and Mr. Allibone, and entered them actual fellows: The former in the room of Dr. Fairfax, whom they had expelled: the latter in place of Mr. Ludford, lately deceased: all oaths being dispensed with, besides that of a fellow. That done, the fellows being called, and the reasons given in for those that were absent, the bishop of Chester spoke a speech to this effect:

"Gentlemen;

"Your many contempts and wilful disobedience have occasioned this visitation, which will end at last in your ruin. This society of yours has been long exercised in the methods of quarrelling; has always been troubled with factious spirits, and testy mutineers, ever since the restoration of the late king: You have encouraged quarrels among yourselves; quarrels between yourselves and president: quarrels at length between yourselves and visitor. For I have often heard your late visitor complain, that this society was ever stocked with an unquiet and turbulent generation. By these steps, from quarrelling with the president and visitor, you have at last advanced to the highest pitch of insolence, to quarrel with your prince, and affront his sacred majesty. I endeavoured before, at the opening our commission, to make you sensible of the scandal that your disobedience will bring upon your religion; how much you stain and dishonour your liberal and ingenuous education in this society.

"You cannot but know his majesty is your supreme ordinary. You cannot but have read in Bracton, who was twenty years lord chief justice under king Henry 3. 'Nemo presumat de factis ejus disquirere, nedum contra factum ejus venire.' All disobedience implies pride: For no man can disobey his governor, but he who thinks himself wiser. The reputation and honour of a prince at home, and his respect abroad, are chief standards of a government. But these pillars, as much as in you lies, you have endeavoured to shake. And unless his majesty's honour and right be vindicated by us, he can neither be feared at home, nor observed abroad. Your punishment must be as public as your crime. It cannot be conceived but his majesty, in justice, in honour, in clemency, and in his royal tenderness, could have proceeded otherways than he has done. On the first of April it was published that Dr. Clark was dead: On the eleventh a Mandamus was directed to you, for choosing Mr. Farmer, On the ninth you presented a petition to the lord president; wherein you laid yourselves prostrate at his majesty's feet, representing to him the incapacity of Mr. Farmer, desiring the benefits of his gracious declaration for preserving your rights and properties, and beseeching him to nominate another person qualified according to your statutes, in the election of whom you would shew your ready obedience. So said and so done, gentlemen, had been very well.

"But immediately after the delivery of the Petition, you, not waiting his majesty's Answer, proceeded on April the 15th to an election of Dr. Hough: So that by this act, which was plainly contrary to his majesty's authority, whose mandate did certainly imply an inhibition, you directly confronted your former promises of ready obedience, and were resolved to give the king nothing but good words; When you had done this, as men of ill designs are always in haste, for a confirmation of it, you immediately went and surprized your visitor, and by that means persuaded him to confirm Dr. Hough, that very day he received an order from the lord president to the contrary.

"Upon this news the king was much amazed, and required an account of your proceedings; therefore the lords commissioners issued out a citation; and after hearing the plea, upon mature consultation with the learned of both laws, judged the pretended election of Dr. Hough to be void and null, and him to be removed, by an instrument dated the ——— which was affixed on the gate. After this a mandate was sent on the ——— to you to elect the bishop of Oxon. Upon which terms his majesty was graciously pleased to dispense with your disobedience hitherto. But this being disobeyed, his majesty in person, on the 4th of September, sent for you to Christ-Church, and required you immediately to elect the bishop of Oxon, president. You went strait to the chapel, a place one would think should have inspired more devotion and awe of his sacred majesty in you; and there contemptuously subscribed and signed a paper, directly thwarting his majesty's command. The ground of your disobedience you pretend that you could not elect him, whereas you could not but know by a written mandate, that lay by you, that admission would have satisfied his majesty. Conscience, the stale topic of rebellion, was here brought to vindicate your petulant and contumacious behaviour. You pretended that you were obliged by oaths, and I am sorry that at the same time you forgot that of allegiance. And indeed there is not a greater sign of hypocrisy than partial obedience. Had you any respect to the father of your country, and your mother the church, you would have sacrificed your pretended scruples, as a peace offering to the king. The best of us, I am sure, have reason to beg God and the king's pardon. But you, as if his majesty reigned by courtesy, would have a king under you, but none over you. You urged the observance of your statutes, of which, as it hath appeared, you have not been so constant observers, when your own humour prompts you to a dispensation, then you can readily embrace it; witness but that of being served 'per masculos,' by which great scandals have come to this society by reason of bastards.

"But when the king interposed, in whose power alone it is to dispense with them, then you presently act according to such methods as these. None of these pretences will ease you with wise and sober men.

"This was the only opposition his majesty in his progress received: Wherever his sacred majesty came, he worked a miraculous conversion, except in Oxford; and so far satisfied every one with the equity of his proceedings, that none went away discontented from his presence, unless it was for this reason, that they could not enjoy it any longer.

"October the 20th, We came down, and upon opening our commission, I took care to represent to you the heinousness of your offence, and to persuade you to a serious repentance; but all in vain.

"For on Saturday morning we required you to admit and instal the bishop of Oxford; which all, except three, refused: In the afternoon Dr. Hough having been deprived, and by us commanded to depart the college, came to us without any leave, but not without great attendance; circumstances, I think, much unbefitting a man pronounced expelled; and there entered a protestation against all that we had done, or hereafter should, as illegal, unjust and null; which he delivered not in writing, but by word of mouth; a thing repugnant to the nature of all appeals: and which was worse, without the usual salvo to his majesty's supreme power. When he had spoken it, there followed such a tumultuous, seditious and insolent hum, which if you yourselves had not applauded, or at least consented to, it was impossible but that you would have discovered some of those mutineers. However, since his carriage and language gave occasion to it, it was thought fit that he only should be obnoxious; and accordingly he was bound over.

"On Tuesday we ourselves caused the bishop of Oxon to be installed by his proxy; after which we proposed to you, whether being now installed, you would submit to him 'in licitis et honestis?' To which you gave an answer under your hands in the affirmative. You then also desired of us to represent your case favourably to his majesty, giving all assurance of your loyalty and obedience. But this assurance of submission lasted not long; for on Thursday, being required of us to subscribe such a submission to his majesty as we thought agreeable to our duty, you required time to consult of it; and after deliberation signed such a paper, which seemed rather to be a protestation against your former submission, than an acknowledgment of your crime.

Upon this we might justly then have proceeded to an expulsion: But we thought fit, in compassion to you, to take a journey to London, and acquaint his majesty with your disobedience and ungrateful behaviour. His Majesty was extremely amazed that his clemency should be despised; but yet, to your comforts be it spoken, his patience and goodness extends as far as your provocations can: But if you still persist in your obstinacy, those that are too tall to stand, and too stubborn to bend, deserve to be broken. And now, I think, I have said enough to let you know, that the fig leaves you have so artificially stitched together, are not sufficient to cover your nakedness: I wish to God you had the same tenderness for your concern, as his majesty's commissioners have for you. But if you still persist to oppose the royal power of the king, we, who are come to vindicate the right and honour of his majesty, resolve to discharge our consciences and duties to God and the king, without any respect of popularity; that is but the paradise of fools, and scorn of wise men: And therefore, as for us, we have no more regard to people's dislike, than what they dream. By reason therefore of your late hypocritical submission, the commissioners have thought fit, upon mature consideration, to draw up an instrument, which shall be read to you, to which, if you shall immediately subscribe, before you leave the room, we shall leave you to his majesty's pardon. And this we expect from you all, except Dr. Thomas Smith, and Mr. Charnock, with whose behaviour the king is so well satisfied, that he expects no more from them."

Then all the Fellows being called in, their lordships tendered a form of Submission to them to be signed: Which take as followeth:

"To the King's most Excellent Majesty.

"The humble Petition and Submission of the Fellows of St. Mary-Magdalen-college in the University of Oxon, whose Names are subscribed.

"We your Majesty's most humble Petitioners, have a deep sense of being justly fallen under your majesty's displeasure, for our disobedience and contempt to your majesty and to the authority of your majesty's commissioners and visitors: We do in all humility prostrate ourselves at your majesty's feet, humbly begging your pardon for our said offences, and promising that we will for the future behave ourselves more dutifully; and as a testimony thereof, we do acknowledge the authority of your majesty's said visitors, and the justice of their proceedings; and we do declare our entire submission to the lord bishop of Oxon, as our president."

To which Paper all (except Dr. Thomas Smith and Mr. Charnock) refused to subscribe.

Dr. Aldworth, as Vice-President, was first called in to sign the paper which had been read to all the fellows.

Vice-Pres. My lords, we desire time to consider of it, and to give our answer in writing.

Bishop Ch. No, you must every one sign, or refuse, as you are called.

Bar. Jenn. There is no answer to be given, but ay or no.

They all moved again for time, but it was refused.

Vice-Pres. My lords, this is the first time of my appearance before your lordships since your sitting here; and therefore I pray to be heard. My lords, I am as ready to comply with the king's pleasure as any man living; neither do I know that we have ever in this place been disobedient to the king, where it was in our power to obey his commands. Our founder, in the first clause of the oath we take at this election, has provided, that no one shall be president of his college, but who was bred in it, or in the college where he himself was bred. Now for us who have elected Dr. Hough, a person qualified according to our statutes, who has been installed, sworn, confirmed, and approved of in all the ways and manner prescribed in the statutes; for us, my lords, to accept and admit of a stranger, and a foreigner, in his place, is, to the best of my understanding, a giving up the rights of the college to other uses than the founder designed it.

Here he was interrupted.

Bishop Ch. Your statutes are over-ruled by the king's authority.

Vice-Pres. My lords, your lordships sit here as the visitors; which implies, there are certain laws and statutes we are bid to observe, and by which we are to be governed; and if it shall appear to your lordships that we have acted conformably to these statutes, I hope we shall neither incur the king's displeasure nor your lordships. The whole tenor of our statutes run, that we should inviolably maintain our rights, and observe the rules of our founder; he has laid his curse upon us, if we vary from them. [Here he repeated the words of the founder. 'Or'dinamus sub pœnâ anathematis et indigna'tionis omnipotentis Dei, &c. Item sub
'interminatione Divini Judicis interdicimus.']

Bishop Ch. Are you not to obey the king as well as the founder's statutes?

Vice-Pres. My lord, I ever did obey the king, and ever will: Our statutes, which we are sworn to observe, are confirmed by several kings and queens before and since the reformation, and as we keep them, are agreeable to the king's laws both ecclesiastical and civil; and so long as we live up to them, we obey the king.

Bishop Ch. Your statutes were never confirmed by his present majesty.

Dr. John Smith. My lord, neither have they been repealed by his majesty; and what is not repealed is confirmed.

Then their lordships pressing to sign or refuse, the Vice-President said:

Vice-Pres. My lords, I will then deal plainly, in regard to my oath and the statutes to the right of all our successors and of Dr. Hough, whom I believe to have been as fairly elected, and as legally possessed as ever any since the foundation of the college: I cannot submit to the bishop of Oxon as president.

So he was ordered to withdraw.

Then the same question was put to all the other fellows singly, who all refused to sign the submission, except Dr. Thomas Smith and Mr. Charnock, who were not pressed, for the reason above.

Mr. Thompson being called in to sign the paper, said:

Mr. Thompson. My lords, I have been always obedient to his majesty's commands; I was not concerned in the election of Dr. Hough: I voted for Mr. Farmer, and am ready to submit to the bishop of Oxon.

Bishop Ch. Did you not put your hand to this petition? Is not this your hand?—Read the petition—[It was read.]—In which the fellows desired his majesty to nominate any qualified person, and to retract his mandate granted for Mr. Farmer.

Mr. Thompson. My lord, I conceive the petition not to be disobedient. We had not yet received the mandate; as soon as it came, I humbled myself.

Bar. Jenner. Then why cannot you humble yourself again; is there any hurt in it?

Mr. Thompson. This paper requires me to own my disobedience to his majesty: I am not conscious of any, and therefore I cannot subscribe.

After a short time, all who refused to sign the Submission were called in, and by sentence of their lordships, expelled the college for contempt, &c. (except as before.) After Sentence, all that were expelled spoke to this effect: 'My lords, we profess all duty to the king, and respect to your lordships, but must beg leave to declare; That we think ourselves injured in your lordships' proceedings, and therefore protest against them, and shall use all just and legal ways of being relieved.'

After a short time, an Instrument was fixed on the College-gates, in these words:

'By his Majesty's Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Causes, &c. particularly authorized and impowered to visit St. Mary-Magdalene College; in the University of Oxon.

'Whereas, in our visitation of the said college, it appeareth unto us, That Doctor Charles Aldworth, Dr. Alexander Pudsey, Dr. John Smith, Dr. Thomas Bailey, Dr. Thomas Stafford, Mr. Robert Almond, Mr. Manwaring Hamond, Mr. John Rogers, Mr. Richard Strickland, Mr. Henry Dobson, Mr. James Bailey, Mr. John Davies, Mr. Francis Bagshaw, Mr. James Fayrer, Mr. Joseph Harwar, Mr. Thomas Bateman, Mr. George Hunt, Mr. William Cradock, Mr. John Gill-

‘man, Mr. George Fulham, Mr. Charles Pennyston, Mr. Robert Hyde, Mr. John Yerbury, Mr. Robert Holden, and Mr. Stephen Wilks, fellows of the same college, have been severally guilty of disobedience to his majesty’s commands, and obstinately contemned his royal authority, and do still persist in the same: we have thought fit, upon mature consideration thereof, to declare, pronounce, and decree, That the said Dr. Charles Aldworth, &c. and every of them, be deprived and expelled from their respective fellowships. And we do by this our sentence and decree, deprive and expel them of and from their said several and respective fellowships. Given under our seal, this 16th day of Nov. 1687.’

Whitehall, December 10, 1687.

‘His majesty’s commissioners for ecclesiastical causes, and for visiting all cathedral and collegiate churches and colleges, &c. met this day; and taking into their consideration all that had passed in the business of St. Mary-Magdalen college in Oxford, and the contemptuous and disobedient behaviour of Dr. John Hough, and several of the fellows of that college throughout the whole proceeding, their lordships declared, decreed, and pronounced, That Dr. Hough, Dr. Charles Aldworth, Dr. Henry Fairfax, Dr. Alexander Pudsey, Dr. John Smith, Dr. Thomas Bailey, Dr. Thomas Stafford, Mr. Robert Almond, Mr. Manwaring Hamond, Mr. John Rogers, Mr. Richard Strickland, Mr. Henry Dobson, Mr. James Bailey, Mr. John Davies, Mr. Francis Bagshaw, Mr. James Fayrer, Mr. Joseph Harwar, Mr. Thomas Bateman, Mr. George Hunt, Mr. William Cradock, Mr. John Gillman, Mr. George Fulham, Mr. Charles Pennyston, Mr. Robert Hyde, Mr. Edward Yerbury, Mr. Henry Holden, and Mr. Stephen Wilks, should be incapable of receiving, or being admitted to any ecclesiastical dignity, benefice, or promotion: And such of them who are not yet in holy orders, were adjudged incapable of receiving or being admitted into the same. All archbishops, bishops, and other ecclesiastical officers and ministers within the kingdom of England, being required to take notice of the said sentence and decree, and to yield obedience thereunto.’

The 17th of January, 1688, being the day that the thirty demies of Magdalen college were, by summons from the bishop of Oxon, the now president, commanded to appear before him; and none appearing, Mr. Charnock, the new vice-president, called for the buttery-book, and struck out the names of

Mr. Holt, Mr. Adams senior, Mr. Vesey, and Mr. Brabourn, masters of art; Mr. Hyde, Mr. Woodward, Mr. Fulham, Mr. Watkins, Mr. Stacy, Mr. Sherwin, and Mr. Kenton, bachelors of art; Mr. Cross, Mr. Bush, and Mr. Wells, under-graduates; which fourteen were then resident in the university, and three more, who escaped expulsion at that time.*

Afterwards, when the king had certain intelligence of the prince of Orange’s design, viz. October 12, 1688, he ordered the bishop of Winchester, visitor of Magdalen college, to settle that society regularly and statutely; accordingly, October 16, the bishop of Winchester caused a citation to be fixed on the gate of the college, to recal Dr. Hough, and the former fellows of this society, by the 2nd of November following; but an account coming that post of the prince of Orange’s fleet being disabled by a storm, the bishop was recalled to London, and the restoration of the college put off: but when it appeared that the fleet was ready to sail again, then the business of the college was resumed, and effected Nov. 24.

For other instances of this king’s arbitrary and foolish attempts to force Papists into stations of rank, wealth and power, in the universities, see Dr. Peachell’s Case in this Collection, vol. 11, p. 1316.

The following passage is from Nash’s Hist. of Worcestershire:

“In the year 1687, when the king made his progress through part of England, the bishop sent his servant to Bath, to invite his majesty to his palace at Worcester, where he had the honour of entertaining him the 23d day of August, the eve of St. Bartholomew. He met him at the gate of his palace, attended by his clergy, and in a short Latin speech, welcomed him to the city. His majesty walked upon a large-piece of white broad cloth of the manufacture of the city, all strewed with flowers, which reached from the palace gate to the stairs leading up the great hall: as he went along he said, "My lord, this looks like Whitehall." Having refreshed himself after his journey, he went to see the cathedral, the dean attending his majesty to the college gate, from whence he went to see the curiosities of the town, and among the rest, was shewn where the battle was fought between Oliver and his royal brother, who from thence made a narrow escape; his majesty being forced to alight from his horse to get into Sidbury gate, and a cry being made for a horse to remount the king, one Mr. Wm. Bagnal, who then lived in Sidbury, turned out his own horse ready saddled, upon which his majesty fled through St. Martin's gate, and so to Boscobel, to a daughter of Mr. Bagnal. Dr. Thomas, when dean of Worcester, married his eldest son.

"The next morning being the feast of St. Bartholomew, the king went to hear mass at the popish chapel, built at his accession to the crown, on the east side of the Foregate-street, attended by the mayor and aldermen, whom, when they came to the gate of the chapel, his majesty asked, if they would not go in with him; to which the mayor with a becomingspirit replied, "I think we have attended your majesty too far already." This worthy magistrate, who preferred his religion, and duty to his country, to every other consideration, should have had his name recorded in letters of gold: I have taken some pains to find out who it was, and believe it to be either Thomas Bearcroft or Thomas Shirwin, the former was elected by the new charter, the latter by the old charter restored. Upon this answer made by the mayor, the king went into the popish chapel; and the mayor, with all the Protestants who attended him, went to the college church, where, when divine service was ended, the bishop waited on his majesty till dinner came in, and the meat being set upon the table, he offered to say grace; upon which the king was pleased to say, he would spare him that trouble, for he had a chaplain of his own, upon which the good old man withdrew, not without tears in his eyes."

AN ACCOUNT OF THE PROCEEDINGS AT MAGDALEN COLLEGE, OXON, 1687.

HEARING from Dr. Ironside,† then vice-chancellor of Oxford, and others, that they had met with a report that I had endeavoured to get the king's mandate for the Presidentship of the college, then vacant by the death of Dr. Clarke, I replied, that I had as good a pretention (it may be without the least guilt of immodesty) as any other, and that I knew so well how the presidentship had been disposed of by the kings and queens of England, that I saw no ill or indecency in such an application. But the whole affair in short lies thus:

My friend and colleague, Dr. Younger, came to my lodging at Charing-cross, London, on Easter eve the 26th March 1687, about ten of the clock, just as I was going to bed, to acquaint me, that that evening a messenger came to him from my lady Shuttleworth, in Lancashire, to let him know that her father, Dr. Clarke, died at her house a few days before, and that this was a secret, and to be made use of accordingly. I told him that the lady — by this quick and speedy message designed to pay him a particular respect and kindness, as being her father's intimate and dear friend, and that by all means he should procure by the interest of princess Anne, whose domestic chaplain he was and is still, the king's recommendatory letters to the college, which would put the matter out of all possible doubt and question, this being consonant to the often repeated advice I had given him long before of looking after the presidentship whenever it should be vacant by Dr. Clarke's resignation (which once he was inclinable enough to have done in favour of Dr. Younger) or by his death, he growing in years and becoming very crasy.

* In one of the pages of it, is the following memorandum: "This book was transcribed from a MS. in Dr. Smith's own hand-writing, partly by cousin John Smith, son to my cousin George Smith, esq. of Barn-hall, Durham."

† I believe he was warden of Wadham college, and, after the Revolution, bishop successively of Bristol and Hereford.

But the doctor told me, no; that he had thought often seriously upon it, and now more especially; that such a kind of life did not suit with his genius; that he should be happy enough without it when the living of Bishopston should fall by the death of the incumbent, who was then about fourscore years of age; that he also absolutely refused meddling with it and stirring for it, and then advised me to look after the presidentship, and to use my interest in court to procure it and take time by the foretop. I thanked him for his information and advice as the effect of a long and dear friendship between us, and told him, that it was now late at night: that the next morning being Easter-day I intended to receive the Eucharist in Whitehall chappel; that that day was too sacred and solemn to do any business in, however, that after I had performed my devotion, I would then reflect on his advice and consider what was best to be done.

On Monday morning the 28th of March, I went to Thistleworth to Dr. Parker, bishop of Oxford, with whom I had then and several years before an intimate acquaintance, to desire him to go to London, and to represent me to the king, and acquaint him with his knowledge of me. I found him not well, and he assured me that he could not go that little journey without great inconvenience, but said he, I will write for you, and that will be as well. So I being in haste to return to London, he retired immediately to write the letter which he said he would give me. After about half an hour he brings me a letter directed to his landlord where he had lately lodged dwelling in the Haymarket, saying when he gave it me, there is another letter enclosed; you must not know or enquire to whom it is directed. This if any thing will be effectual, nor would he ever tell me afterwards, who the person was to whom he wrote, though I learned it not long after by a mere accident. After 3 or 4 days I went to Thistleworth a second time to know what answer he had to his letter; for I was not to stir or say any thing of the business 'till I heard from him. He then told me, that he was not my competitor, notwithstanding the noise of the town, that the king would make him president. That the king expected that the person he recommended should be favourable to his religion, and then asked me what I would do, or could do therein? I replied, my lord, I pray acquaint the king, that if his majesty shall please to recommend me to the College I will make it my business to advance piety and learning, to keep men dutiful and obedient to his person and government, and truly loyal, and to promote true Catholic Christianity: and I hope, said I, the king will require no more of me; for this is all I can do: He answered me, This I assure you will not do. I said to him, Then let who will take the presidentship for me, I will look no more after it; you are the only person I have addressed to about it. I prayed him upon his next going to court to acquaint the king with the answer I made, and to assure his majesty of my unalterable loyalty, whether he should think fit to recommend me or otherwise. After this I made no address in the least to any person, either in the court or out of it, about this matter, as having been fully convinced by the discourse which I had with bishop Parker, that all future attempts, as things then stood, would be vain and to no purpose.

April 5th. I went over to wait upon my lord archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth; after dinner his grace came to me, standing by the window, and spake to me in these words; Doctor, will the presidentship of your college fall into your hands? I answered, No, my lord, I do not expect it. I shall never agree to the conditions. He replied, What conditions? I said again in general terms only, (without mentioning the discourse I had had a few days before with bishop Parker) I know very well, what I say to your grace; then said he, without asking any further question, well Doctor, I know you are an honest man. May you have your reward, if not in this world; yet God is a good paymaster. So he left me, and went to other company.

AN IMPARTIAL RELATION OF THE ELECTION OF A PRESIDENT OF ST. MARY MAGDALEN COL-LEGE, OXON, IN APRIL 1687, AND THE FOL-LOWING VISITATION.

On Sunday, 10th April 1687, in the afternoon, Mr. Francis Bagshaw one of our fellows came to me by order of the vice-president and fellows then at home to my lodging at Charing Cross, with a petition to the king, which he immediately put into my hands, and of which I took a copy. [Here follows the Petition as given in the preceding report.]

This Petition had no date, but was written and subscribed the day before, Mr. Bagshaw telling me that he and the servant sent up with him, rode a good part of the night to reach London the next day in good time.

Upon my reading the petition, I told him, it seemed to me in several points defective; however I would sign it with all my heart, and immediately did so; and then telling him that understanding by him he was to do nothing without my advice and direction, my advice and opinion was, that he and I should present our petition to the king that evening, either as he went to, or came from the cabinet council, whereupon he produced an order from the vice-president and fellows that he should deliver it to my lord president the earl of Sunderland, with a letter from the bishop of Winchester to him, at which I could not but express a hearty sorrow.

In obedience to this order we went immediately to my lord Sunderland's lodgings: and he having then newly dined, we were admitted, and acquainting him with our business: We gave him our petition and the visitor's letter. I told him the gentleman with me with a sword by his side was a fellow of the college, and that the college, raising a company upon Monmouth's invasion, we chose him captain of it, to whom the king had given a commission, which was countersigned by his lordship. I asked him when we should wait upon him again for an answer, he told us, on Tuesday morning, and so we were dismissed.

The next day 11th (Monday) meeting with my friend sir Theodore de Vaux, I prevailed with him to go and sup with my lord chancellor Jefferies that night, and by a side wind question, beginning as it were an accidental discourse about the college which was the common argument of discourse, not only in the court but all the town over, to learn of him what was the fate of our petition. My lord, said he, I hear the fellows of Magdalen College have petitioned the king about their election, and against Mr. Farmer, recommended to be their president. He replied, No such matter, they are too proud to petition. I was at the council last night before the king came, and stayed till after he left it, there was no petition either mentioned or produced. When I heard this from sir Theodore de Vaux I was amazed, and began to fear that my lord Sunderland had suppress our petition.

On Tuesday morning the 12th Mr. Bagshaw and I went to my lord Sunderland's lodgings, and having sent in our names by one of his servants, he told us that his lord would have us come the next day.

On Wednesday morning the 13th Mr. Bagshaw and I went, and Dr. Jessop his lordship's chaplain accompanied us: and after some little stay we were called in, and my lord Sunderland spoke to us in these words: 'Sir, I have delivered the bishop of Winchester's letter and your address to the king: the king has sent down his letter to the college, and expects to be obeyed, adding he had nothing more to say.' Before I went down into the stone gallery, after we had left him, I put down his very words in my table book whilst they were fresh in my memory. Coming to Whitehall gate I advised Mr. Bagshaw to go out of town that afternoon, and carry back this answer to the college, which he promised me to do. For my own part I could not resolve on a sudden what I should do. So we took leave of Dr. Jessop. He and I went into the park to consider what was best for me to do, whether go or stay; for I had heard that the fellows were resolved to proceed to election on Friday the 15th. I was not bound to be present, it was enough that I was summoned in the general citation on the chapel door, nor was there any danger of being absent (and several were absent at the election) besides at that time my distemper of gravel was heavy upon me, but reflecting that Mr. Bagshaw might not for some reasons, I began to admit, go directly to the college, and that it would have been turned upon me, that not hearing of any answer from the king, they went to election. I resolved to return to Oxford the next day Thursday the 14th, in the flying coach, which I effected not without difficulty. Upon my coming home late about nine at night, I enquired for Mr. Bagshaw; who was not, I was told, then returned, or at least his return was concealed from me: (for he did not appear till the next morning) the account of which surprised me, and reconciled the difficulty, as it proved in my circumstances, of that day's journey to me.

I walked in the cloisters till about 10 that night, resolving to speak with the vice president and several of the senior fellows who were in the town. Upon their return I acquainted them with the earl of Sunderland's answer; which one of them desired me then not to mention to the juniors. I fully perceived by their discourse that they were resolved to elect the next morning, and they told me as much very plainly. On Friday morning 15th of April, the porter came to me in the name of and by the authority of the vice-president, to warn me to the election of a president, and to give me notice that the sacrament would be administered before it.

Soon after the Vice-President came to my chamber to discourse me about our great affair, and to know what I would do; I told him very frankly what I thought ought to be done in our present circumstances, and that it was most adviseable to petition the king a second time, and that I would read a paper which I had prepared that morning to the same purpose, publicly before all the Fellows. He said the advice was good, and that though as Vice-President he needed not to vote, till we all had voted, yet to shew his readiness, he would vote in the first place for it. Soon after, having put on my surplice and hood, I went to the chapel. As soon as all the Fellows then at home were come together, the vice president in the entrance, just within the quire, hard by his seat, the company promiscuously standing about him, addressed himself to me, saying; That he had read the king's letter to the Fellows when I was absent at London, where I had been ever since the 19th of February, and that he would read it again for my satisfaction, which I desired him to do, and it was done accordingly. After which he said to me, Dr. Smith, pray acquaint us with the answer that his majesty was pleased to return to our petition; which I told him not long before in my chamber, that it was absolutely necessary for me so to do, having been employed by them as a body of men; with which resolution he was very well satisfied. Whereupon I told them that to prevent all mistakes, I would read it out of a paper, which contained these very words:

'Gentlemen; I find myself obliged to acquaint you all at this solemn meeting, what I told the Vice-President and several of the Fellows last night; that waiting with Mr. Bagshaw (Dr. Jessop being also in our company), upon my lord Sunderland, on Wednesday morning last, according to his lord-

‘ ship’s appointment, to know what answer his ‘ majesty was pleased to return to the petition
 ‘ of the College, delivered by us to his lordship
 ‘ on Sunday afternoon, April the 10th; he told ‘ us, that he had delivered the bishop of Win‘ chester’s letter and our address (for so he was ‘ pleased to call it) to the king; that the king ‘ had sent his letter to the College, and that he ‘ expected to be obeyed; adding, that he his ‘ lordship had nothing more to say.

‘ THOMAS SMITH.

‘ St. Mary Magdalen College, Oxon, 15th
 ‘ April, 1687.

This done, I desired that I might read another paper which I held in my hand, and which is as follows word for word :

‘ Gentlemen; It is my opinion, (for I will ‘ not pretend to call it by any other name ‘ much less by that of advice, leaving every ‘ one here present the liberty of his own judgment) that his majesty not having thought ‘ fit upon our late application to him to revoke ‘ his royal mandate; nor, as we pray in the ‘ close of our petition, to leave us to our own ‘ choice according to the direction of our ‘ founder’s statutes; nor to recommend such a
 ‘ one as may be more serviceable to his majesty and to the College; we most humbly ‘ petition the king again, and represent the several respects referred to in our petition, ‘ which render Mr. Farmer incapable of being ‘ elected and admitted President. This method
 ‘ and procedure being most prudent and dutiful, and fit to be entered upon immediately;
 ‘ the king having interposed his royal pleasure
 ‘ and authority, which if it had not been done,
 ‘ I readily acknowledge, that we not only ‘ might but ought to proceed to the election of ‘ a President in this very instant according to
 ‘ the express letter of the statute, in every particular. But for this let every one concerned be his own casuist. These are my ‘ private thoughts, and upon mature deliberation, I conclude that I should be very defective in my duty to the king, and in my ‘ respect to you, whatever misinterpretation
 ‘ possibly some may frame of them, if I had ‘ not made you acquainted with them at this ‘ meeting.

THOMAS SMITH, D. D.

‘ St. Mary Magdalen College, April 15, 1687.’

Having read my two papers, I bid Mr. Almont, steward of the college, and public notary, then present, to take notice of what I had done.

The Vice President then proposed to the company whether they would petition the king again, and defer the election; and first and before all declared himself to be of that judgment, and so the two next senior fellows, Dr. Fairfax, Dr. Pudsey and myself. All the rest were for present election. Thus the generality carrying it for a present election, several hot debates arose about the king’s letter, and horrible rude reflections were made upon the king’s authority, that he had nothing to do in our affair, and things of a far worse nature and consequence. Upon which I told one of them that the spirit of Ferguson had got into him, but there was no prevailing upon them by reason and argument. The Vice President proposed how they would manage the election, whether according to the direction of the statute by scrutiny upon oath, or viva voce, as was used, when the late president was recommended by king Charles the 2nd to the College, and when fellows have been received into the society by virtue of the king’s letters; which indeed was our constant practice during king Charles the 2nd’s reign after the restoration, and was done but some few months before in the case of Mr. Charnock, and Mr. Peniston; whereas we are as much bound by the letter of the statute to choose a fellow by oaths as a president. When it came to my turn to vote in the order of my course, the senior always voting first, I told them that I persisted in my former judgment that it became them in duty to petition the king again, and not precipitate an election, for several reasons, which I then alledged; only two were for electing viva voce: all the rest for electing by scrutiny. This point being gained, I foreseeing the consequences of this hasty and undue election, desired the vice president to give me leave to go away immediately, for that it was clearly my opinion and judgment that we lying under a restraint by his majesty’s letter (abstracting from the consideration of the person recommended therein) might, without the guilt of the breach of the Founder’s statutes, defer the election for some time. But the vice president would not grant me leave to depart, which I bid the public notary take notice of. One of the senior fellows told me that I would be expelled if I refused to go to an election, and others said, that I would at least run the hazard of expulsion, if I offered to go away, whereupon I stayed, though I perceived afterwards that Mr. Charnock, who by this time was a declared Papist, and Mr. Thomson who at that time was one of the band of pensioners, at Whitehall, quitted the chapel and retired at that time. The election of a president in this solemn manner being resolved upon, the fellows soon after took their seats (for hitherto we stood all promiscuously together or running to and fro in a tumultuous manner) and one of the senior fellows, supplying the place of the dean of Divinity, who was absent, went up to the altar and began the communion service. After the sacrament was ended, several went into the outward chapel to unrobe themselves, and myself among the rest, which the vice president observing said, Whoever goes out is to return hither upon pain of expulsion, and I meeting in the outward chapel with Dr. Fairfax, he said to me in the way of friendly advice that it was not safe for me to go away.

After all were returned into the inner chapel the vice president standing in his seat read the statute of the Founder ‘de electione presidentis,’ and the statute of the land as is required at elections, and administered the oath laid down in the college statutes to the senior fellow of all ; who being sworn, the four next seniors, of which I was one, being called to be sworn, I said, Mr. Vice President, you require me to take the oath and I must obey ; he replied that the statute obligeth you, not I. The oath was taken by all but the two above-mentioned, who, after the communion was over, returned. The two senior fellows who were to take the scrutiny, being sworn again, they went up to the altar, and there received the suffrages of those who had been sworn, secretly in writing ; and after a little time, two of the nominated, having the major part of the votes of the fellows present, which is a necessary qualification appointed by the statute, which were Mr. Hough and Mr. Maynard, the thirteen seniors, who are to elect one of the two thus nominated, proceeded to a second scrutiny : and Mr. Hough had all the votes of the electors but one, and his own : for by reason of the absence of several of the actual seniors, he came into that number : and accordingly he was declared and pronounced duly elected president of the college. Thus the election was finished at that meeting, after we had been in the chappel almost five hours.

It was ordered at the meeting, just after the election was over, that Mr. Maynard should accompany the president elect to Farnham, according to the direction of the statute to be presented, admitted and sworn by the bishop of Winchester our visitor. An instrument about the election was drawn up in the afternoon and sealed with the college seal : and in the evening they began their journey to Farnham, about 36 miles from Oxford. Upon their arrival there, they met with quick dispatch, the visitor telling them, as Mr. Maynard upon his return told me, that he admired their courage ; and an instrument of the president's being admitted and sworn before him, the next day (16th) being drawn up with all possible haste, to prevent any inhibition that might come from the king, which was both expected and feared, they returned to the college on Sunday morning the 17th of April. In the afternoon the president was again sworn and installed in the chappel, and soon after took possession of the lodgings.

It was thought necessary in order to maintain this election, and to keep off the king's displeasure, to address to the duke of Ormond, whose chaplain Mr. Hough had the honour to be, that he would use his interest with the king and intercede for the college. A letter was accordingly drawn up, dated April 19th, 1687, and sent to him in the country, of which I was wholly ignorant, much less did I subscribe it, though it appears by the very letter, which the duke of Ormond sent up to court, that they very knavishly and basely foisted my name into the subscriptions of the fellows, which fourbery I did not discover till I read the letter with the subscriptions, printed by Dr. Johnston in his Vindication of the King's Vindictorial Power about a year after, p. 11, 12, 13, which was matter of amazement to me. Besides that they all knew, if I had been spoken to, I should never have consented, several things contained in it being contrary to my express declaration and judgment. I did not vote for Mr. Hough at all, either in the first nomination or after scrutiny, but being upon oath, first named two others, whom I believed and knew to be better qualified : of the two named, which had the majority of all the fellows present, one of which was necessarily to be chosen, I was for the other ; strictly herein following the dictates of my judgment and conscience, according to the oath I had then newly taken, as a senior fellow and a new elector.

About the 23d of April, a letter written two days before, 21st April, came from my lord Sunderland directed to the fellows of the college, requiring us in the king's name to give an account of what had passed at the election the week before, and whether the king's letter mandatory had not been delivered before the election of Mr. Hough. To this an answer was framed, to which I told them I could not subscribe, nor approve of the case drawn up, in several of the particulars alleged : and therefore I desired to be wholly unconcerned for the future, as I really was, in this troublesome business, which might have been prevented by our petitioning the king a second time ; and upon the reading both of the letter and case, I bid Mr. Almont our steward and public notary take notice, that I disliked several things both in the one and the other, and before him and in the presence of the fellows in the chequer, publicly interposed my dissent. After this I refused to be present at other meetings which were had about petitioning the king. A petition, I heard, was drawn up to be presented to the king, and the president and three or four of the fellows with him, went up on Wednesday 27th April, to deliver it.

About the 6th of June, I asked leave to be absent for some time from the college, and went to London ; where I continued extremely afflicted for the troubles brought upon the college by this hasty election : nor would my curiosity carry me to Whitehall to be present at the several times the fellows were summoned to appear by his majesty's commissioners for ecclesiastical causes, and for the visitation of the universities, sitting at Whitehall, though one or other of the fellows would come to my lodgings, and give me a particular account of their proceedings, which no way concerned me to relate.

After above four months stay at London, during the great contests between the king and the college, hearing for certain that there would be commissioners sent down to Oxford to visit the college, where every fellow would be peremptorily cited to appear under severe penalties : I thought it became me both in point of duty and prudence to return : and accordingly I got home to the college, October 14th.

Wednesday, 19th October, an instrument was affixed both upon the outward gate of the college, and that of the chappel, peremptorily citing Dr. Hough and all the fellows to appear before the three commissioners, the bishop of Chester, lord chief justice Wright, and baron Jenner, on Friday morning at 9 o'clock in the chappel of the said college.

On Thursday afternoon, October 20th, the commissioners came to town, being attended with three troops of horse of the regiment of the earl of Peterborough, then quartered at Oxford. Friday, 21st October, the commissioners came down to the college, and were received at the gates (which were a little before thrown wide open) by all of us, and they went directly to the chapel, but there being no conveniences there, and preparations not being made according to their mind, they adjourned to the college-hall. Then Mr. Tucker the register read the commission, which being done, the names of the president and fellows were called over: Dr. Fairfax only absent of the fellows which were in town. The names of those absent from the university were noted, excuses made by several in their behalf for such their absence: the commissioners asking where they were, and what distance from Oxford. This took up some time. Afterwards the bishop of Chester, who was first in the commission, made a speech, which being over, they adjourned the court till two in the afternoon, and so went to prayers. Afternoon they called over the names of the rest of the college, demys, chaplains, &c. After this Dr. Hough demanded a copy of their commission, which was denied him, and several discourses happened hereupon between them and him, about the order of the commissioners at London vacating and annulling his election. Then our petition was read, which was delivered by me and Mr. Bagshaw to the earl of Sunderland on the 10th of April, and discourses upon it. The commissioners ordered us to fetch the buttery book, the statute book, the registers and leiger books, to bring in an accompt of the standing revenue of the college, and what monies have been levied for fines for these two last years, and what land or estate given for hospitality, which has not been applied for that use. They bid us deal ingenuously with them, for they would deal fairly by us.

Adjourned to the next day, 9 of the morning, to the common room, where all the other meetings of the court were held. Saturday, 22d October, we were all soon bid to withdraw: then the president was called in by himself, where after some debate, as he told us, he was admonished to deliver up the keys of the lodgings, which he refusing to do was ordered to withdraw, and after some little time we were all called in together. Dr. Cartwright the bishop of Chester, admonished Dr. Hough three times to depart the college peaceably, to deliver up the keys, and to quit all further pretensions to the presidentship. He replied, that he would not deliver up his keys, no, not to the bishop of Winchester, that he had never been cited, and could not be turned out of his freehold. They answered him that he had been cited as fellow, and that he was never owned by them as president, the election having been declared null. He still persisting, Mr. Leigh, proctor for the king, desiring sentence of their lordships against Dr. Hough, for his contempt and contumacy. The said bishop of Chester proceeded in these words:

'Dr. Hough; by virtue of the king's authority, and a sentence passed at London by the lords commissioners for ecclesiastical affairs, we deprive you of the president's place, and order you to depart the college presently: and we order also your name to be struck out of the Buttery book.' Afterwards Dr. Fairfax was called in by himself. Soon after all the fellows; the king's letters mandatory for admitting the bishop of Oxford president were read. The fellows were asked in these words whether they would obey the king's mandate for the bishop of Oxford to be president. Dr. Fairfax, who did not appear the day before being under a suspension, said nothing. Dr. Pudsey demurred at first, and said that he would submit to the king, though he could not admit but would be present at the admission, my answer in my turn was, word for word this, as I put it down there in the room in my note book: 'My lords commissioners, if it be the king's pleasure to make the bishop of Oxford president, and that your lordships acting by that authority have declared him such, I do, because I must, submit. I make no opposition.' All the rest refused, saying that it was against the statutes and their oath; and would not, except Mr. Charnock and Mr. Thomson. The commissioners put down every fellow's answer in writing. It was said then, that Dr. Hough had been examined in private, whereupon they told us that it was only for the greater convenience to themselves, and us; but that they did nothing, but what they would let all the world know, and so they read Dr. Hough's answer. Then they said to us, if you think that we have not taken your answers right, put them in writing yourselves against the afternoon, to which time they adjourned.

Saturday afternoon. The court being sat, Dr. Hough came to the table, and after a little while said to the commissioners, 'Whereas your lordships in the morning have deprived me of my freehold, and have struck my name off the Buttery book, I do protest against your proceedings as illegal, unjust, and null; and do appeal to our sovereign lord the king in his courts of justice.' Upon which there was a great hum, which put the commissioners out of all patience, who had before treated us with all imaginable candour and gentleness, saying that they would never suffer the king's authority to be thus affronted, and ordered the guilty persons to be apprehended; but the crowd being great and the noise coming from behind, no one could be discovered. The chief justice Wright saying that he would defend the king's authority while he had blood in his body, and then telling Dr. Hough he was the cause of this rude behaviour, by his popular protest which he might have made in the morning, that he had broken the king's peace, that now he had brought in the civil power over us, that if need were he would use the military, that he would make him answer this affront done to the king's authority in the King's-bench court, and therefore require sureties for his appearance there the following term, and for his good behaviour, Mr. R. Clerke of Eyfley, and Mr. Holden fellow of the college, were bound in 500*l.* each, and himself in 1,000*l.*; all the fellows disowned the great rudeness, and proferred their oaths upon it. Then a letter was shewed to Dr. Pudsey, written by him in the name of the society in August, being an answer to a letter of the earl of Sunderland about the king's mandate for the admission of the bishop of Oxford president, which he owned, and all who were then present at the writing of it, that the president's place was full, that they could not admit any other, further adding, that they could not depart from that letter. The court then adjourned till Tuesday morning, saying that they would give us time till then to consider, and that if upon better advice and deliberation the fellows would retract, they would not surprize them.

Tuesday the 25th October. The Lord Chief Justice had in a former meeting given it for law, that the king's mandate for another, had in it the force of an inhibition (which was the clear judgment and declaration of Dr. Aylworth, chancellor of the diocese of Oxford, in a discourse upon this point in my chamber not long before) Dr. Stafford offered a paper by way of answer, which only he and Dr. Fairfax subscribed, all the rest of the fellows who withdrew into the hall to consider of it, and subscribe it if they thought fit, by the order of the commissioners, refusing to put their names to it. Afterwards Dr. Stafford, being made sensible of the dangerous consequences of that paper, desired that he might withdraw it, which the court at last granted, though not without some difficulty, Dr. Hedges the king's advocate interposing. Soon after the bishop of Oxford's proxy was read, and the king's letters mandatory to the visitors for his admission into the presidentship, the first asked Dr. Pudsey whether he would install the bishop of Oxford president by proxy, his chaplain Mr. Wickins appearing for him, he said he would not engage in it. I being the next senior then present, the bishop of Chester asked me the same question. I read my answer which I had put down in my almanack just before, and which I held in my hand, easily foreseeing what the commissioners aimed at, by their foregoing procedure, that it might not be mistaken or misreported, and it was word for word this :

' My Lords Commissioners, I answer with all humble and dutiful submission to the king's majesty's authority and your lordships visita-

' torial power, that it is not in my power to do this ; your lordships, who have deprived Dr. Hough, and have declared the bishop of Oxford President, may install him : this method being altogether new and extraordinary I cannot be satisfied how I can or ought to be the executioner of your lordship's sentence ; besides I beg leave to propose a short case to your lordships, Whether, and how I can install or give possession without being impowered and authorized by a rule out of the high court of Chancery or King's-bench for my security if there were nothing of conscience in the case.' The chief justice answered me that they acting by authority under the broad seal had the power of those courts, I humbly begged their pardon and demurred. Upon this immediately the bishop of Chester said, Come let us adjourn to the chappel presently, and accordingly they went and installed Mr. Wickins in the president's seat, who took the oath of the founder and the oaths of allegiance and supremacy ; all of us in this interval walking in the cloysters, except Mr. Charnock, who was the only person, as I found upon enquiry, present at the installation. Then they went to the president's lodgings which they found locked, upon which they returned to the common room, ordering in the mean while one of their officers to go for a smith to break open the door, the smith coming, the scholars of which the cloysters were full told him that if he did it, he would be hanged, and so drove him thence towards the back gate. The commissioners returning to the common room, proposed this question to every fellow, will you submit to the bishop of Oxford now installed president by virtue of the king's mandate. Dr. Fairfax refused, and said that he neither would nor could. Dr. Pudsey said that he would submit. My Answer was word for word this, which I had written down in my little note book and read :

' My Lords Commissioners ;

' I own from my heart and acknowledge the king's supremacy. I do now and always will pay all dutifull and humble obedience to his majesty's authority, and this out of a principle of conscience and loyalty, as becomes a priest of the Catholic and Apostolic Church of England established by law. I have made no exception to the legality of your lordship's commission nor to the exercise of it in this present visitation. I am ready and willing to obey in licitis et honestis the president whom the king has been pleased to constitute president whenever he shall come and reside in the college.'

Dr. Bayley desired time till the afternoon, and so did the rest to give in their answer, which the court readily allowed, and so adjourned.

Then the Commissioners went themselves to the door of the lodging, and having a smith with them forced it open, entered, and gave Mr. Wickins possession for the bishop of Oxford, and from thence went to their respective lodgings.

Tuesday afternoon, the other fellows gave in their answer in common (except one or two which gave in theirs apart) which Dr. Pudsey also subscribed, wherein they say that they would submit to the bishop of Oxford, then installed President, as far as is lawful and agreeable to the statutes of the college, and no way prejudicial to the right and title of Dr. Hough, which last clause they thought to omit at last, being made acquainted by the chief justice and baron Jenner that they were superfluous, and that their submission would not prejudice Dr. Hough's right and title in the least. The same submission was made by the demyes, chaplains, schoolmasters, stewards, organist, clerks, choristers, and servants of the college. All being asked, whether they would submit, promised obedience to the bishop of Oxford as president, the under porter only excepted, who refused. This done, we were bid to withdraw. Soon after Dr. Fairfax was called in by himself, and immediately all of us. Dr. Fairfax denying the authority of the court and refusing to submit to the new President, the commissioners admonished him to depart the college peaceably, and expressing a great deal of sorrow, that he should thus ruin himself by his obstinacy, they deprived him of his fellowship and struck his name out of the buttry book. We were ordered to bring in an account of what lands, gifts and provisions for hospitality which were given by our founders and benefactors, and how they were employed, and so they adjourned to next day.

Wednesday morning, October 26, we gave in a paper relating to our benefactors, and to our own beneficence and charity to the poor as yearly sums, besides what was given upon several emergencies. But besides this common paper which I subscribed, I drew up the following paper, subscribed it, and presented it to the commissioners:

"As to your lordships' question proposed whether we have applyed the revenue of any land or other estate given for hospitality to private uses, we cannot for want of time give your lordships that satisfactory and full account, which we desire and shall do hereafter, when we shall look over the evidences of the estate of the college, of which we are but the fructuaries, and other muniments locked up in the tower. As to our hospitality in general,

"1. The bursars table is the place where not only our tenants but strangers, according to their quality, are entertained: there being a daily allowance made by the college for that purpose, which when scanty and not sufficient for a suitable entertainment, it is left in many cases to the discretion of the bursars to add what they shall judge fit and becoming. But besides this:

"2. It is our constant practice and custom at the end of the year to give sums of money away to the poor, which are greater or less ac-ording to the surplusage of our corn-rents that year.

"3. The bursars are empowered to give money away to the poor upon the greater and more solemn festivals of the year.

"4. Oftentimes upon great emergencies, such as were the briefs for re-edifying the town of Northampton, for the rebuilding the cathedral of St. Paul's, London, for the relief of the French Protestants, besides other briefs for fires, for the redemption of captives and the like, we give considerable sums of money as well out of the public stock as out of our private purses.

"As for turning the remaining part of the Hospital of St. John about 20 years since (for this it seems had been misrepresented, and about which they desired satisfaction) into lodging chambers, which were very much wanting to the Fellows. But that alteration was not made without consulting the bishop of Winton, our local Visitor, and without having obtained his lordship's consent. There having been no use as we could ever learn from our predecessors, of those rooms, and as we may seem not without good grounds to believe since the time that pilgrimages were left off and disused here in England.

"But, my lords, if upon research (which we will endeavour to make with all possible diligence), we shall find any obligation lying upon us to use larger measures of hospitality, we assure your lordships we will be just to that obligation, and for the future will fully satisfy it, as we will any other point of duty which is incumbent upon us as Fellows of the College. This we hope will satisfy your lordships at present, and we humbly desire your lordships to make, as we are assured your lordships will do, a fair and candid interpretation of this answer to his sacred majesty, whom God bless with long life and an happy and glorious reign. THOMAS SMITH, D. D."

I added only by way of explanation, what I have learned from tradition, that those rooms of the hospital now turned into chambers had not been used as they were first designed since king Henry the 8th's time, and that they had been for the reception of pilgrims travelling out of Wales to Thomas Becket's shrine at Canterbury, who was the great saint and martyr of the Roman Church, but by the laws of England, a traitor against his sovereign liege lord king Henry 2nd.

With these papers the Commissioners professed themselves satisfied.

Dr. Rodgers, late organist, had a hearing upon his Petition to be restored, which Dr. Stafford managed and satisfied. The Commissioners ordered us to continue to pay him 30*l.* per annum, which we promised to allow him during his life when he was dismissed, which we never refused to do. Upon this complaint I told Dr. Stafford that now was a proper time to inform the Commissioners of a bed maker's servant being got with child about two or three years before, and that I would make complaint of it in order to have the guilty person punished according to his demerit, and for the fuller discovery of that wickedness. But he would know nothing of it, and desired me to desist, the offence being scandalous, and it would make a great noise and bring a disgrace upon the College. The court adjourned till the next day.

Thursday, Oct. 27, The Court being sat, the steward gave in an account of our fines for the two last years. There was a Petition of William Fey, late chorister, and now a trooper in the earl of Peterborough's regiment, which was delivered to them, as they said; by captain Lawson, about money he pretended due to him from the college; but it was fully and abundantly answered to their lordships satisfaction. They asked us if we had any thing to propose, wherein they might serve us to redress it; which no man speaking to, they adjourned till five in the afternoon, at which time they said they would not detain us above a quarter of an hour.

Thursday afternoon, five o'clock, only the bishop of Chester and baron Jenner came, and told us that they were in hourly expectation of an express from London; and so adjourned immediately to the next day, seven o'clock in the morning.

Friday, Oct. 28. The commissioners told us that that morning they had received an express from London, wherein the king required that the fellows should acknowledge their disobedience in contesting his authority; and therefore they ordered that the fellows should make this acknowledgement, in order to the king's satisfaction, in a writing under their hands, which they would leave them to draw up and word: how that they were sorry that they had displeased his majesty and disobeyed him, and to that purpose, and therefore we were bid to withdraw; and they said that if we would Mr. Tucker should assist us, adding moreover, that we understood very well how to draw up an address, and that they would leave it wholly to ourselves. In this affair I was wholly unconcerned, as to any kind of obligation lying upon me to joyn in such an address, who had been absent from the college with statutable leave, during the heat of the contest: (the fellows refusing my advice for deferring the election till the king had been petitioned a second time: which method, if it had been followed, had prevented all the troubles which fell upon the college). The Commissioners, upon my saying thus much, acknowledged that I was not obliged; nor was a subscription required of me, as is subtilly but most falsely suggested in the Relation, p. 57 & 58, who was so far from being prest, as is there said, that he was not so much as spoken to. But however, after some little demur, I went up to the hall where the fellows were retired, to discourse with several of them, and to interpose my advice. They told me they were required to acknowledge themselves disobedient, that is rogues, villains, and other such like terms they used, which they would never do, and were divided about a form. I told Dr. Bayley and others that they might do it in such a form as might neither displease the commissioners, nor prejudice themselves: as that, We are heartily sorry to have incurred your majesty's displeasure, and that if in the management of this cause we have done any thing amiss tending that way, we humbly beg your majesty's pardon, or to this purpose. I said moreover, that I would not accuse them, but I was to defend myself; that in the management of the best cause, there might be misbehaviour and miscarriage: and therefore I beg'd of them for God's sake very earnestly, that they would consider what they had to do. But I not prevailing, they drew up a paper, which being subscribed, they went down with it to the common room to present it to the commissioners. As soon as it was read, the commissioners said it was not a paper fit to be offered; and that they had offered more in a former address, which was read; and that it was not agreeable but directly repugnant to their submission made on Tuesday; the bishop of Chester adding, that it was 'protestatio contra factum.' Dr. Bailey desired to explain himself as to that paper, that by the word submit, they only meant that they would not oppose; and that as to owning the bishop of Oxford president, they had no such design or meaning. This appeared to me matter of astonishment; for that the submission was made after the commissioners had installed him.

Reflecting upon this interpretation, I have said several times to them, If we may fasten an interpretation upon words, contrary to their plain obvious and common sense and meaning, let us henceforward cease to condemn and preach against the Jesuitical wicked doctrine of equivocation and mental reservation: and that if we now thought ourselves bound to observe the founder's statutes ad literam in every particular, and that we could not be dispensed with from them, as we had been dispensed with formerly in divers instances and especially about elections, we ought to take shame to ourselves by a public acknowledgment that we have lain so long under those fatal errors, and do penance for our manifest and wilful perjuries.

After the general submission made by all the fellows, except Dr. Fairfax, and all the college besides, except the under-porter, both of whom were expelled, I observed that there was great dissatisfaction taken by several at this their compliance, blaming them for leaving Dr. Fairfax in the lurch; besides they were piqued by Mr. Obadiah Walker and his parties upbraiding them, that they durst not stand it out, and it being commonly said in the town by the ordinary people, 'here is your Magdalen College conscience,' besides other motives, they thought fit to evacuate their submission by this equivocal interpretation. Then the question was put in these very words to those only who had subscribed the paper.

Will you submit to the bishop of Oxford as president 'in rebus licitis et honestis?'

But they refused, most of them saying that they were of Dr. Bailey's judgment. Dr. Stafford at first desired time to consider, and said, that if he did not obey the president he was liable to be punished for his disobedience according to the statute. Mr. Craddock said that he would obey the bishop of Oxford as president, when Dr. Hough should be found to be legally divested of the presidentship. Mr. Fulham in his heat said, that the bishop of Oxford had not been legally invested president, and that it ought to have been done by a posse comitatus. This the chief justice highly resented, and told him that the law was not his profession, and several other words to that purpose, as indeed most of them had something or other to say, when they gave in their answer viva voce to the question proposed, which I took little notice of, as being trivial. Soon after we were bid to withdraw.

When we were called in, having discoursed Mr. Fulham in the cloyster about his unadvised words, I desired of the commissioners that they would permit Mr. Fulham to retract some words he let fall hastily a little before, and that he might have leave to explain himself, which he did; but they answered that the affront to the king's authority was public: and so the bishop of Chester, who before had called for the buttery book, as I thought to strike his name out and with design to expel him, only suspended him from the profits of his fellowship for his opprobrious language and contempt of the king's authority.

Then they adjourned the court to Wednesday Nov. 16, strictly ordering the fellows then present to give notice to such, as were absent, to appear there before them that day.

Tuesday, Nov. 15, the same commissioners came to town, being brought in by three troops of horse, and were lodged in the college.

That night I was sent for to the lodgings by the bishop of Oxford, not knowing in the least that the commissioners were with him (forbearing to visit him above once or twice at most upon his taking possession of the lodgings, notwithstanding our intimate friendship many years before: which I then chiefly waved to avoid all possible umbrage of me) I was surprized at the sight of them, where we had but little discourse and that of indifferent things. Only before I took my leave, baron Jenner took me aside and asked me very seriously, Dr. I pray tell me, when you delivered the petition of the college to my lord president; I told him upon the faith of an honest man and a Christian that it was on Sunday the 10th of April. Afterwards the bishop of Chester invited me to his chamber, and asked me the same question, which I answered word for word as before I did to baron Jenner; He further asked when I had my answer, I told him on Wednesday the 13th of April, and that I would attest it upon oath if there was any doubt or denial of it.

This brought into my mind what the Vice-chancellor Dr. Ironside told me that in a discourse the king was pleased to have with him, when he was in Oxford, in September about our college, his majesty aggravated the undutifulness and rudeness of the fellows in not petitioning him and representing our case to him before the election. The Vice-chancellor interposing said that he had heard that we had done it: the king answered; Ay, after the election was over. This seemed demonstration, that the earl of Sunderland did not deliver our petition in good time, and which I concluded fully was the reason, why baron Jenner and the bishop of Chester were so inquisitive to know the exact time from me.

The bishop of Chester told me that I had a great enemy in the cabinet council, called just before they came away. I asked him who were present, he said the lord chancellor, the lord president, the lord privy seal, the marquis of Powis, father Peter, the earl of Castlemain, and I think he said bishop Leybourn. He would not tell me who the lord was, but left me to guess, as I did easily. But he said that the king was pleased after all to say that he was fully satisfied as to my behaviour.

In the interval between the Commissioners going away and return, I was soon convinced that the fellows were encouraged to persist in their opposition to the king by several great men at London; that they should be taken care of, in case that they were expelled, that they would be looked upon as Confessors for the Protestant religion, and such like plausible arguments, with which they were wrought upon. So that it was very easy to foresee that upon their non-submission, the commissioners came with full power to expell them.

Wednesday, Nov. 16. The commissioners met in the common room, and the buttery book being sent for, afterward upon reading the king's mandate for the admission of Mr. Wm. Joyner, who had been fellow of the college about 40 years before, and lost his fellowship by turning Papist, and Mr. Job Allibon, brother to the judge of that name, they were admitted, and their names registered; both of them taking only the oath required by the founder.

The names of all the fellows were called over, and certificates were produced in behalf of several of the absent fellows, which were read and allowed. Dr. Younger was excused, upon the account of his attendance upon the princess of Denmark. The names of the rest who had not taken the like care to get themselves excused were noted down.

Soon after the bishop of Chester made a long speech, recapitulating the whole affair.

All being ordered to withdraw but the fellows, the commissioners required such of them, and only such as had contended with the king, (for I was not so much as spoken to, much less pressed, as in the printed pamphlet, entitled, "An Impartial Relation of the whole Proceedings against St. Mary Magdalen College in Oxford," which is very partial and faulty in several particulars relating to me, is basely and falsely suggested, p. 37, 38,) to subscribe the following paper:

'To the King's most excellent Majesty:

'The humble Petition and Submission of the Fellows of St. Mary Magdalen College in the University of Oxon: whose names are subscribed.'

[Here occurs the Petition as in the preceding Report, excepting two immaterial deviations.]

This being read, every one of the concerned persons was asked in his turn, whether he would sign the submission or no.

After some little altercation, they were bid to withdraw, every one in the order he stood in, as they refused.

Soon after the doors were opened, and their names having been struck out of the buttery book, the sentence of expulsion was read publicly; against which several of them protested in a paper subscribed by them to which the rest assented. An instrument of their expulsion was about noon affixed upon the great gate of the college.

Upon the fellows final withdrawing, the commissioners proceeded to admit several fellows and demyes by virtue of the king's mandate.

After dinner the commissioners went out of town for London.

After the expulsion of my colleagues, which they had brought upon themselves, I being extremely concerned for them, resolved in that very minute to go to London, and live there; and to begin my journey the next morning, Thursday, but no coach going from Oxford on that day, I was forced to defer it till Friday morning.

On Friday morning, Nov. 18th, I set forward in the coach for London, and staid there all that winter, and part of the following year, till I was expelled from my fellowship by Bishop the then president and popish fellow: and went down to Oxon a few days after to remove my books, bedding, and the other furniture of my chamber.

Upon my coming to town, I found the whole transaction of the affair relating to the college generally condemned, the king arraigned as guilty of arbitrary government in turning men out of their freeholds, the commissioners loaded with calumnies for executing the king's pleasure, and acting as they said against law, in defence of a prerogative, which these revilers would not acknowledge due to the crown, and myself bespattered with horrible, scandalous, and diabolical reflections, as that I was a Papist, or at least would soon declare myself such; that I had perjuriously violated my founder's statutes; and that by this compliance I was making my court to get preferment, and such like stuff. I confess it troubled me extremely to be thus calumniated, knowing that in the whole affair I acted according to my judgment and conscience, upon which I did not choose to rely wholly, though I might have done it safely, knowing from the registers of the college, what had been done in the like cases by our predecessors: and especially in Dr. Walter Haddon's case, who was a lay-gentleman, and bred up in the University of Cambridge in the time of king Edward the 6th; in that of Dr. Bond under queen Elizabeth; of Dr. Oliver who was recommended by king Charles the 1st, (though the king then in Oxford was assured that the election would light neither upon Dr. Oliver or another of his majesty's chaplains, the king saying, as I have been most credibly informed, that he would send his letters however) and in those of Dr. Pierse and Dr. Clerke, at which latter I was present, and in the elections and admissions of fellows (to the formalities of which we were as much obliged by statute) whenever the king thought fit to interpose his royal authority: besides, I say, not relying upon my own understanding, I consulted both divines and civilians as to my behaviour in this perplexed affair, whose judgment, which could be no way biassed, agreed with mine. Hereupon to do myself right, and to vindicate my injured fame and credit, I found myself obliged to give a particular relation of my behaviour in the whole transaction so far as I was concerned, either at the election or visitation, which I sent to my friend Wm. Lloyd lord bishop of St. Asaph in a letter dated Nov. 24, within less than a week after my coming to town, which satisfied his lordship, who, as much as he disliked the exercise of the king's visitatorial power at that time and the behaviour of the commissioners for ecclesiastical affairs and for visiting the Universities either at London or Oxford, did me the justice to vindicate me, in the midst of all the clamours raised upon me, (as did several other persons) whenever a discourse happened to be started about me. I finding that the case was either through ignorance misunderstood, or through malice and design perverted, to run down the king and his authority-royal, in interposing in college elections, and that not one in a thousand has a right notion of it, designed to publish that letter to satisfy my friends, that I was not so black a criminal, as some of my maligners represented me to be, and therefore consulted and advised with bishop Lloyd, whether I ought not to lay open the whole affair to the view of the world, at least to publish that letter written to him, which he would by no means give way to, or advise me to do, adding among other reasons, that thereby I should but gratify the Jesuits; and this afterwards was the opinion of Dr. T. Tennison: who in bishop Lloyd's absence and by his particular desire, I now and then consulted upon some emerging difficulty. I can justly say it, and I appeal to God Almighty the searcher of all hearts, that in the whole course of my life, in matters relating to the public, I have endeavoured to discharge a good conscience; and that the grace of God assisting me, I have abhorred, and the same grace still assisting me, shall continue to abhor, a wilful and designed contradicting the lights and directions of my conscience, or doing any thing contrary to it, though it were to gain the best preferment in the church, or to save my life: And as to the other crimination of my being a Papist, or would at least become such, I need only appeal to all who know me intimately both before and since, and to the several theological writings which I have published in Latin and English, in which I have defended the doctrine of the church of England against the Papists, to render it absurd, false and incredible. It was a grievous affliction to be so unworthily reproached by my brethren of the clergy, one of whom broke out in a coffee-house into scurrilous language against me, such as was fitter for a rude, ill-bred, and hair-brained porter or carman to use, than a scholar, gentleman, or priest. But I have lived to see this man especially, (with several other of my severe censurers) notwithstanding their pretended zeal at the time in the defence of the church of England against Popery (which certainly is the duty of every honest and conscientious clergyman of this church) renounce his oaths, faith, declarations, and formerly avowed principles, and swear allegiance to an usurper, and justify all the villainies of the late revolution.

Collections of sums of money were not long afterwards made both at London and in the country, for the expelled fellows of Magdalen college: and the news of their expulsion was sent over into Holland, with a great many horrible circumstances to aggravate the injustice of the king's proceedings against them, which affected the princess of Orange in such a manner, as that she sent over 200*l.* to be distributed among them, as one of the fellows afterwards told me.

That night after having sent away my letter by a sure hand to bishop Lloyd in the morning, a gentleman came to me to my lodging telling me, that the king hearing that I was in town, commanded me to come to his levee the next morning, which was extremely surprising to me.

Friday morning, November 25, I went to Whitehall, the king was then under the barber's hand, several lords and gentlemen attending as is usual; soon after the king admitted me to the honour of kissing his hand, and called me into his closet.

The king said to me, that he had heard well of me, and that I was a loyal and honest man, I answered that I had endeavoured to do my duty to his majesty, as became a loyal and an honest man, for which I suffered a thousand reproaches. The king bid me not to value them, and then he was pleased to tell me, that he had had a letter from the bishop of Oxford, that the demyes were mutinous. I said that I had endeavoured to satisfy some of them, but I feared they were not to be wrought upon.

The king was pleased to add these very words: The college has been mutinous and factious ever since my brother was restored. Some little discourse happened about my having lived some time at Constantinople, and I thought fit to acquaint the king that of late I had not been constantly resident in the college, but lived in London, which I thought proper to say, because I had resolved to go down no more, while things continued in this disorderly condition. After this short stay, the king said, 'Doctor, I thank you, I will stand by them who stand by me. You shall find it so:' or words to that purpose. I most humbly thanked his majesty, and was dismissed. When I returned to my lodgings, which I did immediately, I thought fit to put down the above written discourse while it was fresh in my memory. Notwithstanding the king's gracious intentions toward me, I never made any kind of application to his majesty either by Protestant or Romanist, and at that time dreaded preferment as much as others were ambitious of it, and courted it, and scorned to make a visit to my lord Sunderland, who to make his court the better, had renounced his religion, and was premier ministre, much more to the Jesuit Petres, whose face I never saw but once en passant, though invited thereunto by one, who had a considerable interest in them both. For though I might have pretended with some tolerable kind of allowance to a prebend in the church of Windsor, which king Charles was pleased to promise me, or to a prebend in Westminster, for which archbishop Sandcroft, of his own accord, without my request or suggestion, told me that he would speak to the king (king James) in my behalf. His grace thinking it most agreeable for me to live in London, as well as some others, who I saw daily advanced to great dignities in the church; yet, after that the troubles of the college had happened, I made it my business and endeavour to avoid it, and I thanked God heartily, that no preferment was forced upon me. So much do I prefer the credit and reputation of my having acted according to my judgment in the affair of the college, before the best preferment which fell afterward in the king's gift, though it had been the bishopric of Oxon, which not long after was vacant by the death of bishop Parker.

Saturday morning, Dec. 31, 1687, I went to see the bishop of Chester at his lodgings, where I found Mr. Brooks, the bishop of Oxford's secretary, just got in before me.

The bishop told me that he was just returned from Whitehall, and that he had been with the king to recommend one Dr. Vavassor, a physician, with one arm, who upon the death of his wife had resolved to go into a monastery, but that his friends advised him to get a fellowship in Magdalen college. The king referred him to father Peters, who told him that the warrant was full, which was for twelve, all Papists; but that he might be in the next. I asked then what would become of the college chappel;

the bishop of Chester said, that he had spoken to bishop Leyburn about it, that they (the Papists) should not have the use of the chappel, there being chambers enough to make a chappel for their use, and that otherwise this would look like turning the Protestants out of it, and that bishop Leybourn answered him, that he was of that mind, and had declared as much; adding, that his advice signified nothing, meaning as he said, that all was done by father Peters. Then bishop Cartwright told me, that he believed the chappel should be made use of alternation. Upon this I turned to Mr. Brooks and I said, I hope the bishop of Oxon is of the church of England, notwithstanding his book, which was then just published, and was universally decried, as written in favour of the Papists, and I hope also, that he will never give up the chapel to the uses of the Roman worship, and I pray tell him from me, that I have served the king as far as my conscience and allegiance will permit, that I could go no further, that if I came down to the college, I would keep up the service of the church of England in the chappel, at the usual hours, and that we had legal possession of it, of which we could not be deprived. I asked the bishop what will become of the Protestants at last? He answered me, that they would be preferred. Preferred? said I, well my lord, I have served the king as far as I can; but withal, I am not only content to lose my fellowship, but my life too, in defence of the church of England as established by law. So the discourse fell.

I had heard some while after my coming to London, that several masters of arts in Oxon were very desirous of getting fellowships in the college, making not any scruple in the least of succeeding in the vacant places: and I was fully satisfied of the truth of the report, some of them coming up afterwards to try their interest here in order to procure mandates for their admission. But all the recommendation either of bishop Parker or bishop Cartwright could not prevail in their behalf: and father Peters, who had the management of the affair, would not give way to it, which was looked upon as a strange kind of politic in him: unless it was done designedly by the person who influenced him as well as the public councils too much, lord S——d, to exasperate and embarrass the king's affairs, and render him more odious to his Protestant subjects; many of whom now began to be alarmed with the report, which upon this refusal was soon after confirmed by the sending down a mandate for 12 persons, all of the Roman communion, that Magdalen college was to be turned into a Popish seminary. This helped to blow the coals, and kindled that jealousy in the minds of several (who before upon better information thought the king injured by the fellows, and justly provoked to proceed to that severity against them,) which afterwards broke out into factious discontents against his person and government. Upon the opening of this new scene, I was more and more confirmed in the resolution I had taken when I left Oxford, just after the visitation, not to return; and was very indifferent what became of my fellowship. Mr. Charnock, whom they had made vice-president, sent to me a letter dated January 19th, citing me to come down; which citation I slighted: and did not think fit to answer the foolish letter; and left them to proceed against me as they pleased.

Bishop Parker dying, and Dr. Gifford titular Bishop of Madaura, succeeding in the presidency, and the college now filling apace with Popish priests and others of the Roman Communion, they seized wholly upon the College chappel for the uses of their religion without any regard to the Protestant fellows, and others not only servants but gown's-men of the foundation, who still kept their places and resided among them. Though I am not certain but that they said mass in the chappel. I had sometime or at least upon particular occasions the use of it, before bishop Parker dyed, who was herein, it may be, overruled, and made no opposition. But whether so, or otherwise, I cannot be positive, having received no full information. Hereupon I consulted bishop Lloyd of St. Asaph what I might or ought to do in this case, whether I should go down to Oxford and make use of the chapel in the way of the church of England and keep up our liturgick service there, which he told me was a good thought and design which God had inspired me with. But however we both thought it best to advise with an able lawyer or two; whereupon he immediately wrote a letter to sir John Holt, recommending me and my case to him, which the bishop had stated. Upon my going to sir John Holt with my letter, which he read, he told me that it was a cause in which the king was concerned, that he was the king's serjeant and of council for the king, and so could not be retained by me, or give me any advice; and excused himself to me with a great deal of civility. This was about the 21 or 22 of May. Then I went to sir Francis Pemberton with the case, who refusing to take any fee of me, told me frankly that it was no way adviseable for me to go down to Oxon to demand the use of the chappel, that it would be to no purpose, that I would thereby incur the censure of folly, rashness and madness, that I would but run my head against the wall, and that upon their expelling me I could meet with no redress in Westminster-hall, and much to this purpose; so his advice was, that I should desist from this attempt. I went immediately to the bishop of St. Asaph, who was fully satisfied with the opinion and judgment of this greatly honest and greatly learned lawyer.

They expelled me the 3d of August, of which notice being given me by one of the college servants (for they all thought fit to keep their places except the underporter, who was expelled at the visitation) I went down to Oxon to remove my books and goods, taking a lodging in a private house. After 3 or 4 days stay I returned to London, without taking any notice of any of the Popish fellows.

October 3d, 1688. The Archbishop of Canterbury with several other of the bishops addressed to the king, and laid before him several heads and articles of advice, among which part of the 3d was, that his majesty would graciously be pleased to restore the president and fellows of St. Mary Magdalen College in Oxon.

October 12th. The king sent for the bishop of Winchester, visitor of our College, and ordered him to settle the society regularly and statutably. This the bishop upon my meeting with him, acquainted me with, and ordered me to meet him at Whitehall, next morning, which I did accordingly, just coming with some other bishops from the king. He took me down with him from the room adjoining to the fane chamber, to my lord Sunderland's office, hoping to have had the warrant under the king's hand and seal ready. After about an hour's attendance, Mr. Bridgman came to the office and told him, that he should certainly have it in the afternoon. The bishop then desired me to go with him to the cock-pit, where he was going to wait upon the princess Ann, telling me by the way, that he would not stir from the court till he had obtained the warrant. Upon his going into the princess's chamber, he bid me come to him at his lodging in Old-palace-yard at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and bring Dr. Younger along with me. We both came, and he shewed us the king's order, which was very full, of which I thought it no way becoming to desire him to give me leave to take a copy. I asked him when his lordship would restore us; he said that he could not pitch at that time upon a certain day; that he would make haste to Farnham, and that we should hear thence, but advising me that I would go down in the mean while to secure the College-plate, gold in the Tower, the registers and the like, least they might be imbezzled and taken away. I told him that in the circumstances I was then in, being actually dispossessed of my fellowship, I could not act but under his lordship's authority ratified by his episcopal seal, besides that upon leaving the college, I had made a vow to God that I would not enter in again, but when I was restored. Why, says he, this is in order to your restoration; so the discourse fell, and he went soon after, (I think the next day, for I did not see him afterward) to Farnham.

A citation was set up on the chappel-gate Oct. 16, warning the president, fellows, and all persons concerned to meet him there on the 2d November following, by which time the Popish fellows were ordered to be gone, which was a strain of the bishop's civility to them. My lord of Canterbury and several others of great quality hearing of this delay, signified their just displeasure at it, of which the bishop being sensible he hastens to Oxford on Saturday 20th of October, anticipating the time prescribed by him in his instrument almost a fortnight, upon the security of which I staid in London. He was extremely blamed for deferring it, and might, if he had pleased, at first have gone directly to Oxford, where a great many of the fellows upon the news of the designed restoration were come already, and the king knew nothing, but that he had before this time obeyed his orders and restored the college. But thus it happened. The king designing to have on Monday the 22d October a great assembly of the lords bishops and personages of great quality, dignity and office to satisfy them, and by them the whole nation about the legitimacy of his son, the prince of Wales, and to obviate and confound the villainous and diabolical slander which was most maliciously spread abroad among the people by his implacable enemies which were then designing his overthrow and deposition, that it was a supposititious child, among others, took particular care that the bishop of Winchester, of whose loyalty at that time his majesty had a very good opinion, should be sent for to be present, and an express was sent to him accordingly to Farnham, but he being gone thence to Oxford, the express went after him, and delivered him the king's letter for his appearance in the council chamber on Monday. He not knowing the meaning and reason of the king's order delivered to him on Saturday night, was resolved to be gone early the next morning for London, without restoring the college. The fellows hearing of his intended sudden departure, went to St. John's college, where his lordship lodged, and importuned him to restore them that morning, that the whole might be done in an hour or two's time, and upon his refusing to comply with their earnest request, they used very rude expressions and behaviour toward him, which put my lord into a very grievous passion, and he made his coachman drive away, as some of the fellows told me.

On Monday about one o'clock in the afternoon, I spoke to him in the gallery at Whitehall, and asked his lordship when he would return to Oxford; he said on Wednesday. That afternoon I hired a couple of horses and a man, and went to Beaconsfield that night, and the next day to Oxford. The bishop got thither on Wednesday the 24th, and restored and resettled the college the next day in the morning, being the 25th.

In the pamphlets which were soon after published, giving an account of the revolution, and in order to the justification of the wickedness and villainy of it, this accidental delay of our being restored, which is wholly to be imputed to the bishop of Winchester, is horribly misrepresented, particularly by Mr. Bohun, and afterwards by Mr. Tirryl, and by the whole litter of envenomed lying scribblers, upon this idle absurd and forged pretence, that the post just before the bishop was sent for back, there came news "that the Dutch had on the 16th of the said month suffered much in a storm, and that they would not be able to sail 'till the Spring, and that therefore the bishop of Winchester was commanded to desist, and the order given to him for restoring the college was revoked ;" which was a horrible lye, the king knowing nothing all the while but that the college had been restored before he sent for the bishop to be present in that august assembly, which was the only reason he was sent to, and not in the least to hinder or defeat the restoration of the college, as those villainous writers have most falsely and wickedly asserted.

After about four or five days stay the visitor returned to Farnham ; and at the same time I designed to go back to London, as having no bed or other furniture in my chamber, but chiefly to observe the humours and behaviour of the people, whose minds were swoln big with the expectation of a threatened invasion from the prince of Orange, and what the effect of it would be. But the president desired me to stay to help to settle the college, and make up the perplexed accounts of it, and accordingly I was prevailed upon. Upon a diligent search and inspection we found our writings and muniments safe, the old gold in the tower, which we counted, untouched and entire, the plate left as we left it, and nothing as I remember missing.

But after the visitor's departure, I quickly found that I was an eye-sore to several of my colleagues, who neither would or could it seems forgive me for my behaviour at the election and visitation, which cast such a reflection upon them. But the king's affairs now being more and more embroiled, they grew insolent, many of them having gotten the victory over the king, and the whole nation as they fancied on their side, and being thus got again into possession of the college, some of the junior fellows especially began to shew their malice and revenge upon me, taking occasion in the common room or in the cloysters to assault and abuse me with base dirty and opprobrious language for my not joining with them. All this I could easily have digested, till my old friend Mr. Dodwell acquainted me, that he had just then heard, that both president and fellows had endeavoured to prepossess the visitor, when lately in town, against me, with a design to expel me. This I confessed put me out of all patience, and filled me with equally great trouble and indignation, and made me almost resolve, whatever the effect of this barbarous usage might be, to quit the college (as the lesser evil of the two) where I had so many open maligners, and others who seemed to carry all things fair with me, and treated me outwardly with respect, thus secretly to envy me. Though I could not give an entire credit to Mr. Dodwell's information, especially as to what concerned the president, whose pretensions of respect and friendship were never greater, than at that time, and who, I hoped and believed, abhorred the very thought of being a party in that black design against me, yet I thought fit not to slight it, but the same day, 31st October, I wrote to my friend the bishop of St. Asaph, it concerning me both in point of reputation and interest to prevent the mischief from falling upon me. The pretence was, that I had assisted Dr. Johnston in the composure of his book, intitled "the King's visitatorial power asserted, &c." he mentioned me there with honour, and citing my diary in 3 or 4 places. The case in short lies thus: I had made an acquaintance with that worthy honest and learned gentleman in the year 1671, at Pontefract in Yorkshire, where he then lived, and where I continued several days, taking a progress that summer with one of our Yorkshire fellows into the north parts of England, which in all my perambulations I had not seen before, and whose friends lived in that town. This acquaintance quickly grew up into a strict and dear friendship, which was afterwards kept up and maintained by a correspondence of letters during his stay in Yorkshire, and after his coming to live in London. The king being made acquainted with the loyalty and worth of this gentleman, and his great skill in the histories antiquities and laws of England, and his industrious researches into old records, gave him a considerable pension, to render the loss of his practice as a physician (and certainly a learned and judicious one) which he could not, if otherwise employed, attend with constancy and assiduity, less uneasy, and his chief province was to defend the rights and prerogatives of the crown, which were then attacked by several little writers with design to enflame the nation, under pretence of liberty and property, against the encroachments of arbitrary power. These calumnies were levelled against the king, not so much for his being of the Roman communion (though of this they made great advantage in order first to lessen him in the minds of the people and turn their minds against him, and afterwards to abdicate and dethrone him) as for his being a king; for they were the same with which they had aspersed the king his father of blessed memory, who died a martyr for the church of England. This gentleman, then, was to give a true and impartial Relation of the visitation of our college, and to that end had all the papers and register of the commissioners both at London and at Oxford, which related to that affair, put into his hand. He was so civil as to consult me about what concerned myself formerly as to matter of fact, I read several things out of my diary to him, and at the same time acquainted him particularly with what the lord chief justice said, as I had put it down in my note book, whose words I found in the prints and in common discourse to have been horribly perverted to his great prejudice and dishonour; and for the Doctor's farther satisfaction afterwards, I gave him a copy of a declaration or two I made which only concerned myself, which he has printed. But as to any matter of argument, statutes, customs, usages and practices of the college in other visitations, and the like, I never communicated to him one syllable or gave him the least light. For if I designed it, things had been urged in several particulars with greater strength and authority. But he mentioning in the close of his book that a member of the college had written a tract upon that subject, it was presently concluded that I was the person, though when I challenged the Doctor upon it and desired him to acquaint me who that fellow was, he told me that it was Mr. Charnock, some of whose papers he had seen, whose name I told him he ought to have mentioned to take off all possible umbrage and suspicion from me. This silly and false suggestion was the only ground of the accusation secretly managed against me, which soon after fell, and I heard no more of it.

Wednesday, Dec. 5, 1688.

The lord Lovelace entered the town by Wadham college, and striking down Holywell and so in the road by Magdalen College Grove wall, past in at the east gate between 3 and 4 of the clock in the afternoon, where he was expected by the mayor aldermen and council with the recorder, who welcomed him with a speech, expressing their joy for his coming to them in this time of danger. He replied, sitting on his horse, that he was a member of their corporation, and was come to defend the Protestant religion and them. Upon which there were great huzzas and acclamations. There were about 300 horse with him, the gentlemen well mounted and armed, among them were the townsmen who went to meet him, and severall pityfull rascally fellows with no other arms but bills and staves. They rode up the length of the high street to Carfax and then dispersed themselves into several inns. To grace their entrance they brought in with them four prisoners, three Irishmen and a Popish priest, with their hands behind them, who rode foremost. That night to prevent a surprize the city train bands kept watch, and carts and waggons were thrown across Magdalen college bridge: the guard being placed at Magdalen college kitchen back gate: and so at all the other avenues of the town.

Thursday, Dec. 6. There was a meeting at the town council chamber, where it was agreed, that the Prince of Orange's Declaration should be read. At eleven o'clock there was a great appearance of horse at Carfax, where the Declaration was read by Mr. H. Mordant bare-headed on horseback.

On Thursday night there was a great alarm all the town over, and a report artificially spread, that the Irish were marching towards Oxford; which put the townsmen into great frights and fears: upon which they betook themselves to their arms, and an arch of Magdalen college bridge was broken down, so that people were ferryed over the Cherwell next day. Afterwards planks were laid over the chasm for the convenience of passengers and market people.

Friday, Dec. 7. Great numbers of people appeared in the streets, and three companies of foot were formed under the command of Mr. Clark of Ifeley, alderman Combs, and Mr. Prince the town clerk.

The lord Lovelace and Mr. Finch of All Souls went up to the Schole's tower, whence they took away several drums and muskets, about 48. The Prince of Orange's said Declaration was read at Carfax.

A proposal was made in the chequer by the president about giving away the college plate for the use of P. O. He afterwards told me that this design was first projected by the vice chancellor and one or two more of Christ's church, whom he named to me, and that it was told him that Magdalen college had most reason so to do; because they owed their restoration to the Prince of Orange's coming. But many being unwilling no resolution was taken. The president also told me (and Dr. Mill afterwards confirmed to me) that he knew nothing of Mr. Finch's being sent to the P. O. at Sherborne to invite him to Oxford, and to make him an overture of the college plate, and that it was wholly concerted and projected by the same persons.

Searches made that day in several Papists houses for arms.

Monday morning, Dec. 10. A convocation was called by the vice chancellor, and Mr. He-neage Finch and sir Thomas Clargis chosen burgesses of the university for the convention.

Afternoon. The duke of Ormond came to town, the vice chancellor, doctors and masters waiting upon him in their habit at All Souls college where he lodged, and the public orator making a speech. Several other lords and gentlemen also came into town the same day.

Tuesday, Dec. 11. The earl of Abingdon came to Oxford, being met below Christ's church by the mayor, aldermen, and common council in their formalities, with the companies of mercers, tailors and glovers, with their streamers.

Wednesday, Dec. 12. Prince George came to town, and was waited upon at Christ's Church by the vice chancellor and heads of houses.

An association paper was signed by the vice chancellor, several heads of the colleges, and some of the Canons of Christ church to stand by the P. of O. But Dr. Turner, Dr. Adams, Dr. Bury, Dr. Hatton, Dr. Mills, Dr. South, &c. refused to subscribe it, as I was told by one of the non subscribers.

Upon the news of the king's leaving London the Prince of O. marched from Abingdon to Dorchester and so to Wallingford, where he lies this night.

Thursday, Dec. 13. They left off praying for the prince of Wales in the college chappel.

The night before or this morning the P. of O. wrote a letter to the duke of Ormond acquainting him, that he was obliged to march up to London, and so was hindered from visiting Oxford, as he designed, and that after things were settled he would come hither and see the university.

G

This night sir John Lanier's regiment of horse having basely deserted the king came to town (Oxford.)

Saturday Dec. 15. The princess Anne came to town (Oxford) and went directly to Christ's church. First, in the head of a great party of horse, both gentlemen and militia-men of 2 or 3 counties, which they had gathered, was the earl of Northampton. Next, before the coach of the princess, the bishop of London, leading a troop of noblemen and gentlemen, he in a blue coat, jack boots, pistols at his saddle bow with a naked sword in his hand.* The motto of the colours of this troop embroidered in letters of gold: 'Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari.'

About an hour after the chancellor, vice chancellor, and Drs. in their scarlet gowns who were ready there to receive her, were admitted. The vice chancellor made a speech, saying among other things, 'that never was there an invasion more just, and never more successful, that there was a conquest without blood, a victory without insulting, I might say almost without rejoicing; that the Church of England has saved the king against his will,' and such like stuff, besides more indecent reflections on the birth of the prince of Wales.

A flattering letter soon after was sent by the university of Oxford to the prince of O. wherein among other high strains a gentleman who heard it read, told me this was one: Cæsare major antequam venit vicit.

Here I left off putting down what farther happened at Oxon, our whole discourse being taken up and our thoughts wholly employed about the amazing transactions of London, where upon the king's forced departure a second time a new scene opened.

Reflecting upon the horrible defection of these very heads of colleges and others who had been so zealous for the passing of the famous Decretum† in a full convocation 21st July 1683, and now renouncing that doctrine and their loyalty, and entering into a confederation or association in defence of the P. of O. who came to pull the king his uncle and father-in-law out of his throne and usurp his crown: I soon after vented my just indignation against such baseness and wickedness in these following lines:

In Associationem a quibusdam Academia Oxoniensis doctoribus initam.

*Nuper sacrilegos infandi schismatis ausus
Atq; Monarchomachos percudit Oxonia
Oxonia, antiquæ fidei veri; magistra
Regibus effuso sanguine fida suis
Unde hæc fluxa fides? hæc inconstantia morum?
Scottorum fædus sic revocare decet?*

* Thus it appears, that in this instance, I have erroneously supposed Dalrymple to have written without any other authority than his own invention. See vol. 11, p. 1130.

† See this Decretum in 3 Kennett, 2d edit. pp. 411, et seq.

*Fallimur en, matrem non hæc infamia tangit
Dediscunt pauci, quam docet illa, fidem.

The accounts of the college being pretty well stated and settled, I obtained leave to go to London, which was about the middle of January.

I soon after went to visit my friend lord viscount Preston, and to ask his opinion and advice about my going to wait upon the king in France. After some discourse upon this head, he concluded that it was best for me to stay in London, and that I might do the king better service here than by going over the water. So fully acquiescing in his lordship's judgment I laid aside all thoughts of that voyage, and considered with myself upon what methods I should enter to do that little service I was able. The convention being opened, I went every day to Westminster, to talk with several noblemen and gentlemen with whom I had the honor to be acquainted, to persuade them to use their utmost endeavour to hinder the cursed abdication, which was then visibly designed and addressed to them, in order to the inviting the king back into England, from whence he had been driven away. For my active behaviour herein and for my local zeal in many rencounters in the Court of Requests, I was taken notice of, and threatened to be complained of and punished. Besides the warm contests which I had with several bishops and others of the clergy, who partly through mistaken principles, partly through fear, that they might not lose their preferments in the church, were now giving up themselves into the hands of the P. of O. in order, as some of them idly and foolishly talked, to the better securing the Church of England from Popery, and maintaining the Protestant interest in Holland and other countries beyond sea.

Spending the coronation day with my relations in the City, the next day the 12th of April, I went in the flying coach to Oxon, being to preach before the University at St. Mary's on the Sunday following, using in my prayer the form of words in the prayer appointed to be read in the communion service, 'that God would save and defend all Christian kings, princes and governors, and especially thy servant our king.' I thought it became me, foreseeing that it would be the last time that I should appear in that pulpit, to preach a plain and practical sermon, it being what I had preached several years before at Constantinople,

* When at the Revolution the famous Oxford decree, of July 21, 1683, (proposed by Dr. Jane, Regius Professor of Divinity) was tacitly condemned by the maker and chief promoters of it, who privately ordered the printed copies of it to be taken away from the halls and other public places where they had before hung in triumph, it occasioned, says Kennett, some reflections and pieces of wit; among others this distich:

*Cum fronti sit nulla fides ut carmina dicunt;
Cur tibi bifronti, JANE sit ulla fides?*

as to the heads of doctrine, with some few additions, suited in the present state of affairs, which was printed soon after the news came of the dismal earthquake at Jamaica, under the title of

A Discourse concerning Divine Providence in relation to National Judgments. London, 1693.

But the Bishop of London's chaplain would not be prevailed upon by the bookseller his intimate friend to let it pass entire: but before he would licence it, he struck out two or three passages which he said reflected upon the government.

On the 1st of August 1689, being the day in which our suspension by the act for taking the new oaths to the P. and P. of O. was to begin. I left Oxon and came to London, which was to be the place of my constant and fixt residence, till God should put an end to the miseries and confusions brought upon us by the late revolution, and restore our rightful king again.

At Magdalen tide 1692, the president and major part of the Fellows (for some I heard refused to give their consent) expelled me from the college by pronouncing my place void, as forfeited by the late act, and filled it at that election. But of this, see page , more at large.

The London clergy by concert with the bishop of London desired him in their name to thank the P. of O. for the hazards which he had ran in this expedition, and for his care in protecting our religion, but withall to desire him to have a tender regard for the king. But the bishop not delivering this in such terms and expressions as they expected, they took great offence at it, Dr. Sherlock saying that he and the rest of them would ever maintain the loyal principle of the Church of England, and that if the bishop of London forsook that, they would forsake him.

The soldiers association, as it was called, which several officers signed, a copy of which I received from captain S. whom I met with in sir William Howard's lodgings in Scotland Yard upon my coming to town. This was the first draught, which it seems they thought fit soon after, a little to alter and mollify.

"I do promise before God and upon the honour of a gentleman faithfully to serve the P. of O. and the Protestant religion against the king himself, should he land here, and to oppose all such designs with the hazard of my life and fortune."

January 21, 1688-9, in a conversation I had with Dr. Barlow, bishop of Lincoln, about the present state of affairs; he said, that when the king did not govern by law, he could not expect our obedience, that the obligation was mutual, that upon that supposition we were at liberty. I replied that this was an ill principle and against the declarations of our church, that a king is wholly unaccountable, that this was the pretence of 1641, and which cut off the head of Charles the first. He answered that king Charles the 1st governed by law, and that saying the contrary of him was a slander. I said so too, but added, that the principle was the same both then and now, and that the rebels made use of it, and misapplied it accordingly. He further said that the declaration for liberty of conscience was against the laws of God and man, [and yet he and several of his clergy gave the king public thanks for it in a solemn address] and that the king had endeavoured to destroy our laws and religion. Suppose it so, my lord, said I, is he therefore deposable? Here he was afraid to speak out, and said falteringly, that he had deposed himself by deserting us; no, said I, he was driven and forced away. Besides, my lord, who shall absolve me from the oath of allegiance and supremacy I have taken to his majesty. He answered, that in this and the like cases they did not oblige, the pact being mutual. I replied, that this was a new, a strange and wicked doctrine, to which I would never agree and submit: though by the grace of God I would lose a thousand lives in defence of the established doctrine of the Church of England. At last he told me he would not be for deposing king James. But, my lord, said I, if you go about to make the Prince of Orange king, what is this to be called? So the discourse fell.

I soon after reflected, that by this new trick and devise of a conditional allegiance, these men designed to void the obligation of all oaths; and that they were now going about to justify the doctrine of deposing kings to be according to law, and consistent with their former oaths: and that what they were about to do, notwithstanding some pretended demureness and squeamishness, was tantamount to a direct and downright abjuration.

January 27th, 1688-9, Dr. Lamplugh the archbishop of York told me that Dr. Compton the bishop of London shewed him the original association paper, which he would have had him to subscribe. But he refused, asking London how he could do it? The bishop of London replied, among other things, that it was a just revenge. My lord of York said, that upon his first waiting upon the king after he came from Exeter, having kissed his majesty's hand, the king was pleased to take him into his closet, and then thanked him for coming up, saying that he was an old cavalier, farther adding that he would reward him. The bishop replied, that his duty was his reward. The king then told him, that he would make him archbishop of York: upon which he fell upon his knees, desiring his majesty not to do it. Sir, said he, I can serve your majesty better in the west, where I am known. The king bad him rise, and told him that it should be so. Upon his coming into his dressing room, the king ordered my lord Preston then president to draw up a warrant immediately for it.

That upon his doing homage the king said, Remember my lord what you have promised me: he answered, Ay sir, as long as I live, that upon the morning of the king's departure, the king was pleased to tell him, that he was chased away from his own house by the P. of O. and desired him to pray for him. The archbishop prayed God to bless his majesty, saying, that he was an old man, and that if he saw his majesty's face no more, he hoped that they should meet together in Heaven. The archbishop told me further, that he had heard, that the P. of O. should say of him, that he had left his flock and committed the care of it to him: somebody replying (but he could not learn the name of the person) that he had got an archbishoprick by it. But says the archbishop to me, Dr. I did my duty in coming away without any design or expectation. Besides, if I had staid at Exeter, I might have been suspected to have been of the spiritual lords whom the P. of O. in his Declaration mentions to have invited him into England.

The bishop of Durham* and Ferguson laid their hands together on the book at Guildhall London, when they took the new oaths.

August 2d, 1689. Sir W. Howard told me that, dining in a mixt company with the earl of Macclesfield; he (the earl) began a health to him: here is a health to the Pope, who declares himself for the Protestants. My lord, said sir W. H. I drink it with all my heart.

Macc. Where is your archbishop of Canterbury?

H. At Lambeth.

M. It is no matter if he and the rest of the bishops were hanged.

H. What my lord, your friend Dr. Burnet, the bishop of Salisbury?

M. Ay, ay, let him go too with the rest.

Macclesfield told him, that he had opposed their house's when sitting, giving leave to Burnet to go into the country, because he was useful to them, and yet he swore, that sometimes he talks nonsense as well as the best.

March 3d, 1689-90. Sir George M'Kenzie told me that he was offered his advocate's place by the P. of O. which he refused: that when he was brought to the P. of O. among other things he said, Sir, they call me a bloody man and a murderer, but I have done my duty to my country, and to the monarchy, I must ask your highness whether you believe that king Charles the first was murdered, or whether Monmouth was guilty of rebellion? He confessed both. Then Sir, said he, I prosecuted such. These very men hate monarchy, they hate the royal family. You will find that except you let them have their will, they will renounce you too.

That in a discourse he had with Gilbert Burnet at Kensington, who expostulated with him about the death of his cousin, he (sir George) told him, that he was guilty of a foul treason, that he had designed to have raised a rebellion, and to have seized upon the privy-counsellors, Berwick and Carlisle: and this proved by several witnesses. Burnet replied I am writing a history: And so will I, said sir George, and I think I have the advantage, as being an eye-witness, and admitted to all juntos, and private committees, by virtue of my office, and then that it is my trade and profession to know and understand these matters.

Sir George further acquainted me, that the proscription was still remaining upon Burnet in Scotland, adding these very words, that he was the greatest villain which ever God created.

August 14, 1689. Discoursing with my lord of Canterbury about Burnet's pastoral letter, not long before published, and upon my saying, that it would have served to have justified Cromwell's usurpation, he answered me, that he had formerly told Mr. Stanley, chaplain to the princess of Orange, who would come over sometimes to Lambeth, during the sitting of the convention, that 'there was no difference between them, but that the one's name was Oliver, and the other's William, and that we were to be beforehand with these men [who say we favour Popery by our non-compliance] and upbraid them with their popish principles and practices of deposing and dethroning kings.'

June 27, 1690. My lord of Canterbury at Lambeth (where I went at convenient intervals to pay my duty) advised me to take care of myself, 'for these men hate you.' I most humbly thanked his grace, and answered, that by the grace of God I am not only willing to go to prison, but to die for this excellent righteous cause, if it be the will of God.

A Copy of a Letter, word for word, put into my hand Monday evening, July 4, 1692, by Mr. Shaw, which was thus directed:

To William Shaw, esq. at his house in St. James's street, London.

Magdalen College Oxon, July 2, 1692.

"My Dear Brother;

"You have a neighbour on the other side of the street, Dr. Thomas Smith fellow of this college, to whom I must beg the favour of you to deliver a message in the name of myself and this society: viz. that we desire he will come down to Oxford and take the oaths, or send us a certificate of his having done it, sometime before the 22d of this month, otherwise we can no longer forbear to elect another person into his place. You may assure him, it is not without a great deal of reluctancy we proceed to this extremity: but we have received a fresh command from the queen by the judges of the assise, requiring us to tender the oaths again to all such, as have not taken them, and to execute the laws immediately upon such as refuse. I am, Dear Sir, your most affectionate friend and faithful Servant. Jo. Oxon.

"This is purely a civility to Dr. Smith, otherwise I would not have given you the trouble of it."

The next day I returned the letter to Mr. Shaw, and desired him to write in my name the following answer word for word, which I gave him in writing, that he might not make any kind of mistake, and so put the paper into his hand, viz, "Sir, I desire you to give my thanks to the President for his civilities which I shall always acknowledge, and withal to acquaint him, that I cannot come down to Oxford upon the accompt for which I am summoned, much less can I or shall I send a certificate, as I am required, preferring the peace of my mind, and the satisfaction of my conscience before the enjoying of my fellowship, which for the sake of my principles, I am ready to lose and be dispossessed of: and that with the same (not to say a greater) willingness and alacrity as when I was first chosen and admitted to it, that"

"I wish all happiness and prosperity to the college, and that I shall during the remainder of the time, which by the good providence of God I have to live, endeavour to serve it, as I may and as I ought to the utmost of my power.
T. S."

THE COPY OF AN ORIGINAL LETTER SENT ME
BY DR. RICHARD RAWLINSON, RELATING TO THE PROCEEDINGS OF MAGDALEN COLLEGE
IN OXON, 1687.

Sir,

The bishop of Chester, the Judges Wright and Jenner, impowered by a new commission to visit the Universities, came to Oxford on Wednesday, October 19th, with a Tipstaff before them, and the three troops of horse quartered here to guard them. You may suppose there was no great rejoicing at their coming in the University or city, and some shewed them disrespect as they passed, as the bishop of Chester afterwards signified, however for this or for some other reasons the troopers were ordered to go to their quarters, and provide powder and bullets, and to be ready without sound of trumpet, with their caboines loaden. On Thursday, October 20th, the commissioners read their commission in Magdalen College hall, that done the bishop of Chester made a delicate speech (the Papists call it a sermon) of passive obedience, taxing not only that society but the whole University with rebellion, and other enormous crimes against the higher powers: they sat fore and afternoon for three days wherein they declared Dr. Hough's election void, notwithstanding his most patient, composed, gallant, behaviour, his stout, and unanswerable defence: when he was asked whether he owned their commission, he answered yes, as far as he was obliged by the laws of the land and the statutes of the college, (or to that purpose) and no further; they called him an intruder: he answered he had as good a right as any president, since the foundation of the college. He was qualified by the laws, chosen by the unanimous consent of the fellows, confirmed by the visitor's (the bishop of Winchester) approbation: he said and replied many things smartly, prudently, and courageously, in short he behaved like an honest and great man, and when they had struck his name out of the register and buttery book he came in and desired leave to speak, which being granted he made protestation against every thing they had done or should do in prejudice of his right, and appealed to the king and the courts of justice, whereupon there was a great hum made in the crowd which exasperated the commissioners, that they presently would have committed Dr. Hough to prison for that crime of popularity (though he and all the fellows were ready to make affidavit they were not privy to it) had not two gentlemen among the spectators given bond of 500*l.* a man, for his appearance at the King's-bench. Then the fellows were called over one by one, and asked whether they would admit the bishop of Oxford (Dr. Parker) for their president, they all replied, (except Charnock) that the statutes they had sworn to did incapacitate him, and that they had a president lawfully elected in prejudice of whose right they could not elect another, nor admit the bishop of Oxford, then the bishop of Chester (Cartwright) replied, that seeing they were so scrupulous and punctual in observing their statutes, why had they not Mass said in their college? answer was made that it was unlawful and had been abrogated by several acts of parliament. On Saturday the 22nd, a messenger was dispatched to court who returned with fresh instructions on Monday night; what they were, we may guess by their proceedings on Tuesday, for they sent for smiths to break open the president's lodgings, and upon their refusal to commit this burglary, their lordships' men and some vain and idle people about the town with iron bars and other instruments of violence broke open Dr. Hough's house, and Charnock entering drank the bishop of Oxford's health, but I should have said, that they had installed Wiggins his chaplain before, none of the fellows assisting at the ceremony, and the bishop's lady came to town to see how she liked her new dwelling. After this all the fellows were threatened with ejection if they did not submit, and were asked whether they would submit to the king's mandate; answer was made, that they would in every thing that was not contrary to the laws of the land and the statutes of the College.

Then they were ordered every one to subscribe the submission with their own hand, one or two subscribed without any salvo or restriction, amongst whom was Dr. Smith the traveler as I am informed, all the rest with the — salvo to the laws of the land, and the statutes of the college, and some added the right of Dr. Hough. This subscription was very foolishly done, for either it signified nothing, and then why should they do it to provoke his majesty, as if they had a mind to prevaricate with him, and make the commissioners and the nation believe they yielded, or if they did signify any thing then they betrayed their own and other men's rights, and slurred their former brave and honest perseverance, and gave an inch to them they would soon take an ell. I should have excepted Dr. Fairfax who would have read a paper against all these proceedings, for which he was ordered to leave the college in 14 days, but let me tell you how this was construed. The wise men in the town and University concluded that Magdalen men had done a weak and foolish act, if not basely yielded: the generality from the quaker to the highest churchmen cried shame on them, and letters were sent to all parts I suppose to tell the news. The commissioners were all and low to the fellows, and tidings were sent to court how far the point was gained. But the submission did not signify to his majesty, wherefore the commissioners, signified on Thursday, October 28, that their submission was not full enough, that his majesty expected an address from them, wherein they should acknowledge their former contempt, wherein also they should do well to insert something concerning the civility and kindness of their lordships. Then Dr. Bayly stood up and said, I perceive your lordships as well as others have misunderstood our subscription, we never intended to submit to the bishop of Oxford, but to his majesty: nor did we ever mean to obey his majesty contrary to the laws of the land, and the statutes of the college, &c. One Mr. Fulham said that their lordships had illegally ejected their president, for which he was suspended, and then they adjourned to the 16th of November next. I should have told you that Dr. Hough in his examination represented to their lordships how his case was unparalleled by any example in the reign of his majesty or predecessors, that he should be condemned at London and a sentence of deprivation issued out against him, and fixed on the college gates, before he was either heard or cited: much endeavour was used to bring the Doctor to comply, he was closeted a great while, but to no purpose. Their lordships had no mind to be overheard, by townsmen or scholars of other colleges, and threatened to lay the townsmen by the heels, and the scholars also if the proctor did not keep them in order, using this expression, that if the civil power did not do, the military should. They removed their court from the hall at ——— to the common room and would examine every man by himself, yet they declared they would not speak, if they had not of their own society such as could witness what they said, as well as their lordships could set it down, nor would Dr. Hough speak till he had one allowed him to write down what he said of his side as well as their lordships had on theirs.

The University treated their lordships with two excellent sermons on Sunday, October 23, which touched them to the quick if their consciences were not seared: they lived nobly while they staid, and drank his majesty ten pounds worth of claret; I leave you to judge what service such men do to his majesty, whom God long preserve, and deliver from the disaffection and hatred of his subjects which such unconscionable men labour to bring upon him.

I only give you a sum of proceedings as well as I could remember, I suppose you may have a more particular and exact relation from other hands. I pretend not to give any man's answer in his own words, but as nigh his sense as I could recollect from the relations of those that had been there present.

My duty to my good lord and all his noble family, my humble service to all the ladies and gentlemen, and my love to my sister. I am to preach Nov. 27, at St. Mary's, my own turn. I am afraid I shall not be able to come over before his lordship's departure out of the country: if I do not, I hope you will excuse your humble servant,

T. E.

Oct. 31, 1687, Christ-Church, Oxon.

Dr. Ven, master of Baliol college, is dead, and Mr. Mander, an honest man, is chosen in his stead; we were afraid of a mandate for a Papist, but the headship is so small, that they thought it perhaps not worth looking after.

[Having thus set forth Dr. Thomas Smith's Relation of these Transactions, and of his share in them, I will subjoin a different representation of several particulars, occurring in some Letters belonging to the archives of Corpus Christi college, Oxford, which I have been permitted to transcribe. These Letters are fifteen in number, of one (the third here inserted) the cover appears to have been torn off; it has neither signature, date, seal, or address, but appears to have been written on October 23rd or 24th, 1687. None are signed but those of July 31, September 25, and November 18. They all appear to have been written to Dr. Thomas Turner (brother of Francis bishop of Ely, See the Case of the Seven Bishops,) who was elected president of Corpus Christi college in February, 1688, N. S. The address of that of October 28, is cancelled, but appears to have been like the other thirteen: "To the reverend Dr. Thomas Turner at Ely-house in Holborn, London;" and most of them to have been written by William Sherwin, probably a fellow of Corpus, and a relative to the person of that name who was demy of Magdalen.]

N^o. I.

Sir; Though it is very likely that you will have a better account from London of Magdalen college proceedings before the commissioners on Friday last, than what I shall give you, yet I would not omit letting you know what came to the college by a person they employed on purpose. My lord chancellor heard all their evidence against Farmer very calmly, and when some of the managers of his side would have produced something by way of re-criminating, he told them he would hear nothing, unless they could by any substantial proof invalidate any thing that had been said; upon which one Brockwell, formerly of Magdalen hall, and as very a rascal as any in the bunch, swore directly against what a gentleman had before sworn, but my lord chancellor gave him a sharp reproof, and it is thought will have something more to say to him. What was made out against Farmer was so scandalous, that Obadiah and his other friends being in the court could not say one word, the evidence of the college being most of them people of good report. The conclusion was that my lord chancellor told Farmer, that that court looked on him as a very bad man, and the college do believe they are fully discharged of him. On Friday next they are to answer why they did not all appear according to the citation; Dr. Bernard has brought another letter to the college and they have admitted him; our bishop lives at Cudsdon, but the clergy do not very much resort to his house; Mr. Davies gives you his service; all your friends at the college are well; Dr. Fairfax continues still at London.—Sir, I am your obedient servant, July 31.

WILL. SHERWIN.

N^o. II.

Sir;

Sept. 25.

In my last I gave you an account of Magdalen college, and that they had appeared before his majesty, who gave them (it is thought) the sharpest reprimand that ever he gave to any of his subjects, with a command forthwith to elect the bishop of Oxford, but they rather chose to fall under his majesty's displeasure than put themselves in the least danger by breaking their oaths. Their answer was given in to his majesty, and they have some reason to think that likewise both their petitions; there has been no farther trouble given them yet; neither do they know which way it is designed to proceed against them; it is the opinion of most that my lord of Oxford's pretensions will not long continue, he being under such circumstances that he is not like to live but a very short time; he has never been well since he came into this country; that day his majesty left Oxford there was a letter brought to Mr. Vice Chancellor (but the king's name was not to it) for the making Mr. Weikins and Mr. Collins, both chaplains to the bishop of Oxford, doctors, and his secretary Mr. Brook, B. L. and Mr. Sparks and Balew, doctors, but the convocation denied them all; Mr. Weikins has been at Windsor, it is thought for a mandate, but there is nothing appears but a letter from my lord Sunderland; I am afraid when it is proposed they will find the convocation of the same humour as before; Mr. Collins has lost all his friends in the university, and it is thought would willingly have a fair opportunity to declare, but they think he will see how it goes with my lord concerning that college.—Sir, I am, your most obedient servant,

W. SHERWIN.

N^o. III.

Sir; I shall give you as good an account of the affairs of Magdalen college, as my memory will give me leave. On Wednesday last Mr. Aderbery fixed the citation at the gates, wherein Mr. John Hough, the pretended president, with the fellows and scholars of the college, were warned to appear in their chapel between nine and ten on Friday the 21st. The commissioners (the bishop of Chester, my lord chief justice, and Mr. Justice Jenner,) came in on Thursday in the afternoon, attended with their own officers, and with the troops of this place, their swords being all drawn; on Friday morning they came to the chapel, and from thence adjourned to the hall, where after the commission was read, my lord of Chester made a speech, in which he was pleased to tell that society, that they were a company of obstinate, stubborn, contumacious, petulant, and I know not what, I think, rebels, and then the fellows names were called, and adjourned till two in the afternoon: when they came at that time and were sat, they called the rest of the names of that society; then the president desired a copy of the commission, but it was evaded by telling him he might hear it read a second time, but Mr. President said there was some words which seemed to give them power to alter the statutes, to which Mr. President said he could not submit; upon which the bishop said, If you cannot submit to an alteration, you being sworn to the statutes, why do you not read mass? Mr. P. My lord, if there be any part of the statutes against the law, they do not oblige; I hope your lordship knows reading of mass to be against the law: His lordship was pleased to say he did; then Mr. President desired he might put in a protestation in behalf of himself and the college, which was, that they owned the power of the visitors as far as their commission agreed with the laws of the land and the statutes of that college: my lord chief justice said they would act no otherwise; then there was a petition read on the behalf of Dr. Rogers, an old organist, necessity pleaded to it; Mr. President asked if they would take an answer from the college to that matter, but they took little notice of that, and then adjourned till Saturday morning, eight o'clock, in the common room, where the president was called in alone, and after an hour's discourse my lord of Chester ordered some of the fellows to be called in, when his lordship three times declared the president's place void, and forbid any respect to be shewed him as president, and that he should deliver his keys; to which Mr. President made answer, that he had been an hour in private, and therefore desired what had been then said might be published, and withal said that he should not deliver his keys, which would be giving up his freehold, which he was resolved not to do; Dr. Fairfax had not appeared till this morning, when he was asked in private whether he would consent to admit the bishop of Oxford president, he made them no other answer but that they had suspended him, and made him incapable. Then the doctor desired in the name of the society, that what had been said to the president in private might be published, which was readily granted; and the president when he had heard it allowed of it; then the doctor said he would put in his plea in Westminster-hall, concerning his suspension. Then the president and the doctor were dismissed, and the fellows called in and his majesty's mandate read for the electing the bishop of Oxford, and the fellows called according to their seniority, to give in their answer whether they would admit him or not. It would be too tedious to give particulars, but in general they all said, that they could not without great violence on their consciences do it, except Dr. Thomas Smith, who shewed his compliance, as did likewise Mr. Charnock: then the commissioners adjourned till two in the afternoon; when the society was met there was a letter read which all the fellows that was then in town had subscribed; it was to this effect, that when they were sent to concerning the admission of the bishop of Oxford, they said the place was already full, they all answered, that they did do it and were of the same opinion still, when that was done Mr. President desired to be heard a word, which was granted; My lords, you have this morning declared my place void, my lords, I do disown your proceedings which are past, and now and whatever shall be hereafter concerning me or the college, and do appeal to his majesty and his courts of justice: upon which the rabble made a hum; and the lords commissioners charged Mr. President with it (though he offered to make oath that he knew not one man that did commit that great rudeness) and have bound him to answer it in Westminster-hall, and then adjourned till Tuesday morning.—Sir, the former relation is as near as I could gather it, but far from being exact.

N^o IV.

Sir;

Oct. 25, 1687.

Since my last, I find men keep up their courage and resolution, knowing their cause just, and therefore rely upon one above the reach of civil or military force wherewith it is said the L. C. J. threatened to maintain his commission; on which account an express was sent on Saturday at night to London; they told Dr. Hough it was a breach of the peace to lye in the President's lodgings, which he has not done since Saturday. Dr. H. Smith of Ch. Ch. and one Mr. Entwistle of Br. C. preached before the Commissioners on Sunday, in both which sermons my Ld. B. of C. conceives that he was reflected upon, as serving another cause than he pretends to own: in so much, that he thinks himself obliged to declare to all that come near him since, that he will live and die in the communion of the Church of England. It is said that the ground of this commission is raised from what you find in Wood's History of Oxford, l. 1, p. 291, A. D. 1568, but the case much different: Cole, for whom the queen's mandate was sent, statutably eligible: Horn, bishop of Winchester, the local visitor, first of the commissioners, &c. Upon Dr. Hough's desire to know for what he was bound to his good behaviour, it was replied, that he gave the occasion of that disturbance by what he had said: the main question to the fellows was, whether they would assist at the admittance of the bishop of Oxon President of Mag. Col. Dr. T. Smith only complied, though they took other answers for concessions, which truly were not so. Dr. T. Smith told the bishop of Oxon's son on Sunday, Now we have routed the president, and shall see your father here shortly: there is a design to manage the discontented for want of preferment, to make their complaints against the bishops for preferring their kindred, &c. This I tell you to let you know I am none of the number.

Your's.

N^o V.

Sir;

October 27.

In my last, I gave you an account that Mr. President's name was dashed out of the book on Saturday night, and upon his protesting against their proceedings there was hum in the room, for which they charge Mr. President of being guilty of a riot, and have bound him in 2,000*l.* bond to appear in Westminster-hall the 12th of the next month. On Tuesday morning the Commissioners came to the college, where the worthy Mr. Wickins, chaplain to our good bishop, was ready to wait on them; they immediately went into the chapel where Wickins was installed as proxy for the bishop; there was not one of the foundation assisting, except Collins and one Haselwood, a chaplain who will as soon as he can get any thing, prove himself a knave; when they had done this, the Commissioners went to the lodging doors, where, with some trouble, they procured a smith to break them open, and put Mr. Wickins in possession; the good lady came within an hour, she longed to be there; the bishop is not yet come. In the afternoon the fellows were called, and the Commissioners put this question to them, Whether they would submit to the bishop, the king having by his supreme power, made him President of that place; Dr. Fairfax was first called, who having not submitted to the court, was pronounced no fellow, and has 14 days time to remove; upon which, he put this protestation against their sentence: That it was lex nulla, and so far forth as it should appear to be aliqua, that it was iniqua et injusta, therefore from it he did appeal to the king and his courts of justice. The judges were pleased to tell him that it might probably come before them, and he should be sure of justice. The greater part of the fellows designed on Monday to give an answer to the same purpose; but I am told upon the advice of friends, Dr. Jeane and other good men, they all agreed in the following answer: Whereas it has pleased his majesty to put the bishop of Oxford into our college as President, we whose names are here underwritten do promise we will obey him as far as it stands with the law of the land and the statutes of the college, it being no way prejudicial to the right of Dr. Hough. The Commissioners would fain have the clause concerning Dr. Hough left out, and promise that it shall be to the same effect. It would be a kindness if this was sent as the last.

Sir, I am, your obedient Servant.

The Commissioners conclude this morning. My Lord of Ch. has made great complaint that he has no respect.

This morning the Commissioners met again at Mag. Coll. and required that the society should give it under their hands that whatever they had hitherto done was obstinacy in them and that they were sorry for their so doing, and to own themselves to be wholly in an error in opposing the king's mandate, upon which the fellows went together, and by Dr. Bayly gave this answer; that they had committed no crime and therefore could not beg pardon, and withal said, to prevent any farther misunderstanding, that they would explain the meaning of their first answer, that when they said they would submit, they did not mean that they would obey the bishop as president in licitis et honestis, but all that they meant by it was that they would not oppose the royal authority which put him into the college. They were all asked if this were their answer, which they owned. Mr. Fulham was suspended for saying that the bishop was not lawfully put in, and if they had been resolved to do it as they had done by force, it should have been by a Posse Comitatus; my lord chief justice answered that the bishop had more right to be president and [than] they had to be fellows, and would continue so much longer, and that the posse would be amongst them before it should be long. They have adjourned to the 16th of the next month,

Sir, I am, your obedient servant.

If you please to send this as the former.

I was in such haste when I wrote my last that I have almost forgot what was in it, therefore I shall give you the trouble of this with the particulars of Friday's action. So soon as the commissioners were sat; My lord of Chester told them, Gentlemen, his majesty is not pleased with your answer, and does expect from you an address in which you shall own all your proceedings to be in disobedience to the king, and in the same address (though we do not require that of you) if you acknowledge the great civilities* you have received from us your visitors, it will be well taken, upon which there was this general answer made; that they were not conscious of any fault they had committed and whatever trouble had of late befallen the college, was from a due observation of their statutes and to preserve their oaths; from which they would never recede; Mr. Fulham who had not before appeared, protested against their proceedings, and they have suspended him during the king's pleasure, then the fellows were ordered to go forth and consider of an answer; which they returned in these words; My lords, we have endeavoured in all our actions to express our duty with all humility to his majesty, and being conscious to ourselves in the whole conduct of this business before your lordships, that we have done nothing but what our oaths and statutes indispensably oblige us to, so we cannot make any declaration whereby we acknowledge we have done any thing amiss; as having acted according to the principles of loyalty and obedience to his sacred majesty, as far as we could without doing violence to our consciences and prejudice to our rights, one of which we humbly conceive that of electing a president to be, from which we are sworn upon no account whatsoever to depart; we therefore humbly beg your lordship to present this favourably with our utmost duty to his majesty, whom God grant long and happily to reign over us. As to the advice mentioned in my last, I cannot be positive; neither would I willingly make too near an inquiry: but this I am sure, that there was very few in that society but had made full resolutions at first to do what they will appear to do in the last; and whatever misconstructions are made of their first answer at present, will be made fully satisfactory in the end.

Sir, I am your obedient servant.

I must beg you to continue your trouble in sending this.

I am very unwilling to give either of those worthy persons names who are reported to advise with the college in that answer which seemed a compliance; but whoever shall talk with any of the fellows of Magdalen college, they are so far from thinking themselves in any fault, that they very highly justify that action. And they do not wonder that the world should be so mistaken as to make a false construction of it, since the lords commissioners did themselves do so, and make report of it above as if they had now secured the business they came about ; I mean in bringing the college to a submission and acknowledgement of their fault: when I have told you that the same time that the seeming compliance was delivered to the commissioners, this petition was likewise delivered; and if they had compared both together and considered of it, they would have suspended their sending an account of the college's compliance. I have the good fortune to be frequently with those good men at Magdalen college, and I am fully persuaded that as they will always appear loyal, so all persons will find them persons of great honesty and good conscience.

* So in Mrs. Cellier's Case, vol. 7, p. 1183, baron Weston, after grossly abusing her, tells her, I have not been noted to be a person that use any great severity towards any body.

Sir, I am your obedient servant.

Dr. Fairfax is come to my house ; he gives you his service.

I beg you would give yourself the trouble as formerly.

* To the Right Reverend and Right Honorable his Majesty's Commissioners for the visiting of St. Mary Magdalen College in Oxford.

May it please your lordships ;

On Friday last in the afternoon, you seemed to insist very much on this particular, That his majesty in commanding the fellows of the said college to elect Mr. Farmer president, did thereby inhibit them to elect any other person whatsoever, (which has not yet been made appear to be law, either out of the books of civil, canon or common law ; neither is it agreeable to reason, that a command to elect a person incapable, should include an obligation not to elect a person capable ; that being a kind of contradiction 'in terminis,' yet this being granted, it cannot in the least affect the fellows or invalidate their election of Dr. Hough, notwithstanding his majesty's mandate in behalf of Mr. Farmer, who being incapable of the place, the fellows cannot be said to be guilty of any disobedience or disloyalty in proceeding to the election of another person who was qualified according to the statutes, being forced to make an election : for they are obliged by the statutes of the college, when called together to elect a president or any other officer, under pain of perpetuall expulsion from the college to meet and make an election ; which punishment they incur 'ipso facto,' who either refuse to meet when so called, or being met, not to nominate or elect a person into the office then void : as appears by the statutes of the college, 'de numero scholarium et electione presidentis.' Now according to the founder's directions in the statute ; on the fifteenth of April last past, the fellows were called together by the vice-president to elect a president in the place of Dr. Clark deceased ; and the oath required to be taken before the election, was administered to them by the vice-president, whereby they are obliged to nominate and elect one that is, or has been, fellow of Magdalen college, or New college, in Oxford : which oath when the Fellows had taken, it was not in their power to elect Mr. Farmer, and yet they were then obliged to make an election, under pain of perpetuall amotion from the college, as appears by the said statutes ; and it cannot be imagined that his most sacred majesty did expect that the fellows should be either perjured, or forfeit their right to their fellowships, rather than disobey his commands ; his majesty having most graciously declared that conscience ought not to be forced ; and that none of his subjects should be molested in the enjoyment of their rights and privileges. Now that our proceedings at the election cannot lay any imputation of disobedience or disloyalty upon us, will thus be made appear ; either we had power to elect a president, or we had not: if we had not, to what end or purpose did his majesty command us to elect one ; if we had, our power was either restrained to persons so and so qualified, or we were at liberty to choose whom we pleased ; but we could not do the latter, as appears by our statutes, and therefore we could not elect Mr. Farmer, being not invested with any power to elect a person unqualified ; and if we had so done, our election would have been null and void in itself, and the person elected liable to be turned out by our visitor.

As for the decree of his majesty's commissioners (in pursuance of which your lordships have admonished Mr. Hough to recede from the place of president, and quietly to resign the keys of his office, and have struck his name out of the college books), we humbly conceive it to be null and void in itself, to all intents and purposes ; Dr. Hough being thereby deprived of a freehold for life, of which he was duly and legally possessed, without ever being called to defend his right, or any misdemeanour objected against him. Wherefore we humbly beg leave of your lordships, that Dr. Hough may be permitted to defend his right and title to the presidentship at common law, before any other person be put in possession of his place :

On Tuesday the commissioners came to Oxford (the same as before without any alteration) they were attended by the troops as formerly, they alighted at Magdalen College, where they were received by the bishop, the dean, Obadiah, old Joyner and other of the gang. On Wednesday morning Aderbury fixed a paper on the College gates, in which Dr. Fairfax his expulsion was declared by the high commissioners : at nine in the morning they went into the common room where my lord of Chester made a speech, in which his lordship gave them much the same language as he did in the last; and was pleased to droll upon their consciences; but in the conclusion told them that they had now brought an instrument, which they were all desired to subscribe (except Mr. Charnock and Dr. Rougery*, whose behaviour they were already well satisfied with,) but all the rest immediately upon sight of the paper did refuse being 25, and upon that the commissioners struck their names out of the book, and fixed their expulsion (as they are pleased to call it) on the college gates; they have admitted Joyner and Alibone fellows, and Jenniver, A. M. and Higgins an undergraduate, two of the demies fellows likewise; some of the undergraduate demies, that last time the commissioners were here had shewed their willingness to conform, were called in and offered fellowships, but their consciences being awakened they refused; there was two young lads made demies, how and when the rest of the places will be filled we know not. The senior demies in the name of the rest denied the subscription, but was bid begone and no notice taken of it, by which means they are left to a farther execution, being resolved not to own these people that are like to be set over them; Haselwood a chaplain, who had formerly herded with Charnock and that gang; made about a week since a solemn recantation voluntarily to the whole society; wherein he acknowledges he had done very ill things, of which he heartily repented; and being by the commissioners offered a fellowship refused it, and said he could not own any president in Magdalen College but Dr. Hough, this the substance of what was done; the commissioners went out of town by one of the clock on Wednesday in the afternoon. The paper will give you an account who are the sufferers.

Pray shew it and this to the gentleman.

Sir; this is the account I received from Oxford, concerning the business of Magdalen College. The commissioners dined on Thursday with the bishop of Oxford in the President's lodgings and lay there that night, the next day the court sat, and the bishop of Chester read a long speech to the fellows aggravating their fault, and charging them with obstinacy and rebellion, then they were required to subscribe a paper, much of the same import with the former, 25 of them refused to subscribe and were immediately turned out. Dr. T. Smith, Mr. Charnock and Mr. Thomson, having submitted before, it was not tendered to them. Here were 8 absent, Dr. Younger, Mr. Smith, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Hicks, Mr. Holt, Mr. Goodwin, and one more, 3 places vacant, and Mr. Hooper's the madman, which makes up the number of forty; the subscription was not tendered to the demyes, they admitted Mr. Joyner and Mr. Allibone, and two demies, Jinnevor and Higgins, fellows; fellowships were proffered to more and to persons of other houses, but were not accepted.

In my last I gave you the fatall account of Magdalen College. I am apt to think it will not be unacceptable to you, to hear the state of that place, since the dissolution. By the way give me first leave to tell you that Dr. —* Smith on Friday morning asked leave of the bishop to go out of town, which he denied him, telling him that there was no one that understood the college business, and therefore he must not go; on which the Doctor told his lordship that he had leave given by the society before he came to the college, which leave he took to be legal, and therefore would go. Dr. Pudsey, it is feared, will make good an old saying that a truly covetous man cannot be honest; but you shall hear more of this; the demies I told you offered to deny the subscription, but were bid begone and no notice taken of them; since that they have denied any power over them in that College and do refuse to capp, they constantly keep prayers, one of the Mr. Demies reads; they likewise keep disputations and other exercises, a master looking over the B. A. and A. B. the undergraduates; there was a cloth laid in the hall for the undergraduate fellow above the graduate demies; which they ordered the butler to take away, but he being timorous, they did it themselves; telling the undergraduate fellow, that the statutes of that place did not admit that any foundation undergraduate should take place of a graduate, and while they stayed in the college he should not have it, upon which he went out of the hall; Charnock sent to the undergraduates to come and narrare, to which they sent this answer; that they were deprived of their deans and lawful officers, and did resolve not to obey any other. Charnock tells them that to morrow he shall take upon him the office of dean, and they are resolved not to obey him nor the bishop, so that there is great hopes by the latter end of this week, that they will be in the same circumstances with their governors, the thing they heartily wish for. Two young men of Merton College (they say kinsmen of the bishop of Chester) were sworn demies, but I am told by a worthy man of Merton College that the young men are ashamed of it and will never go to that unhappy college. The Vice Chancellor being the day of execution invited by the bishop to dine with the company, returned this answer, that he did not like with colonel Kirk to dine under the gallows.* You need not speak this publicly; if my friend comes to wait on you be pleased to let him see this.

I received your last kind letter, the contents of which I imparted to some of those worthy men of Magdalen College (but not your name) they return you their most hearty thanks, not only for your kind offer in assisting them, but your good advice, which I doubt not but will be followed; they are all getting out of town as fast as they can, they being so much importuned by friends to entertainments, that they can no other way prevent but by leaving this place. I am very well assured that a great many of them (being so suddenly thrown out) will be put to hard shifts, but at present those (that they are most ready to recommend to the assistance of friends) are Mr. Harwar and Mr. Peniston, they are both very honest gentlemen, who have never had (scarce) any thing from their friends, has made their circumstances such that I believe they are more in debt than they can well pay; and their creditors here are not so kind as has been expected; Mr. Goodwin by sickness in London was prevented from coming down to suffer with his friends, he sent two letters in which he declared his resolution to disown the jurisdiction, the one of which was given to the commissioners, and although he is not by them expelled, yet he resolves not to come to the college any more. He is a sober honest man, and I doubt not but Mr. Davies will acquaint you that he is a person highly deserving, and I am sure that his circumstances are but low in the world, he is at this time at captain Beale's in the Old Palace Yard; the demies continue still as I acquainted you, and do use all endeavours that they may be relieved from that place. I have had offers of a fellowship for my son more than once, but I thought my first answer would have prevented a second, which was that my son was capable of no favour in Merton College, but from Dr. Hough the president and those worthy gentlemen that are turned out, and when it shall please God to restore them to their rights he would be sure to have what he deserved, I thank God he is honest and has in himself courage enough to withstand any of their temptations, and has from the beginning behaved himself to the satisfaction of all that worthy society.

Sir, I am your most obedient servant.

It is so long since I wrote to you, that it makes me choose to give you the trouble of this rather than be thought guilty of a neglect. We every day expect the commissioners at Magdalen College, and then you will soon hear that all persons now in the college will be dismissed; the chaplains and clerks, who are under no oaths, are quitting the college as fast as they can, by reason they would not be thought disobedient to the king's command. In my last I gave you an account that the most of the demies had resolved never to own that power which was put over them, it being so positively against their oaths, to which they still continue; they do not cap any of them, nor Charnock that was there before; about a fortnight since Charnock singled out Will., not only for a prejudice that he had taken against him for being by when they broke open some of the fellows doors, and telling the persons to be careful of what they did; but I believe something for mine and the —* sake who was his patron, he demanded of him why he did not give him respect; to which he answered, he gave him what the statutes required, and he thought more than his due, he being the only man that refused to give any respect to the president; Charnock immediately commanded the cook to let him have no more commons, and then crossed his name in the buttery; which Will. took off again, and told him he had no more power to put him out of commons or cross his name than one of the turnspits, and immediately went to Mr. Hawles and told him that in the absence of the president and officers, he came to him as the proper person to make his complaint, that Mr. Charnock being no officer, had contrary to the statutes, deprived him of his commons, and therefore required him to command the cook to give it him; and for his not capping he would desire the statute might be produced, and he would submit to any punishment therein appointed, Mr. Hawles promised he would do it; but soon after told him Charnock was dean, and that he must submit to him, or else he would be called before the bishop the next day, to which he made this answer, that if the bishop were at Cudesden he would readily wait on him; but not in the president's lodgings, and that he did disown all power in the bishop as president, and to Charnock as dean; which put me in great hopes they would have struck his name out of the book: but Charnock has told him that he shall in a short time be looking through an iron grate. On Christmas day Jenifer sat senior of the hall, the masters and batchellor demies rose without leave, upon which Charnock commanded the cook to give them no more commons, and crossed all their names, they all struck off their crosses, and went immediately to Mr. Hawles and required their commons, but he like a base coward, refused to do it, upon which they told him the next day they expected a positive answer from him whether he would or not, and then they would proceed another way. He told them something of the bishop, but they disowned all power but his in the college, yesterday the cook was privately ordered to give them all their commons again. It is expected when the commissioners come they will all be expelled the university, which which is no terror to them, choosing rather to beg their bread with a safe conscience than to yield themselves to perjury. Sir, I am your obedient servant.

Mr. Craddock, Mr. Davies, Mr. Penystone, and Mr. Harwar have had institution to small livings. Dr. Pudsey is gone from the college.

I have a great while designed to send you an account of the whole proceedings against Magdalen College, but I write a bad hand and there is a great deal of it, which has been the reason I have not yet done it, but do intend to give you the trouble, in the mean time I thought fit to acquaint you that these following persons have brought their mandates for fellowships, and I am told his lordship has been pleased to inform them, that it would be very necessary for them to have mandates for their degrees, the university being a stubborn people that would do nothing but by force, Richard Crompton, Thomas Fairfax, Edw. Merideth, John Dreyden,* Phil. Lewis, Alex. Cotton, Tho. Guilford, William Plowden, John Christmas, Lawrence Wood, John Ross, Aug. Belson ; Hills and Cuffand, Demies, all Papists, yesterday they brought their mandates for offices which are, Chernock vice president, to Smith, Hawles, and Joiner, Bursars, Lewis, de [qu. dean] of divinity, Fairfax and Alibone deans of art. I received your last, and return you my most humble thanks for your kindness in it ; Mr. D—— being with you before this makes me think it needless to give you any account of that matter you mentioned. I hope you received the papers, which I had sent you long since could I had time to put them together. On Sunday last the virtuous Mr. Charnock vice president of Magdalen College, crossed most of the demies, and sent them word the bishop commanded them to appear before him at two o'clock on Monday, they returned this answer, that no one now in that college had any power over them, neither would they obey any commands from them, upon which the book was sent for to the bishop, and these following persons names struck out : Mr. Holt, Mr. Addams, Mr. Vesey, Mr. Braborne, Dr. Hyde, Dr. Woodward, Dr. Fulham, Dr.

Sir, I am your obedient servant.

In one of the letters is inclosed a list of the thirty seven actual fellows of the college, some of whose names are distinguished by the mark of Ab. The names of Dr. Thomas Smith, Mr. Thomson and Mr. Charnock are distinguished by a cross. And the following note is made to the list, " Those gentlemen which you find Ab I believe will all be turned out, and for those that are crossed I think of Dr. Pelham's opinion, that no man of sense would ever quit a fellowship unless he was required to deny the Holy Trinity."

In order to prove that king James did not upon the disaster which befel the prince of Orange's fleet, upon its first sailing, design to retract his concessions respecting Magdalen College, M^r Pherson has inserted in his " Original Papers" some passages from the MS. of Dr. Smith, and he subjoins to them the following Articles:

" A letter from the bishop of Winchester, visitor of Magdalene College, throws further light on a subject, for which James has been, without reason, much blamed. But though that prince was guilty of an act of folly, in depriving the fellows, he appears to have known nothing in the delay of their being restored."

" The Bishop of Winchester to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

" May it please your Grace,

" I intend to-morrow to set forward for Oxon, and ordered several of the fellows of Magdalene to meet me there, on Tuesday and Wednesday at the farthest ; though I have not seen or heard of the president. But, about two of the clock, I received the inclosed order, which stops my journey for the present ; and I shall accordingly issue forth my citation. All people's mouths are now full of praises for our order, to whom, they say, they shall ever owe the preservation of our religion. I beg the favour of your grace's commands, which shall always be obeyed, by

Your Grace's obedient Son and Servant,
Farnham Castle, P. WINCHESTER."
Oct. 14, 1688.

" The truth of the following anecdote is established by collateral evidence. The delay in restoring the fellows, however, has been variably [qu. invariably] brought as an irrefragable proof of James's design of retracting his concessions, upon hearing that the prince of Orange had been brought back by a storm. This storm certainly happened not till a day or two after Sunderland wrote the official letter, which brought the bishop of Winchester so precipitately to London. Though the folly of James merits no favour, his misfortunes ought to command justice.

An Anecdote concerning the same subject, from Mr. G. Clark, at Oxford.

"He (Mr. G. Clark) shewed me too Mr. Finch warden of All Souls' letter to him of the twenty-first of October 1688, giving an account of a messenger coming to bishop Mew, at nine the night before, after the bishop was in bed, with an order from Sunderland to the bishop to be at the council on the twenty-second, at ten in the morning,* upon which, the bishop set out on the twenty-first, without restoring the fellows of Magdalen College, though he was come down on purpose for it. No cause was mentioned in the order; but it was a general one to all the council, to be present at the enrolling the depositions of the birth of the prince of Wales. The messenger had gone to Farnham and thence followed the bishop to Oxford. The king, when he saw the bishop at London, asked him if he had restored the fellows; and finding he had not, was very angry and sent him down to do it, on the twenty-fifth. The prince of Orange's fleet was drove back by a storm, on the 21st of October, O. S. He came that evening into Helvoetsluys, with eighty transports; and sent orders next day to admiral Herbert, to send the transports with the cavalry to him, and told him his resolution to sail the first fair wind. I read several of the prince's letters and lord admiral Herbert's letters proving this fact. So king James could have no notice of it to recall, as is pretended, the order he had given bishop Mew to restore the fellows.

T. CARTE."

Original Papers, vol. 1, p. 272.

The following shrewd observations of Adam Smith (Wealth of Nations, book 5, c. 1,) are so applicable to the course of violence pursued by James, that I hope the insertion of them here will not be thought impertinent:

"Fear is in almost all cases a wretched instrument of government, and ought in particular never to be employed against any order of men who have the smallest pretensions to independency. To attempt to terrify them serves only to irritate their bad humour and to confirm them in an opposition which more gentle usage

* The following is probably a copy of the circular letters which Sunderland wrote to the Bishops at this time:

"The Earl of Sunderland to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

"Whitehall, Oct. 20th, 1688.

"My Lord; The king commands me to acquaint your Grace, that he desires you, and such others of my lords the bishops as are in town, should attend him upon Monday next, at ten in the evening. I am, &c.

"SUNDERLAND, P."

perhaps might easily induce them either to soften or to lay aside altogether. The violence which the French government usually employed in order to oblige all their parliaments or sovereign courts of justice to enregister any unpopular edict very seldom succeeded. The means commonly employed, however, the imprisonment of all the refractory members, one would think were forcible enough. The princes of the House of Stuart sometimes employed the like means in order to influence some of the members of the parliament of England, and they generally found them equally intractable. The parliament of England is now managed in another manner, and a very small experiment which the duke of Choiseul made about twelve years ago upon the parliament of Paris demonstrated sufficiently that all the parliaments of France might have been managed still more easily in the same manner. That experiment was not pursued. For though management and persuasion are always the easiest and safest instruments of government, as force and violence are the worst and the most dangerous, yet such it seems is the natural insolence of man that he almost always disdains to use the good instrument except when he cannot or dare not use the bad one."

Hume admits that "as intelligence arrived of a great disaster which had befallen the Dutch fleet it is commonly believed that the king recalled for some time the concessions which he had made to Magdalen College." And in archbishop Sancroft's Journal of what passed between the king and the bishops concerning an 'abhorrence' of the designs of the prince of Orange, (Collectanea Curiosa, No. LXXI) the following passage seems to render it indisputable that at least James had so expressed himself as to cause the visitor to apprehend that his majesty's intention was, that the restitution of Magdalen should be suspended. "He [Sancroft] was introduced to the king, who discoursed to him about many things, as about the restoring of Magdalen College in Oxford; the bishop of Winton mistook his letter, for he never meant to delay the visitation."

In the 'Collectanea Curiosa' are published the docket of king James's license, dispensation and pardon for Obadiah Walker master of university, and three Fellows of colleges in Oxford, May 1686; abstract of the king's license to Walker and his assigns for 21 years to print and sell certain Popish books therein mentioned; the same king's licenses, dispensations, and pardons for Edward Sclater of Putney clerk, May 1686, and John Massey dean of Christ church, December 1686, (as to which last see the Preface to the State Letters, &c. of Henry earl of Clarendon,) and his mandates to All Souls' College Oxford, to present to one of their livings, a Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge; and to archbishop Sancroft, to grant dispensation for Hanbury (one of the king's chaplains) to hold two livings though without distance.

I met Mr. Obadiah Walker about the beginning of October 1687, and had the following accidental discourse with him standing at a door whilst the Foot Guards were marching by.

O. W. What? You think to baffle the king at your college?

T. S. What do you mean? I do not understand your raillery.

O. W. I do not know what you think; but they of the college think and believe so.

Then we discoursed of the king of France his edict; you see, said I to him, what methods they use in France to propagate what they call the Catholic faith, what a horrid thing is it to use such cruelty towards all, who will not fall down and worship a bit of bread.

O. W. Obstinate men are to be forced, the magistrate is not to bear the sword in vain.

T. S. This is to be understood of the punishment of evil doers, you horribly pervert and misapply St. Paul's words.

O. W. They refuse to believe a doctrine of the Catholic church of God.

T. S. Master, I deny that; and you either know, or ought to know the contrary; I will dispute it with you when you will. He replied, When you will, and so left me in a heat.

IN GOD PETER LORD BISHOP OF WINTON,
ON THURSDAY THE 24TH OF OCTOBER, 1688.

November 1, 1688. This may be printed.

On Tuesday the 16th of this instant October, was fixed upon the college-gates and chappel doors, a citation from the bishop of Winton in Latin, (and not injudiciously, for the mother tongue would have been fitter for babes than scholars) to re-call Dr. Hough, the former fellows, demies, &c. by the second of November following, which citation was guarded by Robert Garduer, late porter, who, as he first left the college, so he first returned to it. But this citation together with the bishop's mind, being altered according to a second information, he their restorer, as well as visitor, was sooner received, viz. on Saturday, October the 20th (no doubt for his master's sake) more like the king than his representative; which gave so great satisfaction to the people, that their joy ran over, the musick of the bells being outdone by humms and huzzahs. Thus being attended by more than 300 gentlemen on horseback, and in several coaches, as also by an innumerable company of spectators on foot from Magdalen College to his lodgings at St. John's, he received his first general salute.

But this sun-shine was soon eclipsed; for the next morning by seven of the clock he was remanded by an express, to wait upon and pay a visit to his majesty. This was very pleasing to some Roman Catholics, who, what they wished, easily believed, viz. That the king had recalled the commission, as well as the commissioner.

But on Wednesday following, we were well satisfied, that the king had more kindness for our church, than to answer their expectations, on which day (having before paid his obedience to the king) he privately surprised, and condescended again to visit us.

On Thursday, the 24th of October, about ten in the morning, he made his first visit to Magdalen College, the president, fellows, demies, &c. attending upon, and answering him in their formalities. At his entrance into the quire, having heard an excellent congratulatory speech from Dr. Baily, performed divine service; so devoting himself first to God, he proceeded to execute his office as visitor, the prologue of which was in short to this effect:

'That since his majesty of his gracious clemency was pleased to commission me to restore you the former proprietors of this foundation; in obedience to this command I am come to reinstate you accordingly, resolving to do it legally and statutably.'

From the chapel they were adjourned to the hall, where his lordship not without great applause, made an incomparable speech, a very seasonable piece of advice, consisting chiefly of loyalty and unity: by which he merited as great a trophy for his learning, as he did before for his courage.

Then calling for the college statute book, the statute for visitation was read; after which calling for the buttry book, and tearing out the last weeks names of the Roman Catholic fellows, &c. he gave orders to re-inscribe all the old ones, except Mr. Charnock and two demies, who were preferred since to other fellowships. Then calling them over in order, his lordship published and declared Dr. Hough to be the head or president, and the rest the true legal and statutable members of that foundation, and none others: for which good service Dr. Hough, one who might plead the best desert, as well as propriety to this presidentship, in behalf of the rest, returned his lordship a handsome compliment, in a short but pithy speech.

From hence his lordship was conducted to the visitor's lodgings, where was provided a splendid entertainment: Dr. Hough thereby shewing as great respect to the king's commissioner as he could have done to himself.

In the evening the bells expressed the people's satisfaction: bonfires in the town added great pomp to this celebration.

Having now bid farewell to Magdalen College, his lordship was on Friday and Saturday at Corpus Christi, New College and Trinity, who paid their respect to him in three splendid entertainments. On Sunday he was entertained with two university sermons, a repast for his soul, as the others for his body. The next morning he departed homewards, having received ample testimony of the university's loyalty and generosity. Then follow the names of the president, vice president, fellows, demies, chaplains, clerks, servants, and choristers of the college as entered in the buttery book by the bishop.*

In Mr. Gutch's Introduction to the 'Collectanea Curiosa,' is inserted as from Roger North's MS. Papers under his own hand, the following passage:

"I gave him (Sancroft) a paper or discourse upon the high commission, soon after issued, which deprived the bishop of London. This good man escaped that storm, because he was provided, but not to do, as the bishop did, plead to the jurisdiction, and being overruled, plead not guilty, and go to fending and proving, and at length received their judgment. But he was resolved, if he had been cited, to have brought his protestation (which he kept ready drawn by him) and delivered it to them, and went his way, and never obeyed any sentence, but to defend himself at common law, upon the nullity of their court. This was known, and for that reason, he was not cited. The other way was to deliver up the cause. For it was not to be doubted, they would judge for their own jurisdiction, and the defending after was owning it, as much as before.

"And the like was at Magdalen college: they should not have appeared further, than to protest. The common law and juries would have defended the freeholds, and such mistaken proceedings as these were one means to mislead the king: whereas a stout, regular opposition, as the archbishop intended, would probably have stopt the career.

"After this the archbishop was threatened with a premunire, if he did not confirm bishops without taking the test. I gave him a discourse of premunire, so full and particular, with the very forms at large, that he thanked me for it, and said, he found by the manner, it was done with a particular good will to him, and to instruct him for his safety."

* Burnet tells us that this bishop had been a captain during the wars and had been Middleton's secretary, when he was sent to command the insurrection that the highlanders of Scotland made for the king in 1653. Burnet describes him as knowing very little of divinity or any other learning, and weak to a childish degree.

On the subject of the restoration of Magdalen college, Kennet has the following passages:

"It soon appeared how little the nation was to depend upon these hasty and forced concessions of the king. On Oct. 16, the bishop of Winchester caused a citation to be fixed on the gate of Magdalen-College, to recall Dr. Hough, and the former fellows of that society, by the second of November following; but an account coming that very post, that the Dutch fleet had suffered very much in a storm, and that they would hardly be able to put to sea again till the spring, the bishop upon a frivolous pretence was recalled to London, and the restoration of the College deferred. Yet soon after, that news being contradicted, and the Dutch fleet reported to be in a sailing-posture, the affection to the church of England revived, and so the business of the College was effected on the 24th of that month. This passage is the more remarkable, because it lost king James many friends, and lessened him in his character and interest, as if his politics were to change with the wind, and as news varied he was playing fast and loose with his subjects."

"One of the now fellows of Magdalen college, becoming afterwards rector of Slinbridge in the county of Gloucester, published a sermon on St. Barnabas day, in 1713, in the preface whereto he tells us, 'I happened to be fellow of Magdalen college,—when their blind and greedy zeal began with some of the heads of the university, and a society thereof.—All the rest must soon have taken their turn likewise out of their freeholds, had there not been a Protestant wind. Thereby hangs a tale, which hath not been told publicly, that I know of; and I think it not unseasonable to tell it now, that we may thence learn how to trust Popery another time. When the prince of Orange, our late sovereign of glorious memory, was almost ready to embark, a kind of general intimation was dispatched after us, to return from the several counties whither we were sent a grazing:—But when some of us were come back within four or five hours of the university, a certain notice was sent us on the road, that we need not make much haste, for that the wind was changed at court. But when after some few days, it was feared again there that the prince would shortly arrive, we might go forward; and the bishop of Winchester (the local visitor) was sent down to reinstate us in our college: But his lordship had scarce refreshed himself, before a courier came and beat up his quarters, and required his return to court, without restoring us to our own again: Though it was done at last, when there was a Protestant or rather Providential, wind again.'"

June 1, 1688.

Clerk. CRYER, make proclamation.

Cryer. O yes, O yes, O yes!

Clerk. Keeper of Newgate, bring the prisoners to the bar. (Which was done).

Clerk. You the prisoners at the bar, those men whom you shall hear called, and personally appear, are to try between our sovereign lord the king, and you who are arraigned, upon your several lives and deaths: if you shall except against any one of them, you must speak before they be sworn.

Clerk. Cryer, call Henry Dyer.

The jurors sworn are as followeth: Henry Dyer, Giles Baggs, Matthew Jerman, Timothy Waldoe, Richard Chase, Samuel Burgess, William Villiers, John Frith, John Hill, Obadiah Hickman, John Read, Francis Willis. Who were all sworn.

Clerk. Cryer, count these, twelve good men and true.

Clerk. Cryer, make proclamation. (Which was done).

Clerk. You gentlemen of the jury, look upon the prisoners at the bar, and hearken to their charge; they stand indicted by the names of Rowland Walters, Dearing Bradshaw, and Ambrose Cave, gentlemen, for that they not having the fear of God before their eyes, but being instigated and seduced by the devil, and their own wicked hearts, on the fourth day of May, in the fourth year of the reign of our sovereign lord king James 2, in the parish of St. Nicholas Cole-abbey, in and upon sir Charles Pymm, bart. feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice afore-thought, did make an assault; and that he the said Rowland Walters, having then and there in his right hand, a certain rapier made of iron or steel, of the value of about 5s. him the said sir Charles Pymm in and upon the right side of him the said sir Charles Pymm, a little above the right pap, did strike and thrust as aforesaid; giving him the said sir Charles Pymm, a little above the right pap, one mortal wound of the breadth of one inch, of the depth of ten inches; and that they the said Dearing Bradshaw, and Ambrose Cave, were present aiding, abetting, and assisting him the said Rowland Walters, in the perpetra-tion of the said wilful murder of him the said sir Charles Pymm. So that they three, the prisoners at the bar, with malice afore-thought, did intentionally kill and destroy and wilfully murder him the said sir Charles Pymm, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown, and dignity, and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided. Upon this indictment they have been arraigned, and have hereunto pleaded not guilty, and for their trial, have put themselves upon God and their country, which country you are. Your business is to enquire, whether they, or either of them, committed this felony and murder as aforesaid; if you find them, or either of them, guilty of the said wilful murder, you are to enquire what goods and chattels they, or either of them, had at the time of the committing of the said wilful murder; but if you find them not guilty, you are to say so; and hear your evidence.

Mr. Walters. My lord, I humbly desire these gentlemen may be tried before me.*

Court. That cannot be, Mr. Walters, because you are all three put into one indictment.

Counsel for the king. My lords, and you gentlemen of the jury, I am here retained a counsel for the king, against the prisoners at the bar, who all three stand indicted for the murder of sir Charles Pymm, bart. in the parish of St. Nicholas Cole-abbey, thrusting him through the body near the right pap, giving him a mortal wound, of which he then and there instantly died. The other two prisoners stand indicted for aiding, abetting, and assisting him the said Walters in the said murder.

Another Counsel for the king. My lords, this murder fell out on the fourth day of May last, after this manner, viz. The said sir Charles Pymm, one Mr. Mirriday, Mr. Neale, and sir Thomas Middleton, and others dined at the Swan tavern upon Fish-street-hill; after they were come into the house they went up stairs; after which the prisoners at the bar came into the house and took another room to dine of beef and other things. But one of sir Charles's company desired to have a plate of it; upon which Mr. Cloudsley told them some gentlemen had bespoke it for dinner ; but he said he would get them a plate of it, which was sent up, and ordered to be reckoned into Mr. Walters the prisoner's bill. After dinner they drank their healths, and returned them thanks for their beef ; and towards the evening sir Charles Pymm and his friends came down stairs, and met the prisoners at the bottom, and Mr. Cave asked them how they liked the beef that was sent up ? upon which one in the company answered, and told them, They did not send it, for they had paid for it. Upon which farther words arose, and Mr. Bradshaw drew his sword, and fell upon sir Charles Pymm ; but he got out into the street. After which Mr. Walters came forth and plucked sir Charles Pymm by the arms, and forced him to fight with him, saying, Here is my hand, and here is my sword ; and as soon as he was in the street he received this mortal wound, and so fell down dead. After this, Mr. Walters took him by the nape of the neck, and dashed his head upon the ground, and cried out God damn you, you are dead : and said farther, Let the sword alone in his body. My lord, this shall be proved to be done without any manner of provocation ; and if so, I hope you, gentlemen of the jury, will find him guilty of wilful murder.

Clerk. Call Mr. Mirriday, Mr. Neale, Mr. Palms, and Mr. Bridges. (Who were sworn).

Mr. Mirriday. My lord, on the 4th day of May last, on a Friday, sir Charles Pymm, myself, and these gentlemen here in court, came to dine at the Swan-tavern in Old Fish-street. We asked for meat, and Mr. Cloudsley, the man of the house, told us, we might have fish, for he had no meat, but what was bespoke by Mr. Walters and his company. We desired him to help us to a plate of it, if it might be got, which we had brought up stairs ; after dinner we drank the gentlemen's healths that sent it, and returned them thanks for it. A while after sir Thomas Middleton went away, and about an hour after that or thereabouts, sir Charles Pymm and the rest of us came down to go away ; and when we were in the entry, Mr. Cave met us and asked sir Charles how he liked the beef that was sent up ; who answered, We did not know you sent it, for we have paid for it. Then the boy that kept the bar told us, that he did not reckon it in the bill ; upon which Mr. Cave seemed to take it ill : But, my lord, I cannot be positive whether Mr. Bradshaw and Mr. Palms were at any words. Then I took Mr. Cave to one side into the entry, and he thought that I had a mind to fight him, but I did what I could to make an end of the quarrel. [Upon which the Court highly commended Mr. Mirriday.]

Court. This was in the entry, but where was sir Charles Pymm ?

Mr. Mirriday. He was then in the entry.

Court. Where was Mr. Walters ?

Mirriday. He was at the door, my lord ; but I cannot swear positively to any particular passage as to the murder ; but Mr. Walters called sir Charles Pymm rogue, and gave him very ill words, and I saw him take him by the neck, and force his head downwards, and said, God damn him, he is dead, to the best of my remembrance, my lord. Then, I took sir Charles up in my arms, and pulled the sword out of his body, and then Mr. Walters said, God damn him, let it stay in his guts, or in his body, or words to that effect.

Court. Was Mr. Cave or Mr. Bradshaw at the place where sir Charles fell ?

Mirriday. No, my lord, they were in the entry scuffling there.

Court. What came of Mr. Walters afterwards ?

Mirriday. My lord, he stayed a little till I had pulled the sword out of his body, then he ran away.

Court. Did they draw their swords in the entry ?—Mirriday. I cannot tell that.

Court. Did you see them draw their swords ?

Mirriday. I cannot say sir Charles Pymm's sword was drawn, but I saw Mr. Walters draw his sword in the street.

Court. Do you know whether Mr. Walters was wounded or no ?

Mirriday. I do not know that, for I did not see the wound given.

Court. Mr. Walters, will you ask him any questions ?

Walters. Yes, my lord : Mr. Mirriday, what did you say to sir Charles Pymm, in the fish-monger's shop ? Did you not say, Go, and fight him, and I will be your second ?

Mirriday. My lord, I do not remember one word of that.

Court. Mr. Mirriday, were you in any fish-monger's shop ?

Mirriday. Yes, my lord, I was there ; but I do not remember one word between Mr. Walters and sir Charles, and, as I hope for salvation, I said no such thing ; and that's all I have to say.

Clerk. Cryer, call Mr. Neale.

Mr. Neale. My lord, I went and met with these gentlemen that dined with us at the aforesaid tavern, and we had fish and two beef marrow-bones, and a plate of beef for dinner ; and when we came down to go away, these gentlemen met us, and said, 'God damn you, how did you like the beef?' which raised a quarrel among us ; but immediately, after I thought it was all over, I saw Mr. Walters run sir Charles Pymm through.

Court. Was his sword drawn ?

Neale. Yes, both of their swords were drawn.

Court. Where was Mr. Bradshaw ?

Neale. I cannot tell where he was directly : but, my lord, I heard sir Charles Pymm say nothing to Mr. Walters.

Clerk. Cryer, call Mr. Palms.

Palms. My lord, after the reckoning was paid, we came down stairs, and called for a coach, and because it rained, there was none to be had ; and these gentlemen followed us into the entry, and so words to the same purpose as aforesaid passed between them ; after which, I met Mr. Bradshaw, and we fell out in the fish-monger's shop.

Court. Who began?

Palms. I know not, I cannot remember that.

Court. Were you not in drink?

Palms. My lord, we drank nine or ten bottles among six of us; after which Mr. Bradshaw and I drew our swords, and then Mr. Mirriday came and took him away from me into the entry, and in the mean time, while we were talking in the entry, the business was done.

Court. Were your swords put up again?

Palms. I had put up mine.

Counsel for the king. Did you take notice of what passed between Mr. Walters and sir Charles Pymm?

Palms. I heard nothing of high words.

Court. Yes, yes, it was all about the beef.

Clerk. Cryer, call for Mr. Presland, the bar-keeper.

Presland. My lord, I made the bill for the reckoning.

Court. Did you put the beef into the bill?

Presland. No, I did not; when they came down stairs, the coach was fetched for them, viz. for sir Charles Pymm and his company, and the reckoning was paid. When sir Charles Pymm and the rest of his company came down into the entry, Mr. Walters came out of the room, &c. and I heard them argue about their dinner, and they came to me, and asked me what was to pay for beef, and I told them nothing.

Court. Did you see the man killed?

Presland. My lord, I did not see him killed, not I.

Court. Who was it that quarrelled with the coachman?

Presland. My lord, Mr. Neale quarrelled with the coachman about his staying: the coachman refused going with him, because his horses were hot.

Clerk. Cryer, call Mr. Brummidge.

Brummidge. My lord, between eleven and twelve o'clock in the morning on the 4th of May last, sir Charles Pymm came to Mr. Cloudsley's door in a coach, and asked him what he might have for dinner; who told him that he might have a mullet and some smelts, and I sold a mullet to Mr. Cloudsley: so sir Charles went to the Exchange, and I saw no more of him till I saw him killed. While I was in the house, came in one Mr. Allen and others, to enquire for sir Charles Pymm, and Mr. Cloudsley told them that he had bespoke a dinner, viz. a mullet and some smelts; and was gone to the Exchange; but one of the gentlemen desired a bit of the beef that was at the fire, so Mr. Cloudsley said he would get a plate for him. So I went to the door, and the coachman came, and his horses being hot, he desired to go away because it rained; but Mr. Neale put his foot-boy into the coach, and the coachman after pulled his boy out of the coach, and drove away. And after that, I saw Mr. Cave and others come to the door, and jostled each other into the next shop, and were at very high words; and so afterwards they went into the entry again, and sir Charles Pymm and Mr. Walters came out without the door, the latter of which said, 'Here is my hand, and here is my sword;' but they returned both in again into the tavern, and within two minutes came out again, and I saw Mr. Walters thrust sir Charles Pymm through his back.

Court. Did you see him do any thing to him after he was down?

Brummidge. No, my lord, I did not.

Court. Did you not say, that Walters went over the kennel, and drew his sword, and stood upon his guard, and then you say, that you saw sir Charles Pymm come out with his sword drawn; was his sword drawn?

Brummidge. I did not see him draw it; but it was drawn.

Court. Where did he receive his wound?

Brummidge. Within a foot of the kennel; I was but a little way off, but I did not see him beat his head against the ground.

Clerk. Cryer, call Mr. Fletcher.

Fletcher. My lord, on Friday in the evening on the 4th of May, I was going by the tavern-door about seven o'clock at night, and I heard a noise, and a talking of going to the other end of the town to be merry: and turning myself back to hearken further, I saw Mr. Walters come out of the door, and draw his sword, and sir Charles Pymm came out, and drew his sword; and presently Mr. Walters's sword was through sir Charles Pymm's body almost a foot; and he fell down crinkling immediately; and when he was down, I saw Mr. Walters hit him in the kennel, and take him by the nape of the neck, and after cried, 'God damn him, let the sword stick in his body;' and afterwards I saw Mr. Mirriday pull the sword out of his body.

Court. Did you see Mr. Bradshaw there when sir Charles fell?

Fletcher. No, my lord, I saw none there but Mr. Walters and sir Charles, they were out of doors, and the rest were in the entry.

Mary White and Sarah Webb were called, who could give little or no evidence as to matter of fact, as concerning the death of sir Charles; and being timorous, could not see what they might have seen.

Clerk. Cryer, call Mr. Allen.

Allen. I know but very little of the matter, but that there was a plate of beef sent up to us, but we knew not from whence it came, till afterwards the drawer brought us word that the gentlemen below had sent it up; after which, we drank their healths, and returned them thanks for it. After which, I went to the coffee-house hard by, and sat about half an hour, and presently heard a cry of murder, and I came down, and saw sir Charles Pymm lying with a wound in his body, and another in his head, but I did not know who it was, not then; but I asked who did this business, and exhorted the people to take them as soon as they could.

Court. I think you said that Mr. Bradshaw's sword was drawn?

Allen. Yes, it was, but I believe that he did not know that sir Charles Pymm was killed.

Mrs. Sheepwash was called, but could depose nothing material.

Court. Mr. Walters, you have been here indicted, together with Mr. Bradshaw and Mr. Cave, for the murder of sir Charles Pymm, knt. and bart. you have heard what charge hath been laid against you, which hath been a very strong one, and now it behoves you to make your defence as well as you can.

Walters. My lord, I was no way the occasion of the quarrel; when I came thither, I asked for some meat, and having not eaten all the day before, we had a piece of beef, of which sir Charles Pymm and his company had some, who afterwards drank our healths, as I was informed. For my part, my lord, I never saw the gentleman before in my days: my lord, I am very sorry it should be my misfortune to kill him in the quarrel. Sir Charles Pymm asked me, saying, 'God damn you, Sir, what have you to do to meddle?' I went presently, my lord, to a fishmonger's, where Mr. Mirriday was, and sir Charles Pymm came, and Mr. Mirriday said to him, sir Charles, 'Damn you, Sir, go and fight him, and I will be your second.' And presently they came upon me, and I drew my sword in my own defence, and he ran me eight inches into the thigh, and at the same pass, I had the misfortune, my lord, to run him into the body.

Court. Would you ask Mr. Mirriday any questions?

Walters. Yes, my lord. Mr. Mirriday, did you see me strike sir Charles's head upon the ground?

Mirriday. No, Sir, I did not see that; neither did I say any such thing in the fishmonger's shop, as to bid sir Charles fight you.

Clerk. Cryer, call Matthew Perin.

Perin. My lord, all that I saw of the business was, that when the coachman was called to the door, Mr. Neale came and threatened him if he did not stay; then Mr. Cave and Mr. Bradshaw were in the entry, and I heard them discourse about beef; and some of them said, You give us beef, and make us pay for it; and there was answer made, They were rascals that said so, for they did not. There was one of the gentlemen in our shop hearing of it, said, Let me come to him, I will fight him.

Court. Do you know the man?

Perin. No, I do not know who it was.

Walters. I was wounded at the same time, my lord.

Court. That is admitted of.

Walters. Let him be asked, whether I beat the head against the ground.

Perin. No, my lord, I did not see him do that.

Court. He had a wound, the question is how he came by it; whether he might not fall upon it himself, it was a slanting wound?

Walters. Pray, my lord, let sir Charles's sword be seen, all blood. [But that gave no satisfaction on either side.]

Court. Mr. Bradshaw, what have you to say for yourself?

Mr. Bradshaw. My lord, I was there, but I know nothing of the death of sir Charles Pymm, nor how he came by it; there were some words arose amongst us, and I desired them to cease, for fear a farther quarrel should ensue upon it.

Court. Mr. Cave, what have you to say?

Mr. Cave. I know no more of the matter than this gentleman saith: I saw not sir Charles Pymm killed.

Clerk. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. All people are commanded to keep silence upon pain of imprisonment.

Then Mr. Baron Jenner summed up the evidence as followeth:

Baron Jenner. Gentlemen of the jury, you have three persons indicted, viz. Mr. Walters, Mr. Bradshaw and Mr. Cave, for murdering sir Charles Pymm, bart. and have had several witnesses called for the king, against the prisoners at the bar; the first of which was Mr. Mirriday; and he gives you this account, and it is all that each and every one gives, and it agrees on all sides; and he tells you, that all those gentlemen were to dine at Mr. Cloudsley's, at the Swan-Tavern in Old Fish-street; and that they were there at dinner, it is very plainly proved. And being there, it seems that some of those gentlemen had bespoke a fish dinner, some flesh, and had some, viz. a plate of beef; and he tells you also, that when dinner was over, some words did arise concerning the reckoning, and that one of the companies were got down stairs in the entry, where a further quarrel did arise. Mr. Mirriday tells you further, that Mr. Bradshaw and he quarrelled, so there was a scuffle in the entry; after which things were pretty well quieted there; in comes Mr. Walters and sir Charles Pymm, and while Mr. Mirriday was securing the first quarrel, they, viz. sir Charles Pymm and Mr. Walters were got out at the door, and sir Charles was stooping down, and Mr. Walters was pushing upon his neck and throwing him down.

So said Mr. Mirriday, and when he went to take the sword out of his body, he saw him a dying man.

The next evidence was Mr. Neale, and he observes to you, that one of the gentlemen did say, that the quarrel was not intended against them; and he gives an account of the story, how that it was about the beef; how that sir Charles was run through by Walters, but he did not see him knock his head against the ground.

Mr. Palms gives the like account, and saith, that whilst they were a scuffling in the entry, sir Charles was killed at the door.

The next evidence is the drawer, who tells you of a squabble that Mr. Neale had with the coachman at the door, and how that there was left four of the gentlemen behind, and that the coachman was unwilling to wait because it rained, his horses being hot, they might catch cold; whereupon he put his footboy into the coach, and threatened the coachman if he went away: this was before they fell out about the meat.

The next evidence was one Mr. Brummidge the fishmonger, he gives the same account, how that a quarrel was amongst them, and how that Mr. Walters was on one side of the kennel, and sir Charles Pymm on the other side, and there they stood with their swords drawn; and as soon as they came close, they wounded each other, and sir Charles Pymm was killed; but he did not see his head knocked against the ground.

Comes Fletcher, my lord mayor's officer, and he tells you, that he was going by the door home into Bread Street, and he sees a man that was wounded stooping down; and he swears that Mr. Walters took him by the nape of his neck, and knocked his head against the ground, and heard him swear, let the sword stick in him. Sarah Webb and another woman speak it to be in the like manner; and one of them talks of Mr. Walters's pulling sir C. Pymm out of the entry before he would come out.

Last of all, gentlemen, here was Mr. Allen, one of their company, who went away to the coffee house, and hearing murder cried out, he came and found sir Charles Pymm killed and quite dead. This, gentlemen, is the evidence that you have heard as near as I can give it you.

Now, for the prisoner, Mr. Walters, he would have you believe, as if sir Charles had struck him before he drew his sword; but he has not proved it: likewise speaks of Mr. Fletcher, but he does not remember that sir Charles Pymm struck him before he drew: but so it was, gentlemen, there was a quarrel, in which that honourable and worthy gentleman, sir Charles Pymm, lost his life.

Now for Mr. Bradshaw, he confesseth, that there was a quarrel; but he saith, that he did not know when or how sir Charles Pymm was killed; and for Mr. Cave, I do not find any thing objected against him, nor either of them.

Now, gentlemen, I must tell you what the law is in this case: first of all to begin with Mr. Walters, so as it fares with Mr. Walters, so you may be guided to deal with the other two. Now it hath not been made appear by any of the evidence that you have heard, that there was any premeditated malice between them, for they were never in company before, and knew not each other; so that there could be no manner of malice from him in particular.

The next step, Gentlemen, is, here is nothing that can impute a general malice upon Mr. Walters: for if I had no design to kill a man, and kill another with whom I do not quarrel, that cannot be any premeditated malice; but I rather think that there was a little heat of wine amongst them: and this whole action was carried on by nothing else but by a hot and sudden frolic, and I am very sorry that it should fall upon such a worthy gentleman as he was. And if there was no malice premeditated, then he can be found guilty of nothing but manslaughter; and as for the other two, they must be totally acquitted. If I have erred in the summing up of these evidences, or mistaken myself in any point, here are my brothers to help me.

Then the gentlemen of the jury withdrew for about the space of half an hour, and returned into court upon a scruple of conscience; one amongst them spoke to the court as followeth:

Juryman. My lord, we are not satisfied in our consciences concerning the death of sir Charles Pymm; we find in it malice forethought; because after he had run the sword through his body, he was not satisfied with that, but must knock his head against the ground; so we do take it, that the said sir Charles Pymm was maliciously murdered.

Justice Allibone. Gentlemen of the jury, I shall endeavour to direct you in this case, and tell you what the law saith, That it cannot reach a man's life, where no prepense malice is proved; that there is none proved, appears very plain to me, and I hope also to you, because it hath been proved that those gentlemen, viz. the prisoners at the bar, and the deceased, had never been in company before. Gentlemen, you are upon your oaths to serve the king as jurymen; and I, as a judge, am upon my oath to try the cause as well on the behalf of the living as the dead. So that upon the whole matter, gentlemen, this can be called nothing else but a storm, an ungoverned storm that such men are subject to; so that it does not reach precedent malice, but subsequent passion; which sad passion was continued to that height, that sir Charles Pymm in the midst of it lost his life.

Then the Jury went out again for about a quarter of an hour; and returning, brought in Mr. Walters guilty of manslaughter; but the other two were acquitted.

* Hume notices that in the year 1682 the queen, then duchess of York, had been pregnant, and rumours were spread that an imposture would at that time be obtruded upon the nation. 'But' he adds 'happily the infant proved a female, and thereby spared the party all the trouble of supporting their improbable fiction.' See the passage cited from Dalrymple, at the latter end of this Case.

There is in Wellwood's Memoirs, a curious anecdote of an occurrence at Rome relating to the queen's pregnancy. See lord Castlemaine's Case, A. D. 1689.

To whom his Majesty spake to this effect :

My Lords ;

I have called you together upon a very extraordinary occasion ; but extraordinary diseases must have extraordinary remedies. The malicious endeavours of my enemies have so poisoned the minds of some of my subjects, that by the reports I have from all hands, I have reason to believe, that very many do not think this son with which God hath blessed me, to be mine, but a supposed child. But I may say, that by particular providence, scarce any prince was ever born where there were so many persons present.

I have taken this time to have the matter heard and examined here, expecting that the prince of Orange with the first easterly wind will invade this kingdom. And as I have often ventured my life for the nation before I came to the crown, so I think myself more obliged to do the same now I am king ; and do intend to go in person against him, whereby I may be exposed to accidents, and therefore I thought it necessary to have this now done, in order to satisfy the minds of my subjects, and to prevent this kingdom's being engaged in blood and confusion after my death, desiring to do always what may contribute most to the ease and quiet of my subjects, which I have shewed by securing to them their liberty of conscience, and the enjoyment of their properties, which I will always preserve.

I have desired the queen dowager to give herself the trouble to come hither, to declare what she knows of the birth of my son, and most of the ladies, lords, and other persons who were present, are ready here to depose upon oath their knowledge of this matter.

Whereupon the Queen Dowager was pleased to say :

That when the king sent for her to the queen's labour, she came as soon as she could, and never stirred from her till she was delivered of the prince of Wales. CATHERINA, R.

And the following DEPOSITIONS were all taken upon Oath.

Elizabeth Lady Marchioness of Powis, deposeth, That about the 29th of December last, the queen was likely to miscarry ; whereupon she immediately went unto her, and offered her some effectual remedies, which are made use of on the like occasion, which the queen ordered this deponent to acquaint the doctors with. The day following the queen dowager sent this deponent to see how the queen did ; who replied, she had a pretty good night, and did think she had quickened, but would not be positive till she felt it again ; that after this, the deponent did frequently wait on the queen in the morning, and did see her shift her several days, and generally saw the milk, and sometimes wet upon her smock. That some time after this deponent went into the country, and came not up till a few days before the queen was brought to bed ; and from the time of this deponent's return, she saw the queen every day till she was brought to bed, and was in the room a quarter of an hour before, and at the time of her delivery of the prince, by Mrs. Wilks her majesty's midwife, which this deponent saw, and immediately went with the prince, carried by Mrs. Delabadie, into the queen's little bedchamber, where she saw sir Thomas Witherly sent for by the midwife, who gave the child three drops of something which came into the world with him, which this deponent saw done ; and this deponent doth aver this prince to be the same child which was then born, and that she has never been from him one day since.

ELIZA. POWIS.

Anne Countess of Aran, deposeth, That she went to the queen from Whitehall to St. James's, as soon as she heard that her majesty was in labour ; when she came she found the queen in bed, complaining of little pains ; the lady Sunderland, lady Roscomon, Mrs. Labadie, and the midwife, were on that side of the bed where the queen lay ; and this deponent, with a great many others, stood on the other side all the time till the queen was delivered ; as soon as her majesty was delivered, she said, O Lord, I don't hear the child cry ; and immediately upon that, this deponent did hear it cry, and saw the midwife take the child out of the bed, and give it to Mrs. Labadie, who carried it into the little bedchamber, where she this deponent followed her, and saw that it was a son, and that likewise she the deponent hath several times seen milk run out upon the queen's smock during her being with child.

A. ARAN.

Penelope Countess of Peterborow, deposeth, That she was often with the queen while her majesty was last with child, and saw the milk often upon her majesty's smock, when she the deponent took it off from the queen, and often saw her majesty's belly so as it could not be otherwise but that she was with child. That the said deponent stood by the bedside on the 10th of June last in the morning, while the queen was delivered of the prince of Wales.

P. PETERBOROW.

Anne Countess of Sunderland, deposeth, That June the 10th, 1688, being Trinity Sunday, the deponent went to St. James's chapel at eight o'clock in the morning, intending to receive the sacrament, but in the beginning of the communion service, the man which looks to the chapel came to the deponent and told her, she must come to the queen; the deponent said she would as soon as prayers were done. In a very little time after, another man came up to the altar to the deponent, and said, the queen was in labour, and the deponent must come to her majesty, who then went directly to the queen's bedchamber. As soon as the deponent came in, her majesty told her, this deponent, she believed she was in labour. By this time the bed was warmed, and the queen went into bed, and the king came in. The queen asked the king, if he had sent for the queen dowager: He said he had sent for every body. The said deponent stood at the queen's bolster, the lady Roscomon, Mrs. Delabadie, and the midwife on that side of the bed where the queen was delivered. After some lingering pains, the queen said, she feared she should not be brought to bed a good while; but enquiring of the midwife, she assured her majesty, that she wanted only one thorow pain to bring the child into the world; upon which the queen said, it is impossible, the child lies so high, and commanded this deponent to lay her hand on her majesty's belly to feel how high the child lay, which the deponent did, but soon after a great pain came on at past nine o'clock, and the queen was delivered, which the midwife by pulling the deponent by the coat, assured her was a son, it being the sign she told the deponent she would give her, the queen having charged her not to let her majesty know presently, whether it was son or daughter. As soon as the midwife had given the deponent the sign, the deponent made a sign to the king that it was a son. When the midwife had done her office, she gave the child to Mrs. Delabadie, which was a son, and she carried it into the little bedchamber.

A. SUNDERLAND.

Isabella Countess of Roscomon, deposeth, That on the 10th of June last, she stood by the lady Sunderland in the queen's bedchamber, while the queen was in labour, and saw the prince of Wales when he was taken out of the bed by the midwife.

I. ROSCOMON.

Margaret Countess of Fingall, deposeth,

That she waited on the queen dowager her mistress into the queen's bedchamber at St. James's when the queen was in labour, and stood by the bed's feet when her majesty was delivered of the prince. That the deponent saw the prince carried away into another room, and soon after followed, and saw him in that room.

MARG. FINGALL.

Lady Sophia Bulkely, deposeth,

That she was sent for on Trinity Sunday last past, about eight o'clock in the morning to go to St. James's; for the man that came, said the queen was in labour, and he and others were sent to call every body. That this deponent made as much haste as she could to rise and be drest, but did not get to the queen's bedchamber until a little after nine o'clock, and then this deponent found the queen in her bed, and the queen dowager there set upon a stole, and some of the ladies about her. After this deponent having staid a little while, and thinking the queen in no strong pain, she, this deponent, went out, and, being next to the room where the queen's linen was a warming, heard a noise, and looked to see what was the matter, and finding nobody there, this deponent ran, and found the lord Feversham in the queen's little bed-chamber, who told this deponent the child was just born; this deponent asked him, what is it? His lordship said he could not tell. So this deponent ran on to the queen's bedside; and heard the queen say to the midwife, pray Mrs. Wilks, do not part the child (which signifies, don't cut the navel-string, until the after-birth is come away.) And while the queen was with child this deponent hath heard her majesty command the midwife not to do otherwise, it being counted much the safest way; but to what the queen said just then (to the best of the deponent's remembrance) Mrs. Wilks replied, pray madam, give me leave, for I will do nothing, but what will be safe for yourself and child; the queen answered, do then, and then cried, where is the king gone? His majesty came immediately from the other side of the bed (from just having a sight of the child) and answered the queen, here I am; the queen said, why do you leave me now? The king kneeled on the bed, on that side where the deponent stood, and a little after the midwife said, all is now come safe away: upon that the king rose from the bed, and said, pray my lords, come and see the child: the king followed Mrs. Labadie, and the lords his majesty, into the little bed-chamber, where this deponent followed also, and saw as well as they, that it was a prince, and that Mrs. Wilks was in the right to desire to part the child, for the prince's face, especially his forehead, was blackish, being stunned, as I have seen some other children, when they have just newly come into the world; but God be thanked, in two hours time that he was drest and washed, (which the deponent stayed by and saw done) the prince looked very fresh and well. This deponent doth further add, that all the while, the queen was with child, this deponent had the honour to pay her duty very often mornings and nights, in waiting upon her majesty in her dressing room and bed chamber, and for the last three or four months, this deponent hath often times seen the queen's milk, as well as when this deponent hath had the honour to put on her majesties smock.

S. BULKLEY.

Susanna Lady Bellasyse, deposeth,

That on Trinity Sunday, the 10th of June last, the deponent's servant, seeing the queen dowager's coaches in St. James's at an unusual hour, went and asked the occasion, and was told the queen was in labour, whereupon he came into the deponent's chamber and awaked her, that the queen having come to lodge at St. James's but the night before, they being in a great hurry, forgot to call the deponent as her majesty had ordered; that the deponent made all the haste she could into her majesty's bed-chamber, and found the queen in bed, and Mrs. Wilks her majesty's midwife, sitting by the bedside, with her hands in the queen's bed, the queen asked her, the said midwife, what she thought? Mrs. Wilks assured her majesty that at the next great pain the child would be born; whereupon the king ordered the privy counsellors to be called in; that this deponent stood behind the midwife's chair, and immediately after the queen's having another great pain, the prince was born; that the deponent saw the child taken out of the bed with the navel-string hanging to its belly. That this deponent opened the receiver, and saw it was a son, and not hearing the child cry, and seeing it a little black, she was afraid it was in a convulsion fit.

S. BELLASYSE.

Henrietta Lady Waldegrave, deposeth,

That she was in the queen's bed chamber a quarter of an hour before her majesty was delivered, and standing by the bedside, she saw the queen in labour, and heard her cry out much.

HENRIETTA WALDEGRAVE.

Mrs. Mary Crane, one of the Gentlewomen of the Bedchamber to the Queen Dowager, deposeth,

That she went with the queen dowager to the queen's labour on the tenth of June last, and never stirred out of the room till the queen was delivered. That this deponent did not follow the child when it was first carried out of the room, but staid in the bed chamber, and saw all that was to be seen after the birth of a child. That she the deponent, then went to see the prince and found him look ill, and immediately went to the king, and told his majesty she feared the child was sick; that his majesty went immediately to the prince, and came back and said it was a mistake, the child was very well.

MARY CRANE.

Dame Isabella Wentworth, one of the Gentlewomen of the bed-chamber to the queen, deposeth,

That she often saw the milk of her majesty's breast upon her smock, at which the queen was troubled, it being a common saying, that it was a sign the child would not live. And that she the deponent, did once feel the child stir in the queen's belly while her majesty was in bed, and that she was present when the child was born, and staid till she heard it cry, and then went to fetch vinegar for the queen to smell to, she the deponent heard the queen command the midwife not to tell her of what sex it was, for fear of surprising her majesty. When the deponent brought the vinegar, she did desire to see the child, Mrs. Delabadie having it in her arms. The child looked black, whereupon the deponent desired Dr. Waldegrave to look to it, believing it was not well: that the deponent saw the navel-string of the child cut, and three drops of the blood which came fresh out given to him for the convulsion fits.

VOL. XII.

ISABELLA WENTWORTH.

Dame Catherine Sayer, one of the Gentlewomen of the Bed-chamber to the Queen Dowager, deposeth,

That she waited on the queen dowager to the queen's labour, and was all the time by the bedside, and stood there till the queen was delivered, and followed the child, when it was carried by Mrs. Delabadie to the little bed-chamber, and took a warm napkin and laid it on the child's breast, believing the child was not well.

CATHARINE SAYER.

Dame Isabella Waldegrave, one of the Gentlewomen of the Bedchamber to the Queen, deposeth,

That she was constantly with the queen, when her majesty was likely to miscarry, and had often seen milk on her majesty's breasts, and was with the queen at the time of her labour with the prince, and saw the prince taken out of the bed, and went after Mrs. Delabadie with the prince in her arms into the little bed-chamber, and was by when the child was shown to the king that it was a son, and this deponent took the after-burthen, and put it into a bason of water, and carried it into the queen's closet.

ISABELLA WALDEGRAVE.

Mrs. Margaret Dawson, one of the Gentlewomen of the Bedchamber to the Queen, deposeth,

That on the tenth of June last, in the morning she was sent for by the queen out of St. James's chapel, where she was at prayers, and that coming up into the queen's chamber, she found her sitting all alone upon a stool by the bed's head, when the queen said to her this deponent, she believed herself in labour, and bid her the deponent, get the pallat bed which stood in the next room, to be made ready quickly for her, but that bed having never been aired, the deponent persuaded the queen not to make use of it, after which the queen bid the deponent make ready the bed she came out of, which was done accordingly. The deponent further saith, that she saw fire carried into the queen's room in a warming pan to warm the bed, after which the queen went into her bed, and that the deponent stirred not from the queen until her majesty was delivered of a son. That she this deponent well remembers, that on the 29th of December last, her majesty was afraid of miscarrying, which was about the time she quickened, and that after the queen had gone two and twenty weeks with child, her majesty's milk began to run, which she the deponent often saw upon her smock, and that the ninth of May her majesty apprehended miscarrying again with a fright.

MARGARET DAWSON.

Mrs. Elizabeth Bromley, one of the Gentlewomen of the Bedchamber to the Queen, deposeth,

That she was sick all winter, till a little before Easter last, when she the deponent came into waiting; that from that time till the queen was brought to bed, she the deponent saw the queen put on her smock every morning, by which means she saw the milk constantly fall out of her majesty's breasts, and observed the bigness of her majesty's belly, which could not be counterfeit. That the deponent came from Whitehall to the queen's labour to St. James's, the tenth of June last, and remained in the room till the queen was delivered, and afterwards, but did not follow the child till some time after, when she the deponent went to see what coloured eyes he had.

ELIZABETH BROMLEY.

Mrs. Pelegrina Turini, one of the Gentlewomen of the Bedchamber to the Queen, deposeth,

That she constantly attended the queen when she was last with child, and that on the 10th of June last, she was in waiting on her majesty, who called her on the said 10th of June in the morning, and told her, the deponent, she was in pain, and bid her send for the midwife, her ladies and servants, after which she, the deponent, staid with the queen during her labour, and until she was delivered of the prince of Wales.

The mark of

PELEGRINA  TURINI.

Mrs. Anna Cary, one of the Gentlewomen of the Bedchamber to the Queen Dowager, deposeth,

That she waited on the Queen Dowager from Somerset-house to St. James's the day the queen was brought to bed, and went into the queen's bed-chamber, where she, this deponent staid till the queen was delivered, and saw the prince as soon as he was born.

ANNA CARY.

Mrs. Mary Ann Delubadie, Dry-nurse to the Prince, deposeth,

That she was with the queen all the time her majesty was with child, and drest her every day, and in all the nine months did not miss above six days, and that at several times by reason of sickness. That on Sunday morning, the 10th of June last, she, the deponent, was sent for to the queen who was in labour. That the deponent came presently and was with the queen all the time of her labour, and that kneeling down by the midwife giving her clothes for the queen, the midwife told this deponent that immediately on the next pain the queen would be delivered, which accordingly she was; that this deponent whispered to the midwife, asking whether it was a girl, she answered, No; whereupon the midwife parted the child and put it into the receiver (that the deponent had given her) and then delivered the child to the deponent, and bid her go and carry it to the fire, and take care of the navel, which this deponent did, and the king and council followed her, and the king asked this deponent what it was, who answered, what he desired; the king replied, but let me see; whereupon the deponent presently shewed his majesty that it was a son, and the privy counsellors then present saw it one after another; the deponent sat with the prince in her lap till the midwife had done with the queen, then the midwife came and took the prince from this deponent, and asked for a spoon for to give it three drops of the blood of the navel string, which the midwife cut off by the advice of the physicians, who said it was good against fits. That the deponent held the spoon when the midwife dropt the blood into it, and stirred it with a little black cherry water, and then it was given to the prince. That the queen sent for this deponent and gave her the prince to take care of him in quality of dry nurse, which she has hitherto done, and further deposeth it to be the same child that was born of the queen. And that Mrs. Danvers one of the princess of Denmark's women, and formerly nurse to the lady Isabella, coming to see the prince, she told this deponent she was glad to see the same marks upon his eye, as the queen's former children had.

MARY ANN DELABADIE.

Mrs. Judith Wilks, deposeth,

That being the queen's midwife, she came often to her, especially when her majesty was in any danger of miscarrying, and many times felt the child stir in her belly, and saw the milk run out of her majesty's breasts; that on Trinity Sunday last in the morning about eight of the clock, the queen sent Mr. White, page of the back-stairs, to call her, this deponent, believing herself in labour, when the deponent came, she found the queen in great pain and trembling: the queen told her, she feared it was her labour, it being near the time of her first reckoning; she, the deponent, desired her majesty not to be afraid, saying, she did not doubt that it was her full time, and hoped her majesty would have as good labour as she always had; and whilst her majesty was sitting trembling, her water broke, and immediately she sent for the king, he being gone to his own side, and let him know in what condition she was, and desired him to send for whom he pleased to be present. The queen ordered this deponent to send for Mrs. Dawson and the rest of her women, Mrs. Dawson came presently, and the countess of Sunderland with her, and the rest of the women also, that most of them saw her, this deponent, make the bed fit for the queen to be delivered in; which when it was ready, her majesty was put into, and about ten o'clock that morning, the queen was delivered of the prince of Wales, by her, this deponent's assistance, and afterwards she, the deponent, shewed the after-burthen to the physicians, and before them the deponent cut the navel-string, and gave the prince three drops of his blood, to prevent convulsion fits, according to their order. And this deponent further saith, that when the child was born, it not crying, the queen said she thought it was dead, this deponent assured her majesty it was not, and desired leave to part the child from the after-burthen; which the queen was unwilling to have done, thinking it might be dangerous to herself, but the deponent assuring her majesty it would not, her majesty gave consent; whereupon the child presently cried, and then the deponent gave it to Mrs. Labadie. JUDITH WILKS.

Mrs. Elizabeth Pearse, Laundress to the Queen, deposeth,

That about nine of the clock, on the 10th of June last, in the morning, she came into the bed-chamber, and heard the queen cry out, being in great pain, in which she continued until her delivery, after which she, the deponent, saw the prince of Wales given by the midwife to Mrs. Labadie; that immediately after, the deponent saw the midwife hold up the after-burthen, shewing it to the company, and then the deponent fetched her maids, and with them took away all the foul linen, hot as they came from the queen; that for a month after her majesty's lying in, the deponent well knows by the washing of her linen, that the queen was in the same condition that all other women use to be on the like occasion; and that some time after her quickening, it appeared by her smocks that her majesty had milk in her breasts, which continued until she was brought to bed, and afterwards during the usual time.

ELIZABETH PEARSE.

Frances, Duchess of Richmond and Lenox, deposeth,

That she, the deponent, was not at the queen's labour, because she did not know it time enough, but as soon as she did, she made all the haste she could to dress her, but the queen was delivered before she, the deponent came; and that at a time when the queen apprehended she should miscarry, and the physicians made her majesty keep her bed for that reason, the deponent went one evening to wait upon her majesty, and as she stood by her bedside, her majesty said to her, my milk is now very troublesome, it runs out so much. The deponent asked the queen if it used to do so, who answered, it used to run out a little, but now the fright I am in of miscarrying, makes it run out very much as you may see, throwing down the bed clothes to the middle of her stomach, and shewing her smock upon her breast to the said deponent, which was very wet with her milk. F. RICHMOND & LENOX.

Charlotte Countess of Litchfield, deposeth,

That she was not at the queen's labour (being in child-bed herself) but that she was almost constantly with the queen while she was with child, and hath put on her smock, and seen the milk run out of her breast, and felt her belly, so that she is sure she could not be deceived, but that the queen was with child.

C. LITCHFIELD.

Anne, Countess of Marischall, deposeth,

That she was several times in the queen's bedchamber when she shifted herself, and hath seen her smock stained with her milk; that she was not at the queen's labour, though sent to by one of her ladies, being sick of a fever; but does in her conscience believe her majesty was with child, both by her belly and her milk.

A. MARISCHALL.

George, Lord Jeffreys, Lord Chancellor of England, deposeth,

That he being sent for to St. James's on the tenth of June last, by a messenger that left word the queen was in labour, soon after he this deponent came to St. James's, and was sent for into the queen's bedchamber; and to the best of his, the deponent's, apprehension, the queen was in labour, and had a pain or two to the best of the deponent's remembrance before the rest of the lords were called in. The deponent stood all the time at the queen's bedside, and heard her cry out several times as women in travail use to do, and at length after a long pain, it was by some of the women on the other side of the bed said the child was born. The deponent heard the queen say she did not hear it cry. The deponent immediately asked the Lord President what it was, he whispered that it was a boy, which the deponent understood he had hinted to him by the lady Sunderland. Immediately the deponent saw a gentlewoman, who he hath since heard her name to be Mrs. Labadie, carry the child into another room whither the deponent followed, and saw the child when she first opened it, and saw it was black and reaking, so that it plainly seemed to this deponent to have been newly come from the womb. The deponent doth therefore depose, he doth stedfastly believe the queen was delivered of that child that very morning.

JEFFREYS, C.

Robert, Earl of Sunderland, Lord President of his Majesty's Privy Council, and Principal Secretary of State, deposeth,

That on Sunday morning the tenth of June last, he was sent to, to come to St. James's the queen being in labour. The deponent immediately went, and found many Lords of the Council there. After having been some time in an outward room, first the Lord Chancellor, and then the rest of the Council were called into the queen's bed-chamber, where in a short time her majesty was brought to bed. The deponent saw Mrs. Labadie carry the child into the next room, whither the deponent followed with many more, and saw it was a son, and had the marks of being new born.

SUNDERLAND, P.

Henry, Lord Arundell of Wardour, Lord Privy Seal, deposeth,

That on the tenth of June last, being Sunday, he had notice given him that the queen was in labour; whereupon the deponent repaired to St. James's betwixt nine and ten of the clock in the morning, where he found several Lords of the Council. In a little time after, they were all called into the queen's bed-chamber; in less than a quarter of an hour after, she fell into the sharpness of her labour: her cries were so vehement, and especially the last, that the deponent could not forbid himself the being concerned for her great pain, which the deponent expressing to the Lord Chancellor, he told the deponent it was a sign her majesty would the sooner be delivered, or words to that purpose; which proved very true, for presently after she was so. The deponent heard a whispering up and down that it was a prince, for no man was permitted to speak it aloud, lest the sudden knowledge of it might have discomposed the queen. The deponent did not go in with some Lords when the child was carried into the next room, which was the occasion the deponent did not see him when he was uncovered and drest.

ARUNDELL, C. P. S.

John, Earl of Mulgrave, Lord Chamberlain of his Majesty's Household, saith, it is not to be expected one of his sex should be able to give full evidence in such a matter, but deposeth,

That he was just at the beds' feet, and heard the queen cry very much; then the deponent followed the child into the other room, and it seemed a little black; the deponent also saw it was a boy.

MULGRAVE.

William, Earl of Craven, deposeth,

That he attending the king at St. James's the tenth of June last, in the morning, to receive the word of his majesty, the king had notice brought him that the queen was upon the point of falling into labour; upon which the king commanded this deponent's stay and attendance; and after the space of one hour and something more, this deponent was, with some other Lords of his majesty's privy council, called into the queen's great bedchamber to be present at her delivery; and as near as this deponent can remember, the queen made three groans or squeaks, and at the last of three was delivered of a child, the which was carried out into the little bedchamber, and there by the fire this deponent saw it cleansing: and this deponent further saith, that he took that particular mark of this child, that he may safely aver, that the prince of Wales is that very child, that then was so brought out of the queen's great bedchamber, where this deponent and others were present, as aforesaid, at her majesty's labour and delivery.

CRAVEN.

Lewis, Earl of Feversham, Lord Chamberlain to her Majesty the Queen Dowager, deposeth,

That being in bed upon the tenth of June, between eight and nine a clock in the morning, Mr. Nicholas one of his majesty's grooms of his bed chamber, came into this deponent's room, and told him that the king had sent him to tell the queen Dowager that the queen was in labour, and told him further, that the queen Dowager had given order for her coach, as soon as she heard the news of the queen's labour. The deponent dressed himself with all speed, and came to wait upon the queen Dowager, who was ready to go into her coach, as she did, the deponent went into one of her coaches to wait upon her majesty as he used to do, having the honour to be her lord chamberlain; we went to St. James's, and then led her majesty into the queen's bed chamber, and finding the queen in pain, the deponent went into the next room, where were several lords of the Privy Council, from whence the deponent heard the queen cry out several times, and a very little after the lords of the council were called in, and the deponent followed them into the bed chamber, and a very little after the queen cried louder, and then said, Pray do not tell me what it is yet. The deponent went out of the room to tell the news that the queen was brought to bed; and when the deponent came in again the news was that it was a prince, and immediately the deponent saw Mrs. Labadie with the child wrapt up in her hands, and in the crowd; upon which the deponent desired to make room for the prince, and followed her into the little bed chamber, where the deponent saw the prince as a child newly born, as he believed it.

FEVERSHAM.

Alexander, Earl of Morray, deposeth,

That he came not to St. James's till half an hour after the queen was brought to bed, and only heard that her majesty was brought to bed of a prince, which the deponent verily believes, as he is alive, she brought into the world that very morning being the 10th of June last, 1688.

MORRAY.

That the tenth of June last past, betwixt 8 and 9 of the clock in the morning, he had notice that the queen's majesty was in labour; whereupon the deponent made what haste he could to St. James's; the deponent found the earl of Craven waiting at the queen's bed chamber door towards the drawing room which was then shut; just after the king opened it, and called the earl of Craven and the deponent in; the deponent asked his majesty how the queen was? He was pleased to answer the deponent, you are a married man and so may know these matters; the water is broke or come away, or to that effect; and then bid the deponent go into the dressing room within the bed chamber where the deponent found several persons of quality; above half an hour after, to the best of this deponent's memory, all the company in that room were called into the bed chamber; the deponent stood near the bed's feet on the left side, where he heard the queen's groans, and presently after several loud shrieks; the last the deponent remembers continued so long that he then wondered how any body could hold their breath so long, presently after, the deponent heard them say, the queen was delivered: Whereupon the deponent stepped up to the bedside, and saw a woman, he supposes the midwife, kneeling at the other side of the bed, who had her hands and arms within the bed clothes for a pretty while, then the deponent saw her spread a cloth upon her lap, and laid the end of it over the bed clothes, and then fetch a child (as the deponent firmly believes, for he could not then see it) out of the bed into that cloth, and give it to Mrs. Labadie, who brought it round to the side where the deponent stood, and carried it into a little room, into which the deponent immediately followed the king, and saw her sit down by the fire, and heard her say, It is a boy, upon which the king said, Let me see it, thereupon she laid open the cloth, and shewed all the child, saying, There's what you wish to see; the deponent doth not charge his memory with the very words, but the sense of what he heard. The deponent looked upon the child at the same time, which appeared to be very foul. This deponent desireth pardon if he doth not know the proper expression, but hopes his meaning is plain.

MIDDLETON.

John Earl of Melfort, deposeth,

That on Sunday the tenth of June last betwixt eight and nine in the morning, the deponent was informed that the queen was in labour. The deponent went to St. James's, and waited in the queen's drawing room till some of the gentlemen told him he might go in; the deponent scratched at the door of the bed chamber, and finding no answer, he ran down by the garden side, and came to the queen's back stairs and finding the dressing room door open, the deponent went into the queen's bed chamber, where he saw a great number of company lords and ladies standing about the bed. The deponent heard the queen cry out in great pain, as women use to do when they are near being brought to bed; the deponent heard her complain, and a woman's voice which the deponent thought to be the midwife telling her, she would be quickly well, she would be brought to bed immediately; within a little the deponent heard the ladies behind the bed say, the queen was brought to bed, and the queen cry out, the child is dead; I do not hear it cry, and immediately the child cried; within a little the deponent saw a woman bring a child from within the bed; the deponent looked so earnestly at the child, that he knew not what woman it was; the child was in the condition of a new born child, lapt up in loose clothes, the deponent saw him carried into the little bed chamber, and went about by the dressing room and entered by the other door into the room where the prince was, and saw him in the condition of a new born child, and the deponent by the oath he hath taken believes him to be the queen's child.

MELFORT.

Sidney Lord Godolphin, Lord Chamberlain to the Queen, deposeth,

That he was called into the queen's bed-chamber, with the rest of the lords of the council, being one of the last; and the queen dowager being there and several ladies, the room was so full, that the deponent could not get near the bed, but stood by the chimney; There the deponent heard the queen cry out several times, as women use to do that are in labour; and the last cry that the deponent heard was much greater than the other, immediately upon that, the deponent was called out of the room to give some directions about the lodgings, that was preparing for the child, which were not ready, the deponent made haste back again, but as he was coming, he met people running with the news that the queen was delivered of a son, whereupon the deponent went into the little bed-chamber and saw the child.

GODOLPHIN.

Sir Stephen Fox, kt. deposeth,

That on Sunday the tenth of June last past, about nine of the clock, as he came out of the chapel at Whitehall after the first sermon, hearing that the queen was in labour, he, the deponent, made haste to St. James's, because in waiting as an officer of the green cloth, to warn the several servants below stairs to be in their offices, that upon that occasion there might not happen to be any thing wanting of household provisions and necessaries under his this deponent's command, but first going up by the back stairs into her majesties dressing room, and being there with many others he heard her majesty cry out very loudly; whereupon this deponent hastened to the green cloth, and ordered the several servants to deliver out of their several offices whatsoever should be called for, and as this deponent was returning back to the queen's said dressing room, he was told a prince was born. Upon which news, he this deponent went into the queen's little bed-chamber, and saw the young child before he was dressed.

STE. FOX.

Lieut. Col. Edward Griffin, deposeth,

That upon Sunday the tenth of June last, he had the honor to be in waiting upon the king with the stick, and between eight and nine in the morning, this deponent was in the queen's dressing room at St. James's with several lords of the council, and after some time we were there, the king came out of the queen's bed-chamber, and called all the lords in, and this deponent went in along with them, being in waiting; immediately after the said lords and this deponent were in the room, the queen cried out extremely, and said, Oh, I die, you kill me, you kill me, and the midwife (as this deponent believeth) answered, This one pain, Madam, and 'twill be over, then presently Mrs. Dawson made this deponent the sign that the child was born. Then this deponent heard the queen say, Don't tell me what it is yet, and Mrs. Dawson came to this deponent and whispered him in the ear, It is a prince, but do not take notice of it yet; Then Mrs. Delabadie brought away the child from the bedside, and carried it into the little bed-chamber, and the king and the lords of the council went after her, but this deponent did not follow them.

EDWARD GRIFFIN.

Sir Charles Scarburgh, first physician to the king, deposeth,

That upon the deponent's coming to visit her majesty then lying at St. James's on Sunday the 10th of June 1688, as the deponent went up the back-stairs, he heard the joyful acclamation that a prince of Wales was born; upon which the deponent hastened presently into the little bed-chamber, where the deponent found Mrs. Labadie just sitting down before the fire with the new-born prince wrapped in the mantles lying in her lap. Then passing to the queen in the next bed-chamber, the deponent congratulated the happy birth of the prince and her majesty's safe delivery. The queen was wearied and panting, but otherwise in good condition. Then the midwife brought to the deponent the after-birth reeking warm, which sir Thomas Witherley with the deponent examined and found very sound, and perfect. After a while, the deponent understood that a medicine was mentioned among the ladies for a certain remedy against convulsions: It was, some drops of blood from the navel-string, the deponent consulted sir Thomas Witherley and the other physicians, and to satisfy the women it was allowed of, there being as was conceived no danger in the thing. Whereupon the midwife with a small knife slit the navel string beyond the ligature, from which came some drops of fresh blood, taken in a spoon and given the child, being mixed with a little black cherry water. Thus much the deponent hath to say upon her majesty's present delivery.

Now for the time of the queen's conception, she often told the deponent and others that she had two reckonings; one from Tuesday the 6th of September, when the king returned from his progress to the queen then at Bath: and the other, from Thursday the 6th of October, when the queen came to the king at Windsor; but for some reasons the queen rather reckoned from the latter, though afterward it proved just to agree with the former. Moreover, her majesty, when, according to her reckoning, she was gone with child twelve weeks, said, that she was quick, and perceived the child to move, the deponent returned no answer to the queen; but privately told those about her, that in truth it could not so be in so short a time, yet the queen was in the right, only mistook her reckoning, for she was then full sixteen weeks gone with child; about which time she usually quickened with her former children, and accordingly was brought to bed on the 10th of June, 1688, and within three or four days of full forty weeks. CHARLES SCARBURGH.

Sir Thomas Witherley, second physician to the king, deposeth,

That on Sunday the 10th of June, the deponent was present in the queen's bed chamber when the prince of Wales was born, the deponent saw Mrs. Labadie bring the child from the midwife, and carry him into the next room, whither the deponent followed her, and saw the child before he was cleaned; and having a command from the queen that there should be two drops of the blood of the after-burthen given the first thing; we the said deponent and the other physicians, did take two drops of blood from the navel-string which remained upon the child, and gave it in a spoonful of black cherry water as the queen commanded. After this the deponent saw (as also did the other physicians) the after-burthen entire.

THOMAS WITHERLEY.

Sir William Waldegrave, Knt. her Majesty's first physician, deposeth,

That in the progress of her majesty's being with child, the deponent having the honour to wait upon her as usual upon the 13th of February 1687, [i. e. 1687-8] about ten in the morning, she told the deponent she had milk in her breasts which dropt out, it was then thought the nineteenth week according to one reckoning, but according to another reckoning, it was the one or two and twentieth week, the deponent also affirmeth that her majesty took such astringent medicines during the most part of her being with child, in order to avoid miscarriage, that if she had not been with child, they must have been prejudicial to her health and of dangerous consequence. Upon the 10th of June, 1688, the deponent was called at his lodging in Whitehall to wait upon the queen, being told she was in labour, upon which the deponent immediately went to St. James's and so into the queen's bedchamber and found her beginning her labour, it being eight of the clock in the morning, the deponent stirred not from thence, but to get such medicines as were fit for her majesty, and then returned again, and was in the bed-chamber when she cryed out, and was delivered; the deponent followed Mrs. Delabadie, who took the prince in her arms so soon as he was born and carried him into the little bedchamber, where the deponent saw him upon her lap, and was by when he took two or three drops of the navel string fresh warm blood which was mixed with black cherry water, then returned into the great bed chamber where the deponent saw the after-burthen fresh and warm. W. WALDEGRAVE.

Dr. Robert Brady, one of his majesty's physicians in ordinary, deposeth,

That a little before ten of the clock in the morning on the 10th of June, 1688, the deponent was in the queen's little bed chamber at St. James's, where the deponent saw the prince of Wales in Mrs. Labady's lap by the fire side, the deponent desired to see the linen and blankets opened in which he was wrapped, which being done, the deponent saw it was a male child, and the navel-string hanging down to, or below the virile parts, with a ligature upon it, not far from the body, but did not see any after-burthen hanging at, or joyned to it, not being at the birth; the deponent asked how long he had been born, the standers-by told him, at three quarters of an hour after nine of the clock, the queen was delivered.

ROBERT BRADY.

James St. Amand, their majesties apothecary, deposeth,

That from the beginning of November last, he hath generally every day till the 9th of June, 1688, given by the physicians orders restraining and corroborating medicines to the queen's majesty: That on the 10th of June he was sent for in haste to come to St. James's to her majesty, who, the messenger told him, was in labour; that the deponent then received a note from the physicians for medicines for her majesty, which the deponent was obliged to stay and prepare, and so came not to St. James's till the queen was delivered, the deponent meeting, just as shew as going into the bed-chamber, Mrs. Labadie with the young prince in her arms, the king and several of the lords soon after following into the little bed-chamber, where the deponent saw the child naked before it was cleansed from the impurities of its birth, and also saw the navel-string cut, and some drops of fresh blood received into a spoon, which the deponent mingled with a little black-cherry water, and saw given by the physicians orders to the child; and afterwards going into the great bed-chamber where the queen was delivered he saw the after-burthen, &c. fresh.

JAMES ST. AMAND.

After these Depositions were taken, His Majesty was pleased to acquaint the lords, That the princess Anne of Denmark would have been present, but that she being with child, and having not lately stirred abroad, could not come so far without hazard. Adding further,

And now, my Lords, although I did not question but every person here present was satisfied before in this matter, yet by what you have heard, you will be better able to satisfy others. Besides, if I and the queen could be thought so wicked as to endeavour to impose a child upon the nation, you see how impossible it would have been, neither could I myself be imposed upon, having constantly been with the queen during her being with child, and the whole time of her labour. And there is none of you but will easily believe me, who have suffered so much for conscience sake, incapable of so great a villainy, to the prejudice of my own children. And I thank God, that those that know me, know well that it is my principle, to do as I would be done by, for that is the Law and the Prophets: and I would rather die a thousand deaths, than do the least wrong to any of my children.

His Majesty farther said:

If any of my lords think it necessary the queen should be sent for, it shall be done.

But their lordships not thinking it necessary, her majesty was not sent for.

It is ordered this day by his Majesty in council, that the several Declarations here before made by his Majesty, and by her Majesty the Queen Dowager, together with the several Depositions here entered, be forthwith enrolled in the court of Chancery, and the Lord Chancellor is ordered to cause the same to be enrolled accordingly.

In pursuance of which order in council the lord chancellor on Saturday the 27th day of October following, in the high court of chancery (many of the nobility and lords of his majesty's most honourable privy council being there present) caused the aforesaid order of council, and declarations of his majesty, and likewise that of her majesty the Queen dowager, to be openly and distinctly read in court, as the same are entered in the words aforesaid in the council book. And the lords and ladies and other persons who made the respective depositions aforesaid, being present in court, were sworn again, and having heard their several depositions distinctly read, in the words aforesaid, and being severally interrogated by the court to the truth thereof, they all upon their oaths affirmed their respective depositions to be true, and did likewise depose (except some few who came in late to the council chamber, or some who stood at too great a distance) that they heard his majesty and her majesty the queen dowager make the several declarations aforesaid, and that the same, as they had been read, were truly entered as they did believe, in the council book, according to the sense, intent and meaning of what his majesty the king, and her majesty the queen dowager did then declare. And for as much as the earl of Huntingdon and the earl of Peterborow, who were able to depose to the matters aforesaid, had not been examined at the council board, but had brought their several depositions in writing which they delivered into court, the said lord chancellor, after the said earls were severally sworn, ordered their depositions to be openly read in these words following:

Upon Trinity Sunday the tenth of June 1688, I went to St. James's house about nine o'clock in the morning, and followed my lord chancellor, through the lodgings to the dressing room, next to the queen's bed chamber, where divers lords of the council were met upon occasion of the queen's being in labour, the king came several times into the room, and amongst other things was pleased to tell us, that the queen came exactly according to her first reckoning, which was from the king's return from his progress to Bath in September 1687. After this the counsellors were ordered to come into the bed chamber, and I stood on that side of the bed that had the curtains drawn open, I heard her majesty cry out several times. I staid in the room during the birth of the prince of Wales. I saw him carried into the little bed chamber, whither the king, the lords, and myself in particular did follow him.

HUNTINGDON.

I had the honour to be in the king's chamber in the morning, when word was brought him, the queen was not well, and followed him into the dressing room next her majesty's bed chamber, where I staid till his majesty called me to come in, which was about the beginning of her pains. I confess the compassion I had for her majesty, hearing her cries, made my stay there very uneasy, one of the last especially seemed to me so sharp, as it really forced me for a little time to stop my ears with my fingers to avoid hearing more of the like; when setting them at liberty, I heard no more, but perceived a sudden satisfaction in the faces of the assistants, several saying, that the queen was delivered, and soon thereupon I saw the prince brought from about the bed, and carried into the little bed-chamber, whither I went afterwards, to behold him more particularly, where I saw him as a child newly born.

PETERBOROW.

After which the said Earls did severally upon their oaths affirm their depositions to be true, as they had been read, and that they were present in council, and heard his majesty and her majesty the queen dowager make the several declarations aforesaid, and that the same were entered in the council book as they did believe according to the effect true sense and meaning of what their majesties declared in council; whereupon his majesty's attorney general moved the court, that the said declarations of his majesty, and of her majesty the queen dowager, and the several depositions, and the order of council should be enrolled in the petty bag office, and in the office of inrolments in the court of chancery, for the safe preservation and custody of them, which the lord chancellor ordered accordingly.

At the Court at Whitehall the first of November 1688. Present, The King's most excellent Majesty in council.

It is this day ordered by his majesty in council, that these declarations of his majesty and of her majesty the queen dowager, and depositions, be printed by his majesty's printers, and that none other do presume to print the same.

WILLIAM BRIDGEMAN.

Against the genuineness of this pretended prince of Wales,* it was objected, that the alleged delivery of the queen was fictitious; that the child originally produced as the queen's died on the night of his alleged birth, whereupon another child was substituted, which some weeks afterwards either died or was in extreme danger of death at Richmond, and that then another substitute was introduced; so that, in the phrase of those who maintained this opinion, "the pretended son of James the 2d was really James the 3rd." The grounds of these objections are stated, and their validity is discussed, in the original historians of the period, and in various publications concerning the genuineness of the child. There is also copious allusion to this matter in a work of Mandeville's, printed in the year 1720, under the title of "Free Thoughts on Religion, the Church and National Happiness:" in p. 325 of which, it is said, that "nine in ten of the people living at the time did not believe that the queen had a child."

That the queen was not delivered of any child at the time of the alleged birth of the 'pretended Prince of Wales,' is moreover stoutly asserted and maintained with a plausible but unsatisfactory minuteness of narrative and elaboration of argument in a piece which was published shortly afterwards, under the title of "A Memorial from the English Protestants for their Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Orange."

The following passages relating to the queen's pregnancy occur in the Diary of Henry Earl of Clarendon:

"Jan. 1, 1688. The common report this

* This is the name by which he is generally distinguished in the Statute Book. See 13 W. 3, c. 3. 6 Ann. c. 7. But in some Statutes, (see 1 G. 1, c. 1. 17 G. 2, c. 39) he is styled 'The Pretender,' which is the appellation ordinarily applied in common speech and writing to those who have laid claim to the crown in opposition to the act of settlement (12 and 13 W. 3, c. 2.) Boswell, in his 'Tour to the Hebrides,' gives to the son of the 'Pretended prince of Wales' (which son was in common parlance denominated 'the young Pretender,") the title of 'Prince Charles Edward,' as being, he says, grandson of Sobiesky king of Poland, and so a 'prince by courtesy.'

There is some humour, as well as readiness, in the reply of Dr. Byrom, a sturdy non-juror, who had been much pressed to drink the toast of 'God bless the King:'

God bless the King! God bless our Faith's Defender!
God bless—no harm's in blessing—the Pretender!
But who Pretender is, or who is King, (God bless us all!) that's quite another thing.

morning was, that the queen was quick. I am sure all honest men wish the increase of the royal family."

"Jan. 15. In the morning I went to St. James's church: this was the thanksgiving day appointed for the queen's being with child. There were not above two or three in the church, who brought the form of prayer with them: it is strange to see, how the queen's great belly is every where ridiculed, as if scarce any body believed it to be true. Good God help us."

"April 16. The queen is very much out of order to day: insomuch that it was feared she would miscarry."

"May 9. In the evening the queen was indisposed; upon which the king was sent for from Clatham," [qu. Chatham.]

"May 10. The queen continued much out of order."

"May 11. The queen was very well, and had a very good night."

"June 10. In the morning I was at St. James's church; where I observed great whispering; but could not learn, what the matter was. As I was going home my page told me, the queen was brought to bed of a son: I sent presently to St. James's, (whither the court removed but the last night) and word was brought me, it was true, that her majesty was delivered about ten this morning. As soon as I dined, I went to court, and found the king shaving. I kissed his hand, and wished him joy. He said, the queen was so quick in her labour, and he had so much company, that he had not time to dress himself till now. He bid me go and see the prince. I went into the room, which had been formerly the duchess's private bed-chamber; and there my lady Powis (who was made governess) shewed me the prince: he was asleep in his cradle, and was a very fine child to look upon."

"June 11. In the morning there was a strong rumour that the young prince was dead: he had been ill in the night, and the king was called up; but upon giving him remedies, God be thanked, he grew better."

"June 17. I was at St. James's church. This was appointed for a day of thanksgiving for the birth of the prince of Wales."

"June 23. Monsieur Zulestein arrived from Holland from the prince of Orange to congratulate the birth of the prince of Wales."

"July 31. I went to Windsor. I waited on the king and queen; who, as soon as they had dined, went to Richmond, the prince not being well: he was settled there for the benefit of the air."

"August 2. The prince was extremely ill, and was thought in great danger: he had been hitherto brought up by hand, and now they spoke of giving him a nurse."

"August 8. I was told the prince had been very ill, till the day before yesterday, when a nurse was given him; and that upon sucking he visibly mended."

"August 11. My wife was at Windsor, and brought an account that the prince was come thither to day extremely mended."

"Oct. 15. In the afternoon the prince of Wales, (who had been formerly baptized) had his name given him with great solemnity in St. James's chapel; which is, James Francis Edward." *

"Oct. 21. In the afternoon I had a summons to be at council to-morrow at ten o'clock in the morning. The messenger told me, he had orders to summon all the rest of the peers in town; as well those who were not, as those who were privy counsellors. I visited my lord Halifax, in hopes to have learnt the cause of this meeting; but he told me, he had received his summons; but could not imagine, what it was for. We agreed to communicate to each other what we heard; and, I said, I would call upon him to-morrow morning, as I went to court. I waited on the princess, hoping to learn there the occasion of this extraordinary summons. She told me, she knew not certainly, why it was; but she believed, it was for something relating to the prince of Wales. She had much company: so I could get but two words with her."

"Oct. 22. In the morning I went to lord Halifax; where I found lord Burlington and lord Weymouth: quickly after came in my lord Nottingham. They all seemed to wonder at this extraordinary summons. I told them, what I heard was the cause of it, without naming my author: lord Nottingham said, he had heard the same. I said, I was in some difficulty, what to do: I was unwilling to displease the king, by not being there; and yet I had resolved not to sit in council with father Peters.† Lord Nottingham was of the same mind; and after some little further discourse he and I went to Whitehall together. We

* "It was another unpopular thing," says Kennett (Complete History, vol. 3, p. 522, 2d edit.) "to baptize the prince of Wales into the Roman Communion, and make the Pope his godfather, as if it were done with a designed insult upon the Protestant religion; and to give this public account of it: 'Whitehall, October 15. This day, in the chapel of St. James's, his royal highness the prince of Wales, being before christened, was solemnly named (amidst the ceremonies and rites of baptism) James Francis Edward. His holiness, represented by his nuncio, godfather, and the queen dowager godmother. The king and queen assisted at the solemnity, with a great attendance of nobility and gentry, and concourse of people, all expressing their joy and satisfaction, which was suitable to the place and occasion.'"

† This man, who is sometimes called Petre and sometimes Peters, was of the family of the lord Petre. He was Confessor to James the Second, and in very great favour with him; the king had made him a privy counsellor, and, as it appears, designed for him the archbishopric of York: he seems to have been the principal found the king almost dressed: I told him, my lord Nottingham and I desired to speak with his majesty. He presently took us into the room within his bed-chamber: I begun, and said, we had received a summons to attend him this morning; that, I perceived, it was upon some extraordinary business, by all the peers, who were in town, being summoned likewise; that, I hoped, his majesty would not be offended with me, if I humbly begged, he would give me leave to be there as a peer, and not as a counsellor. The king seemed a little uneasy, and asked my reason. I told him, I should be always ready to serve him; but I humbly begged his pardon in saying, that I could not sit at council with father Peters. Lord Nottingham spake more largely to the same effect. The king said, We should see father Peters no more at council. Lord Nottingham asked, if he was put out of the council? The king replied, No; but he had sent him an intimation not to come thither; and he should be there no more. Then lord Nottingham said, there were others at that board, who were not qualified to sit there; and that he could not join in council with them: at which the king seemed a little angry, and bid us go as we would. He said, the hour drew near; and so he went away. We went into the council chamber, and sate among the lords, and not at the board; as did the archbishop of Canterbury. The queen dowager was there, and, I think, all the bishops in town; as likewise my lord mayor and aldermen, all the judges, and the king's learned council. The king said, the princess would have been there; but being with child, and having been subject to miscarry, it was not safe for her to go out of the chamber. The king made a short speech, to acquaint the lords with the occasion of the meeting; which was, to take several depositions upon oath relating to the birth of the prince of Wales; all which, with what his majesty said, are in the council books.

"Oct. 23. In the morning I waited on the princess. She presently fell to talk of the examinations taken yesterday, and told me, I had heard a great deal of fine discourse at council; and made herself very merry with that whole affair. She was dressing, and all her women about her; many of whom put in their jests. I was amazed at this behaviour, and adviser of king James in his furious measures concerning religion.

In the 5th volume of the Harleian Miscellany is printed an article of coarse and vulgar abuse against Petre, entitled, "The last Will and Testament of Father Peters; as it was found quilted into my Lord Chancellor's Cap: with a Letter addressed to his Lordship, &c. and his Prayer to the Blessed Virgin of Loretto;" to which, I observe, is annexed as a Note in the edition of 1810, p. 329, a short biographical account of Hugh Peters the fanatic, who was executed as a regicide in the year 1660. See his Case, vol. 5, p. 1116, of this Collection.

thought not fit to say any thing at present; but I whispered to her royal highness, that she would give me leave to speak with her in private. She said, it grew late, and she must make haste to be ready for prayers; but I might come at any time to her, except this afternoon: so I went home. In the evening my brother was with me: I told him all this concerning the princess, and wished, he would go and talk with her; but he said, it would signify nothing."

"Oct. 31. In the afternoon I waited upon the princess: she was in her closet: but quickly came out to me. She said, she was sorry, she had disappointed me so often, when I desired to speak with her; and asked me now, what I had to say? I told her, that I was extremely surprised and troubled the other day, to find her royal highness speak so slightly of the prince of Wales's affairs, and to suffer her women to make their jests upon it: she replied, surely I could not but hear the common rumours concerning him. I said, that I did hear very strange rumours indeed, as every one must do, who lived any thing publicly in the world; but that to me there seemed no colour for them. The princess then said, she would not say, she believed them; but, she must needs say, the queen's behaviour during her being with child was very odd, especially considering the reports that went abroad: is it not strange, said she, that the queen should never (as often as I am with her, mornings and evenings) speak to me to feel her belly? I asked, if the queen had at other times of her being with child bid her do it? She answered, No; that is true. Why then, madam, said I, should you wonder, she did not bid you do it this time? Because, said she, of the reports. Possibly, said I, she did not mind the reports. I am sure, said she, the king knew of them; for, as he has been sitting by me in my own chamber, he would speak of the idle stories that were given out, of the queen's not being with child, laughing at them. Therefore, said she, I cannot but wonder, there was no more care taken to satisfy the world. I asked her, if her royal highness had upon those occasions said any thing to the king? She answered, no. I replied, that the king might very well think, she minded the reports no more than he did, since she said nothing to him, even when he gave her opportunities; that in my humble opinion, if she had the least dissatisfaction, she ought to have discovered it for the public good, as well as for her own and her sister's sake. She replied, if she had said any thing to the king, he would have been angry; and then God knows, what might have happened. I answered, that, if she had no mind to have spoken to the king herself, she had friends, who would have endeavoured to serve her, and would have managed it without any prejudice to her: that this was the first time she had said any thing to me, though I had sometimes given her occasion to open her mind, by putting her upon speaking to the king, since these alarms of an invasion. I begged her to consider, what miseries these suppositions might entail upon the kingdom, even in case God should bless the king with more sons: I therefore humbly besought her to consider, and do something, that the world might see, her royal highness was satisfied. To all this she made no answer; but, as I went away, she desired I would see her often. Strange!"

"Nov. 1. To day at council the king directed the whole privy council to attend the princess of Denmark, with copies of the depositions concerning the birth of the prince of Wales, and of what his majesty said in council upon that occasion. In the evening, after the council was up, all the lords accordingly waited on the princess with the said depositions, and declarations of his majesty, and the queen dowager. Upon receiving them from their lordships, the princess answered to this effect: 'My lords, this was not necessary; for I have 'so much duty for the king, that his word 'must be more to me than these depositions.' I was in the next room; and, when the lords came out, I went in. The princess was pleased to tell me the answer she gave, as above; upon which I said, I hoped there remained no suspicion with her royal highness. She made no answer, there being company in the chamber."

I have not observed in Clarendon's Diary, any later mention of this matter, except his notice that on Dec. 5, Burnet asserted to him that the child was supposititious, and that on Dec. 24th, when he moved the Lords, that they "might inquire into the birth of the prince of Wales," lord Wharton replied to this effect: "My Lords, I did not expect at this time of day to hear any body mention that child who was called the prince of Wales. Indeed I did not; and I hope we shall hear no more of him."

In Dalrymple's Memoirs, Appendix, part 1, are printed several Letters from king James to the prince of Orange, in one of which, dated May 11, 1688, he tells him, "The queen had not been well, and was in some fears of coming before her time, but God be thanked, she was very well all day yesterday, and continues so now, so that I hope she will go out her full time." And in another dated June 12, he says, "The queen was, God be thanked, safely delivered of a son, on Sunday morning, a little before ten; she has been very well ever since, but the child was somewhat ill this last night of the wind and some gripes, but is now, blessed be God, very well again, and like to have no returns of it, and is a very strong boy." Dalrymple also publishes in the same Appendix, some "curious Notes from the princess Anne's Letters to her sister, which were taken from the originals by the late Doctor Birch," and which he says the earl of Hardwicke was so obliging as to give him. Among them are the following:

"The Cockpit, March 14, 1687-8.

"I cannot help thinking Mansell's wife's

(i. e. the queen) great belly is a little suspicious. It is true indeed, she is very big, but she looks better than ever she did, which is not usual; for people when they are so far gone, for the most part, look very ill: besides, it is very odd, that the bath, that all the best doctors thought would do her a great deal of harm, should have had so very good effect so soon, as that she should prove with child from the first minute she and Mansell met, after her coming from thence. Her being so positive it will be a son, and the principles of that religion being such, that they will stick at nothing, be it never so wicked, if it will promote their interest, give some cause to fear there may be foul play intended. I will do all I can to find it out, if it be so; and if I should make any discovery, you shall be sure to have an account of it."

"The Cockpit, March 20, 1687-8,

"I hope you will instruct Bentley, what you would have your friends to do, if any alteration should come, as it is to be feared there will, especially if Mansell has a son, which I conclude he will, there being so much reason to believe it is a false belly. For methinks, if it were not, there having been so many stories and jests made about it, she should, to convince the world, make either me, or some of my friends feel her belly; but quite contrary, whenever one talks of her being with child, she looks as if she were afraid one should touch her. And whenever I have happened to be in the room, as she has been undressing, she has always gone in the next room, to put on her smock. These things give me so much just cause of suspicion, that I believe, when she is brought to bed, nobody will be convinced it is her child, except it prove a daughter. For my part, I declare I shall not, except I see the child and she parted."

"The Cockpit, June 18, 1688.

"My dear sister cannot imagine the concern and vexation I have been in, that I should be so unfortunate to be out of town when the queen was brought to bed, for I shall never now be satisfied, whether the child be true or false. It may be it is our brother, but God only knows, for she never took care to satisfy the world, or give people any demonstration of it. It is wonderful, if she had really been with child, that nobody was suffered to feel it stir, but Madam Mazarin, and lady Sunderland, who are people that nobody will give credit to. If out of her pride, she would not have let me touch her, methinks it would have been very natural for her sometimes, when she has been undressing, to have let Mrs. Roberts, as it were by chance have seen her belly; but instead of endeavouring to give one any satisfaction, she has always been very shy both to her and me. The great bustle that was made about her lying in at Windsor, and then resolving all of a sudden to go to St. James's, which is much the properest place to act such a cheat in; and Mr. Turone's lying in the bedchamber that night she fell in labour, and none of the family besides being removed from Whitehall, are things, that give one great cause to be suspicious. But that, which to me seems the plainest thing in the world, is, her being brought to bed two days after she heard of my coming to town, and saying that the child was come at the full time, when every body knows, by her own reckoning, that she should have gone a month longer. After all this, it is possible it may be her child; but where one believes it, a thousand do not. For my part, except they do give very plain demonstrations, which is almost impossible now, I shall ever be of the number of unbelievers. I don't find that people are at all disheartened, but seem all of a mind, which is a very comfortable thing at such a time as this."

"The prince of Wales has been ill these three or four days; and if he has been so bad as some people say, I believe it will not be long before he is an angel in heaven."

"Questions sent by the Princess of Orange, to the Princess Anne of Denmark.

"July 21, 1688.

"1. Whether the queen desired at any time any of the ladies, in particular the princess of Denmark, to feel her belly, since she thought herself quick; and who those ladies are; and when that was, whether in the beginning of her being quick, or of late?

"2. Whether the milk that, as is said, was in the queen's breasts, was seen by many, or conducted in a mystery?

"3. Whether the astringents, that the queen is said to have taken, were taken by her openly, or if a mystery was made of that?

"4. Whether the treating of the queen's breasts for drawing back the milk, and the giving her clean linen, has been managed openly, or mysteriously?

"5. At what hour did the queen's labour begin?

"6. At what hour was the notice of it sent to the king? Whether the king did not lie at St. James's, or with the queen that night; or if he was gone back to Whitehall?

"7. Whether upon sending to the king, the thing was let fly over St. James's and Whitehall; or if the notice was sent secretly to the king?

"8. Whether did the king send about for the privy counsellors; or if he took those that were by accident at Whitehall?

"9. At what time came the king with the council into the queen's chamber?

"10. Whether was there a screen at the foot of the bed, between it and the rest of the room or not?

"11. Whether did any women, besides the confidants, see the queen's face when she was in labour? And whether she had the looks of a woman in labour? Who was in the room, both men and women? What time they came in, and how near they stood?

"12. How long was the king talking to the privy counsellors, after the child was carried into the next room, before he went to look upon it? and in this, as well as in the other questions, relating to the point of time, a critical answer, as near to a minute as it is possible, is desired.

"13. What women, of one sort or other, were present? And if no woman was called in to hold the queen?

"14. Were no ladies sent for? or who were sent for? and at what time the message was sent to the queen dowager? Also at what time she came?

"15. Whether in any former labour the queen was delivered so mysteriously, so suddenly, and so few being called for?

"16. If many observed the child's limbs being slender at first, and their appearing all of a sudden to be round and full?

"17. Is the queen fond of it?

"18. How Mrs. Dawson, Mrs. Bromley stands with the queen? Which of her bed-chamber women are most in favour?

"Ad. 12. Who took the child, when it was born?

"Ad. 13. If the king did not use to be nearer the bed, and hold the queen in former labours?

"Ad. 16. If every body is permitted to see the child at all hours, dressed and undressed?

"Ad. 16. Who is about it, rockers and dry nurse?

"Ad. 3. What doctors were consulted about the queen, before, and since her being at the bath. Whether Doctor Waldgrave alone, or others with him, knew the particulars of her condition, all along."

"The Princess Anne of Denmark's Answer.

"The Cockpit, July 24, 1688.

"I received yesterday, yours of the 19th, by which I find you are not satisfied with the account I have given you in my last letter; but I hope you will forgive my being no more particular, when you consider, that not being upon the place, all I could know, must be from others; and having then been but a few days in town, I had not time to enquire so narrowly into things, as I have since; but before I say any more, I can't help telling you, I am very sorry you should think I would be negligent in letting you know things of any consequence. For though I am generally lazy; and it is true indeed, when I write by the post, for the most part, I make those letters very short, not daring to tell you any news by it; and being very ill at invention, yet I hope you will forgive my being lazy, when I write such letters, since I have never missed any opportunity of giving you all the intelligence I am able; and pray be not so unjust to believe I can think the doing any thing you can desire, any trouble; for certainly I would do a great deal more for you, if it lay in my power, than the answering your questions, which I shall do now as exactly as you desire.

"1. I never heard any body say they felt the child stir; but I am told lady Sunderland, and Madam Mazarin say they felt it at the beginning. Mrs. Dawson tells me she has seen it stir, but never felt it.

"2. I never saw any milk; but Mrs. Dawson says she has seen it upon her smock, and that it began to run at the same time it used to do of her other children.

"3. For what they call restringing draughts, I saw her drink two of them; and I do not doubt but she drank them frequently and publicly before her going to the bath. Dr. Waldgrave was very earnest with sir Charles Scarborough, to be for her going thither; but he was so fierce against it, that there was another consultation of doctors called, sir Charles Scarborough, Dr. Waldgrave, Wetherby, Brady, and Brown. After that, there was only sir Charles Scarborough and Dr. Waldgrave (and for the first I believe he knew but little), excepting once, when she was to be let blood, and when she was to have gone to Windsor. Then some of the others were called in to give their opinions.

"4. All I can say in this article is, that once in discourse, Mrs. Bromley told Mrs. Roberts, one day Rogers's daughter came into the room, when Mrs. Mansell was putting off her clouts, and she was very angry at it, because she did not care to be seen when she was shifting.

"5. She fell in labour about eight o'clock.

"6. She sent for the king at that time, who had been up a quarter of an hour, having lain with her that night, and was then dressing.

"7. As soon as the king came, he sent for the queen dowager, and all the council. After that, it was known all over St. James's.

"8. Most of the other men, I suppose, that were there, was at the king's rising.

"9. They came into the room presently after the queen dowager came, which is about half an hour before she was brought to bed.

"10. There was no screen. She was brought to bed in the bed she lay in all night, and in the great bed chamber, as she was of her last child.

"11. The feet curtains of the bed were drawn, and the two sides were open. When she was in great pain, the king called in haste for my lord chancellor, who came up to the bed-side to shew he was there; upon which the rest of the privy counsellors did the same thing. Then the queen desired the king to hide her face with his head and periwig, which he did, for she said she could not be brought to bed and have so many men look on her; for all the council stood close at the bed's feet, and lord chancellor upon the step.

"12. As soon as the child was born, the midwife cut the navel-string, because the afterburthen did not follow quickly; and then she gave it to Mrs. Labadie, who, as she was going by the bed-side, cross the step, to carry it into the little bed-chamber, the king stopped her, and said to the privy counsellors, that they were witnesses there was a child born, and bid them follow it into the next room and see what it was, which they all did; for till after they came out again, it was not declared what it was; but the midwife had only given a sign that it was a son, which is what had been done before.

"13. When the queen dowager first came into the room she went up to the bed-side, but after that stood all the while by the clock. There was in the room lord chancellor, lord president, lord privy seal, the two chamberlains, lord Middleton, lord Cran—, lord Huntingdon, lord Powis, lord Dover, lord Peterborough, lord Melfort, lord Dartmouth, sir John Ernley, lord Preston, sir Nicholas Butler, duke of Beaufort, lord Berkeley, lord Murray, lord Castlemain; these were of the council: and for others, there was lord Feversham, lord Arran, sir St. Fox, and Mr. Griffin, besides pages of the back-stairs and priests. The women that were there were, lady Peterborough, lady Bellasis, lady Arran, lady Tyrconnel, lady Roscommon, lady S. Buckley, lady Fingal, madam Mazarin, madam Bouillon, lady Powis, lady Strickland, lady C—, Mrs. Cran, two of the queen dowager's Portuguesees, Mrs. Bromley, Mrs. Dawson, Mrs. Waldgrave, lady Wentworth, and Mrs. Feraine. All these stood as near as they could. Lady Bellasis gave the midwife the receiver, and Mrs. Dawson stood behind a Dutch chair that the midwife sat upon to do her work. All the time the child was parted, I do not hear of any body that held the queen except the king, and he was upon the bed by her all the while.

"14. I do not hear that any ladies were sent for but the queen's own, and they were called presently after the queen dowager. She came a quarter after nine: where she stood, and at what time she was sent for, I have already told you.

"15. Her labour never used to be so long.

"16. I never heard what you say of the child's limbs. As for seeing it drest or undrest, they avoid it as much as they can. By all I have seen and heard, sometimes they refuse almost every body to see it; that is, when they say it is not well; and methinks there is always a mystery in it, for one does not know whether it be really sick, and they fear one should know it, or whether it is well, and they would have one think it is sick, as the other children used to be. In short, it is not very clear any thing they do; and for the servants, from the highest to the lowest they are all Papists.

"17. The queen forbid lady Powis to bring the child to her before any company; but that, they say, she used to do to her other children. I dined there the other day, when it was said it had been very ill of a looseness, and it really looked so; yet when she came from prayers she went to dinner without seeing it, and after that played at comet, and did not go to it till she was put out of the pool.

"18. I believe none of the bed-chamber women have any credit with the queen but Mrs. Tureine; but they say Mrs. Bromley has an interest with the king.

"I am going to Tunbridge; but if I was to stay here I could not watch the child, for it is to be at Richmond. Lady Churchill does not go with me at first, and as long as she stays here, I am sure she will do all in her power to give you and I an account if any thing happens that is worth knowing.

"I have done my endeavour to inform myself of every thing; for I have spoke with Mrs. Dawson, and asked her all the questions I could think of: for not being in the room when the queen was brought to bed, one must enquire of somebody that was there; and I thought she could tell me as much as any body, and would be less likely to speak of it; and I took all the care I could, when I spoke to her, to do it in such a manner that I might know every thing; and in case she should betray me, that the king and queen might not be angry with me.

"It was she that told me what I have said in the 5, 6, 7, 9, 12, 13, 14, and 15th articles. She told me, besides, that when she came to the queen, she found Mrs. Tureine and the midwife with her. All that she says seems very clear; but one does not know what to think; for methinks it is wonderful, if it is no cheat, that they never took pains to convince me of it.

"I hope I have answered your letter as fully as you desire; if there be any thing else you would know, pray tell me by the first safe hand, and you shall always find me very diligent in obeying you, and shewing by my actions how real and sincere my kindness is.

"One thing I had forgot, which is, that the last time she was brought to bed, the reason of her being delivered in the great bed was because she was catched; and this time, Mrs. Dawson says, though the pallet was up, the queen would not go into it because the quilts were not aired."

In the same Appendix Dalrymple says:

"The ingenious and learned Mr. Duan was so obliging as to communicate to me the following letter, in his possession, from Dr. Chamberlayne to the Electress Sophia, concerning the birth of the Pretender.

Dr. Hugh Chamberlayne to the Electress Sophia.—Account of the Pretender's birth.

"May it please your royal highness;

"I should not have presumed to interrupt your better spent hours with my rude and unpolished lines, had I not been encouraged by your gracious commands, sent by the rev. Heer Meuschen, minister of the gospel to the Lutheran church in the Hague. He was pleased to give me a short account of a discourse past in your royal highness's presence, wherein my name was mentioned upon two different subjects, of which I think it my duty to give your royal highness the best satisfaction I can. The first related to my attendance at the birth of the Pretender to the crown of Great Britain, now firmly settled by law on your royal highness. In this I perceive the Heer Meuschen was misled, confounding my discourse with him, on this matter, together with the conversation he might have had with others, occasioned by pamphlets, then here current, pretending an account how far I had been therein engaged, to which several falsehoods were added; one of those papers was writ by Mr. Burnet, son to the bishop of Salisbury. The matter of fact follows:

"On Sunday morning, the day of the month and year occurs not at present to my memory, the queen sent early a footman to fetch me to St. James's; but late the night before being gone to Chatham to visit a patient, he missed me; a post was immediately dispatched, and I hastened and found a child newly born, loose and undrest in lady Powis her lap, and, as I was informed, brought forth an hour before I came. I was not long in the chamber when came the late duke Hamilton, then lord Arran; more, as to this particular, I cannot offer on my own knowledge, but shall subjoin a few probable circumstances; for instance, the dutchess of Monmouth having some time before sent for me, and being in the mean time gone to the queen's levee, left order I should wait her grace's return; when arrived, she was pleased to make this excuse for my waiting; that she had been with her majesty, saw her shifted and her belly very big, which I suppose nothing can so soon reduce as the bearing a child; other tumours requiring for a complete abatement, weeks, months, or years. This relation being wholly occasioned by a chance, and mentioned by one at that time disoblged by the court, I take to be genuine, without artifice or disguise, so that I never since questioned it. Another circumstance in this case is, that my being a noted whig, and signally opprest by king James, they would never have hazarded such a secret as a supposititious child, which, had I been at home to have immediately followed the summons, I must have come time enough to have discovered, though the queen had usually very quick labours. Next morning meeting the king coming through the Park to St. James's, he was pleased to tell me that when he sent I was absent: to which I humbly replied, more warning had been necessary: but he told me they were surprised, for the queen expected to go a fortnight longer: whereupon I answered, that if his majesty had given me three or four months warning as formerly, I would not have left the town without their majesties knowledge and leave. The king told me further, that Dr. Brady, one of his physicians, and phisic professor in Cambridge, had informed him no woman exceeded eight and thirty weeks with child: to which, with a modest smile, I replied, it might be true, though I could not guess how he, I, or another, could know it to be so without having been guardians to a seraglio. I confess I was a little piqued, that besides former slights, neither the king nor queen themselves had spoke to me to attend: indeed, lady Sophia Buckley told me, in her majesty's presence, some weeks before, that shortly there would be occasion for me; but I did not take that for sufficient orders. At another time lady Jefferies asking whether I had commands to attend her majesty? I briskly answered, I thought I should, unless their brains were in disorder. A third material circumstance may be admitted; that during my attendance on the child, by his majesty's directions, I had frequent discourse with the necessary woman, who being in mighty dread of Popery, and confiding in my reputed whiggism, would often complain of the busy pragmatism of the Jesuits, who placed and displaced whom they pleased, and for her part she expected a speedy remove, for the Jesuits would endure none but their own party: such was our common entertainment; but about a fortnight after the child was born, a rumour being spread through the city that the child was supposititious, she cried, alas! will they not let the poor infant alone? I am certain no such thing as the bringing a strange child in a warming-pan could be practised without my seeing it, attending constantly in and about all the avenues of the chamber.

"Other remoter accidents might be alledged, which being of smaller moment, are forborne; but neither the laws nor practice of England allow other hereditary right to the crown, or private estates, than what upon good grounds, the nation hath power to alter, and often do."

Upon which Dalrymple thus proceeds:

"To defend the Revolution upon a pretended supposititious birth, is to affront it; it stands upon a much nobler foundation, the rights of human nature. The supposititious birth was a mere lie of party, and was intended to have been made use of six years before, if king James's queen had then been brought to bed of a son.

"In the Observer, No. 194, printed Wednesday, August 23d, 1682, is the following remarkable passage:

"If it had pleased God to give his royal highness the blessing of a son, as it proved a daughter, you were prepared to make a Perkin of him. To what end did you take so much pains else, by your instruments and intelligences, to hammer it into the people's heads that the dutchess of York was not with child? And so, in case of a son, to represent him as an impostor; whereas you have now taken off the mask in confessing the daughter.—I would have the impression of this cheat sink so far into the heads and hearts of all honest men, as never to be defaced, or forgotten. For we must expect, that the same flam shall, at any time hereafter, be trumped up again upon the like occasion."

He also publishes a letter from the earl of Devonshire to the prince of Orange, dated the 13th of March, O. S. in which is the following passage: "The king declares always his intentions to assemble a parliament, although matters do not seem disposed for it, they believe it will be about the time of the queen's being brought to bed. The Roman Catholics incline absolutely that it should be a son."

And a letter dated March 27, 1688, from lord Danby to the prince of Orange, begins thus:

"London, March 27, 1688.

"Many of our ladies say, that the queen's great belly seems to grow faster than they observed their own to do; and because it is fit her majesty should always have the greatest persons near her in this condition, I hope the princess will take care that the princess Anne may be always within call; and especially to see (when the time is near) that the midwife discharges her duty with that care which ought to be had in a case of so great concern."

The following passage is extracted from the Englishman, N^o 5, published October 15, 1713:

"The enemies of the constitution assume every day a new audaciousness, and leave no arts unpractised to undermine it. There is a printed paper given into the hands of passengers gratis, intituled, 'Seasonable Enquiries relating to the birth and birthright of a certain Person.' By the 'Certain Person' is intended the Pretender to her majesty's dominions; and the word 'Seasonable' implies, That the author supposes it is now the proper time to give out insinuations to his advantage. The Fifth Query runs thus:

"Is the birth of a child, owned by both parents to be doubted of, which was never disproved by the next heir who called it in question: and who declared to the world, that he would refer the examination of it to certain judges when assembled, but never did refer it, nor propose it to them, as he declared he would, though the assembly were of his own party, and several times called upon, and challenged by the child's father, to enquire into the birth: Nay, though the said next heir were got into possession of that station, which the child's father did claim while he lived for himself, and for his child upon his demise; and though the said next heir was thus bound in honour and conscience, had power as well as will and opportunity as well as interest, to have disproved it if he could have done it?"

Steele enters not into the question of the Pretender's genuineness, but contents himself with asserting the lawfulness of his exclusion "not only from what estate his parents, whoever they were, might have had among us, but also from the birthright and freedom of an Englishman:" and with maintaining "that by all laws divine and human he is an utter stranger to us, but as he is an enemy." The words "who declared to the world that he would refer the examination of it to certain judges when assembled," &c. alludes to a passage in the prince of Orange's declaration, dated Oct. 10, 1688, in which he said that he would refer to the parliament the enquiry into the birth of the pretended prince of Wales and of all things relating to it.

In the Supplement to the second volume of the Collectanea Curiosa, there is, No. 7, a curious letter from Lloyd bishop of St. Asaph, to Mr. Dodwell, relating to matters of fact at the end of king James the Second's reign, in which is the following passage:

"For the matter of the pretended prince of Wales; when the prince of Orange was come, king James gathered all the witnesses he could to prove the child was born of the queen's body. There was one positive witness for that; but she was a Popish midwife, that never was at any of the queen's childbirths before; all those that served her before in that office were kept away, or not sent for; only this woman being a stranger, and one of no consideration, was brought thither for this purpose, first to take the child out at the pretended delivery, and now at the taking of the depositions to swear she had it out of the queen's body. All the other witnesses swore no other things but what might be as true if the child was supposititious, as if it were the queen's natural child: only there must be a great many mock shews of the things which they swore that they saw; but no doubt there would be such to give credit to a supposititious child. In short, taking all the depositions together, I do not believe a jury of gentlemen would have given an inheritance of 1,000*l.* a year from the next undoubted heir to a child, whose birth had been doubted of, and proved no otherwise than by these depositions. But of a crown there must be an undoubted heir; he that is not that is no heir; or else God deliver us from being an hereditary kingdom: a doubtful heir is a seed of war to all generations.

"But between you and me I could tell you enough to put this matter out of doubt; I could tell you enough to satisfy you that the queen had no child birth, when this child was brought into the world: all was but mere fraud and delusion.

"But you say, why was there not so much as one cross examination, either to weaken their proofs, or to prove the contrary? The answer is plain from what I have written. There was but one witness that knew any thing, and care was taken she should not be cross-examined; for before king James went, she was sent over into France, and the queen went likewise for fear of being asked any questions. The king for his own part seemed to have an apprehension that he might be asked questions himself. I know not where unto else to ascribe it, that he who heretofore wanted not courage, as he shewed upon many occasions, yet since this has been cowardly to a proverb. You have no doubt heard what haste he made in Ireland from the Boin to Waterford in some 24 hours, and from thence over into France.

"You ask, why that matter was not brought before the parliament? The reason is plain in the act of succession. The present king does not pretend to an hereditary right. He had the right of a conquest over king James, which being confirmed by consent of the nation, the same that they consent to the making of their laws, this gives him a lawful right to the monarchy. I say it in the words of Dudley Diggs in his book that was printed at Oxford in defence of Charles 1, against his rebels. Be pleased to read p. 58, 59, of my pamphlet; you will see the same said more at large. I say this to the king was a sufficient title, and the queen and princess Anne had their rights settled by the act of succession.

"They were all satisfied with this: of the people some will never be satisfied: others are as well as they care to be. To either of these sorts of people the examination would be useless. To the rest it might probably do more harm than good. To prove the affirmative of this child's birth, the depositions before mentioned shew that it is impossible. To prove the negative is never required in any court. It is enough if there be no proof of the affirmative: but for this there might be such colours as would disturb the minds of weak people. Put [the] case two or three witnesses bribed with French money should come in and swear as they that hired them should direct; the doubts that might be raised in peoples heads by their perjuries might embroil us and our posterity more than you or I are able to imagine.

"But why did the prince of Orange pretend that this should be examined in parliament? Pray when or where did he pretend it? Never but in his declaration. There indeed he did insist upon this to have the witnesses examined, and that frightened them away. The queen and her midwife are gone. Did the prince of Orange ever pretend to examine any other witness, or did he pretend to examine any witness since they are gone? I ask it because of your words concerning Mr. Ashton," [See his Case, A. D. 1690, in this Collection.] "who, you say, was cut off for providing farther evidence. My dear friend, consider the account that you are to give to God for your words as well as actions. You affirm an accusation of the worst sort of murder against them to whom you owe truth, if no other duty. And this is untrue to my certain knowledge; not to refer you to his trial, against which you have no objection that I know. I must tell you that Mr. Ashton sent for me two days before he died. I was with him some hours, morning and evening, and I think he told me his heart. He said he was going into France for money that the queen owed him, and those letters of treasonable matters were thrust upon him by his friends. He knew not what was in them, but if he might have his life he would be a faithful subject to their majesties. But not a word of the child. I could tell you much more, but I am tired, and the post is going."

In what Macpherson calls The Life of James the Second, written by himself, (see vol. 6, pp. 297, et seq.) it is said, under date October 1688, "On the 15th, the prince of Wales was named. His birth was proved in a council extraordinary on the 22nd. The princess Anne waved being at it, pretending danger in coming abroad, being with child." To which passage Macpherson has printed as a Note, the following letter from Tanner's Collection, Oxon, which is also printed with slight variations, from Macpherson's Report in the Collectanea Curiosa.

"The Bishop of St. Asaph to the Archbishop of Canterbury, October 26, 1688.

"My most honoured Lord;

"I was told, the last night, as a secret, that his majesty intends to send for all the lords that were present at the examination of witnesses, concerning the prince's birth; and to require them to subsign the examinations. This is agreeable enough with that which is printed in the Gazette, viz. That a full and particular relation of this affair will be made public. For the hands of all that were present will add very much to the authority of the relation. I need not say what it will seem to import. Your grace has that to say for yourself, which, perhaps, few others can say that were present. You did not hear what a great part of the witnesses said. If that will pass for a sufficient excuse, your grace has no cause to complain of the badness of your hearing. But surely it will be better for the public, if such an excuse can be found, as will suffice for all that were present; and if all could agree to give the same excuse.

"It should seem, by the calling of you thither, that either there is, or there is like to be, a dispute concerning the truth of this child; and whensoever that matter comes to be tried, you are like to be judges. But if the judges are called to set their hands to an examination of witnesses, ex parte before the cause comes to be heard, it is a strange kind of pre-occupation, that will make all the world of the plaintiff's side; and be rather a prejudice than an advantage to the cause. I hope his majesty will be aware of this, and will, therefore, spare you this unnecessary trouble. Howsoever I thought it a part of my duty, to let your grace know what I have heard. With my daily prayers, I humbly crave your blessing and take leave. My good lord, your grace's most obliged and most obedient son and servant,

W. ASAPH."

The two following articles are extracted from Mr. Hargrave's MS. mentioned in the Case of Magdalen College.

"Sunday, July 1, 1705. Upon a serious discourse with the earl of Clarendon before morning prayer, as I had done several times before, of the scandalous report, now lately revived and especially by the bishop of Kilmore at captain Hutton's house the Sunday preceding, viz. 24th June, when I went to make a visit, that his lady should say that the queen had miscarried [to her knowledge] and that she told this to sir Thomas Clarges, with this addition, which was wholly new to me 'till that time, that 'she had something of the 'after birth in her hand.' I thought fit to acquaint the earl with it, that he might put a stop to that false and wicked report, which reflects so horribly upon the honor of the innocent king and queen and the legitimacy of the birth of the prince of Wales, and upon the reputation of his own lady, if such a story should go on to be propagated without check or controul, and might draw after it, if not sufficiently confuted, dismal and fatal consequences to the prejudice of the young king. He assured me that it was a false and scandalous imputation cast upon his wife, and that what she said was basely and wickedly misrepresented, and that she only told sir Thomas Clarges in his hearing (as she had done before to bishop Lloyd, then of St. Asaph, now of Worcester] that coming from court she had found the queen very ill, and in danger of miscarrying, and not in the least that she had actually miscarried, and that about a week after, the queen growing pretty well for one in her condition, being then big with child, her fears were happily over.

"The bishop of Kilmore several times since told me of this report concerning my lady Clarendon, and that he had his information from sir Walter Clarges who had it from his father sir Thomas, which I looking upon as a malicious invention and as an idle fiction and tale, never opened my lips about it, either to my lord Clarendon, before or after his excellent lady's death, or to any person whatsoever, either man or woman, but suppress it in my breast, giving not the least credit to it. This bishop was the first and only person that acquainted me with this story, untill some good while after (whether half a year or more I cannot positively swear) Mr. Henry Buckley, with whom I had long before contracted some kind of familiar conversation in St. James's park (which I kept up with him upon a principle of Christian charity to recover him if possible at proper and seasonable intervals and occasions from his avowed deism,) asked me if I had heard any thing relating to this matter. I replied, that I believed that it was an arrant lye and slander, and added, that for his satisfaction I would ask my lord Clarendon about it, but to this he would give no way (upon my saying, that it was most highly reasonable, just and fair, that I should mention his name to my lord) and conjured me to the contrary; and to the best of my remembrance at this distance of time, obtained a firm promise from me not to say any thing of it to him. I asked him from whom he had his information, he desired me to excuse him and would never let me know his author. Now upon a recollection of all passages, I am still fully persuaded in my own mind (though possibly he might have met with this scandalous report from some other person) that this bishop was the very man, and

I must add, that I cannot be beaten out of this persuasion, unless that he will take a voluntary oath, that he never acquainted Mr. Buckley with it, which, I believe he will not dare to do.

"He says moreover, that when he made the first report of it to me, he desired me to enquire of my lord Clarendon about it, which I do not remember. But if he did, which I scarce believe, I judged it most rude and silly to carry an idle, infamous and incredible story to him, and to go on his errand with it when he might have gone himself, having been acquainted with my lord, ever since he was lord lieutenant of Ireland. I shall not here give a character of this Irish bishop, but only shall say in short, that I have found by a long conversation that he has an inveterate malice and prejudice to this noble lord, and that he has often times in common discourse endeavoured to run down his fame and blacken him with his gossiping stories.

"The same report about the queen's miscarriage being conveyed up and down (where mention is made since of the lady Clarendon and the bishop of Asaph, who is said to have received it from her ladyship,) which in truth and reality was no more than what I have written above, and the very same, though so wickedly and villainously perverted, in a diabolical paper, as I justly called it upon my first reading of it, I desired my lord for the vindication of the truth of things to write a letter to the bishop of St. Asaph, and inform him of these downright falsities, which find some kind of umbrage, under his name. He was pleased to promise me that he would write such a paper as I desired in a few days, and would leave copies in several friends hands, to be made use of hereafter as there should be occasion.

Mr. Spinckes's Attestation taken from another MS. Memorandum.

"That Wednesday June 3, 1702, having a fair opportunity for it, I took the freedom to inquire of the right honourable the earl of Clarendon concerning the report set abroad by a certain bishop, of my lady the late countess of Clarendon's having affirmed the queen to have miscarried, during the time she was said to be with child of the late prince of Wales. And his lordship was pleased to assure me that he had discoursed with the bishop upon that point, and told him that my lady did never say that the queen had miscarried, but only that she was ill, and it was much feared that she would miscarry: adding moreover that he might remember farther that about three days after this, my lady seeing him (the bishop) came to him with great joy, and told him the danger was over, that the queen was well again, and had not miscarried, as was feared. And this his lordship was pleased to give me free commission to testify in his name. His lordship also told me farther that the news of the queen's delivery being brought to my lady just as she came from the sacrament, she went immediately to visit the queen and the prince, and he hopes nobly would think my lady so great a hypocrite, as to pay such a visit, and especially at that time, if she had not believed the birth to be real, and the child to be indeed the queen's.

N. SPINCKES."

The persons who (but for the Act of Settlement 12 and 13 W. 3, cap. 32.) and the acts against the succession of Papists and of those who married Papists, would have claim to the crown preferably to the house of Brunswick, are,

I. All the descendants of Anna Maria dutchess of Savoy, (only daughter of Henrietta Maria, daughter of Charles the first) viz.

1. Charles Emanuel (king of Sardinia) her son, and all his posterity.

2. Maria Adelhaid (dutchess of Burgundy and mother of Louis the 15th) her daughter and all her posterity.

II. Charles Lodowick, prince of Hesse Cassell) who was eldest son of Elizabeth queen of Bohemia; daughter of James the first) and the posterity of Charles his son and successor, and of Charlotte his daughter (who was second wife to Philip duke of Orleans and ancestress of the present duke of Orleans.)

III. All the posterity of Maria Amelia Electress of Bavaria (who was daughter of Wilhelmina, empress of Germany, daughter of Benedicta Henrietta dutchess of Hanover, daughter of Edward, second son of Elizabeth queen of Bohemia.)

The said Charles Lodowick and Edward were brothers of Sophia dutchess of Brunswick, afterwards electress of Hanover, mother of king George 1.

Fountainhall, under date January 18, 1688, says: "At privy council, upon the news of the queen's being with child, a Thanksgiving was appointed through Scotland. It was thought odd, that the Presbyterian meetings were not enjoined to keep it." The Order appointing the Thanksgiving I suppose to be the Article in the Appendix to the second Volume of Wodrow's History, No. 137, which is as follows:

'Act, January 17, 1688, for a Thanksgiving
'upon the Queen's being with child.

'Since it hath pleased Almighty God, the 'fountain of all life, by whom kings reign, and 'kingdoms are established, to grant unto the 'king's most excellent majesty, fresh hopes of
'royal issue by his most serene consort, our gra'cious queen Mary who (through the great good'ness and blessing of God) is now with child;
'and considering that the multiplying of the 'branches of the royal family, (especially issu'ing from our present sacred sovereign, James
'7, under whose auspicious, wise, and clement
'government we enjoy so much prosperity,
'peace and plenty) is a most desirable blessing,
'a native support, and strengthening of the 'crown, and, by just consequence, a public
'blessing to this kingdom, tending to the fur'ther security of the peace and happiness 'thereof; his majesty therefore (at the humble
'and earnest desire, and by the advice of his ‘ privy council) hath thought fit upon this important occasion, to set apart, and appoint a time, for rendering devout and solemn thanks to God, for this great mercy and blessing, and for offering public and hearty prayers to his divine majesty, to bless and preserve the sacred person of our dread sovereign lord the king, to prosper his reign with honourable and glorious successes, and to prolong his life, that he may see his childrens children, and his throne may be as the sun ; as also, that he may bless, preserve, and strengthen his royal consort the queen’s majesty, and make perfect his work begun for her, may save and defend her from all dangers and evil accidents, that what she hath conceived, may be preserved and happily brought forth, to the joy of our sovereign lord the king, the further security of his crown, and the happiness and establishment of this kingdom.

‘ For this end, his majesty, with advice foresaid, doth appoint and ordain, that the foresaid thanksgiving and prayers, be devoutly and solemnly performed, in all the parish-churches within the city and diocese of Edinburgh, upon the 29th day of January instant, and in all the other churches within this kingdom, upon the 19th day of February next ; and his majesty accordingly requires and commands, the most reverend and right reverend the archbishops and bishops, to take care, that in all the parish-churches within their respective dioceses, these prayers and thanksgivings be accordingly celebrate by all the ministers and presbyters under their jurisdiction, and that they cause intimation be made hereof, by reading of the same from the pulpits, in the several parish-churches, the Lord’s day immediately preceeding the said solemn days of public thanksgiving, respective. And, finally, his majesty charges and commands all his loving subjects, heartily to join and concur in these religious and dutiful performances, as they would shew their piety and loyalty, in praying for the life of the king, the increase of his royal issue, the further security of the crown, and the establishment of peace and happiness in this his ancient kingdom. And that these presents may be made public and known, his majesty ordains his Lyon king at arms, and his brethren, heralds, the macers of the privy council, and pursuivants, to pass to the market-cross of Edinburgh, and other places needful, and there, by open proclamation, and with all accustomed solemnities on extraordinary occasions, make publication of the premisses, that none may pretend ignorance. Extracted forth of the records of privy council, by sir William Paterson, baronet, clerk of his majesty’s most honourable privy council.

‘ WILLIAM PATERSON, Cl. Sec. Concilii.
‘ God save the king.’

Mr. Barrington (Obs. on Magna Charta, cap. 7.) says, That one of the reasons for the provision, ‘ Vidua — maneat in capitali mesuagio mariti sui per quadraginta dies post obitum mariti sui,’ was the apprehension of supposititious children. In the same part of his work, after mentioning the provisions enacted in various codes of law against such suppositions, he takes notice (‘ notwithstanding it is,’ to use his words, ‘ the fashion at present to laugh at what is called bishop Burnet’s warming-pan-story,’) of lord Clarendon’s mention of the distrust expressed by his niece the princess of Denmark, and of the representation of some of the French chroniclers that such an imposition was actually carried into execution by one of the antient queens of France.

It may be worth notice, that one of the arguments against the genuineness of the pretended prince of Wales, is very much impaired, if not altogether destroyed, by the undisputed fact, that in June, 1692, James the second’s queen was, in France, delivered of a daughter, named Mary Louisa.

Burnet’s Account of this matter is as follows :

“ The queen’s delivery was the subject of all mens’ discourse. And since so much depends on this, I will give as full and as distinct an account of all that related to that matter, as I could gather up either at that time or afterwards. The queen had been for six or seven years in such an ill state of health, that every winter brought her very near death. Those about her seemed well assured that she, who had buried all her children soon after they were born, and had now for several years ceased bearing, would have no more children. Her own priests apprehended it, and seemed to wish for her death. She had great and frequent distempers, that returned often, which put all people out of their hopes or fears of her having any children. Her spirits were now much on the fret. She was eager in the prosecution of all the king’s designs. It was believed, that she had a main hand in driving him to them all. And he, perhaps, to make her gentler to him in his vagrant amours, was more easy to her in every thing else. The lady Dorchester was come back from Ireland : and the king went oft to her. But it was visible, she was not like to gain that credit in affairs, to which she had aspired : and therefore this was less considered.

“ In September, the former year, the queen went to the Bath, where, as was already told, the king came and saw her, and staid a few days with her. She after that pursued a full course of bathing : and, having resolved to return in the end of September, an accident took her to which the sex is subject : and that made her stay there a week longer. She came to Windsor on the 6th of October. It was said, that, at the very time of her coming to the king, her mother, the duchess of Modena, made a vow to the lady Loretto, that her daughter might by her means have a son. And it went current, that the queen believed herself to be with child in that very instant, in which her mother made her vow: of which, some travellers have assured me, there was a solemn record made at Loretto. A conception said to be thus begun looked suspicious. It was now fixed to the 6th of October: so the nine months were to run to the 6th of July. She was in the progress of her big belly let blood several times: and the most astringent things that could be proposed were used.

"It was soon observed, that all things about her person were managed with a mysterious secrecy, into which none were admitted but a few Papists. She was not dressed nor undressed with the usual ceremony. Prince George told me, that the princess went as far in desiring to be satisfied by feeling the motion, after she said she was quick, as she could go without breaking with her: and she had sometimes staid by her even indecently long in mornings, to see her rise, and to give her her shift: but she never did either. She never offered any satisfaction in that matter by letter to the princess of Orange, nor to any of the ladies of quality, in whose word the world would have acquiesced. The thing upon this began to be suspected: and some libels were writ, treating the whole as an imposture. The use the queen made of this was, to say, that since she saw some were suspecting her as capable of so black a contrivance, she scorned to satisfy those who could entertain such thoughts of her. How just soever this might be with relation to the libellers, yet certainly, if she was truly with child, she owed it to the king and herself, to the king's daughters, but most of all to the infant she carried in her belly, to give such reasonable satisfaction, as might put an end to jealousy. This was in her power to do every day: and her not doing it gave just grounds of suspicion.

"Things went thus on till Monday in Easter week. On that day the king went to Rochester, to see some of the naval preparations; but was soon sent for by the queen, who apprehended she was in danger of miscarrying. Dr. Scarborough was come to Knightsbridge to see bishop Ward, my predecessor, who had been his antient friend, and was then his patient: but the queen's coach was sent to call him in all haste, since she was near miscarrying. Dr. Windebank, who knew nothing of this matter, staid long that morning upon an appointment for Dr. Wallgrave, another of the queen's physicians, who the next time he saw him excused himself, for the queen, he said, was then under the most apparent signs of miscarrying. Of this the doctor made oath: and it is yet extant.

"On the same day the countess of Clarendon, being to go out of town for a few days, came to see the queen before she went, knowing nothing of what had happened to her. And she, being a lady of the bedchamber to queen dowager, did, according to the rule of the court, go into the queen's bedchamber without asking admittance. She saw the queen a-bed, bemoaning herself in a most doleful manner, saying often, 'undone, undone:' and one that belonged to her carried somewhat out of the bed, which she believed was linen taken from the queen. She was upon this in some confusion: and the countess of Powis coming in, went to her, and said with some sharpness, what do you here? and carried her to the door. Before she had got out of the court, one of the bedchamber women followed her, and charged her not to speak of any thing she had seen that day. This matter, whatever was in it, was hushed up: and the queen held on her course.

"The princess had miscarried in the spring. So, as soon as she had recovered her strength, the king pressed her to go to the Bath, since that had so good an effect on the queen. Some of her physicians, and all her other friends, were against her going. Lower, one of her physicians told me, he was against it: he thought, she was not strong enough for the Bath, though the king pressed it with an unusual vehemence. Millington, another physician, told the earl of Shrewsbury, from whom I had it, that he was pressed to go to the princess, and advise her to go to the Bath. The person that spoke to him told him, the king was much set on it, and that he expected it of him, that he would persuade her to it. Millington answered, he would not advise a patient according to direction, but according to his own reason: so he would not go. Scarborough and Witherly took it upon them to advise it: so she went thither in the end of May.

"As soon as she was gone, those about the queen did all of the sudden change her reckoning, and began it from the king's being with her at Bath. This came on so quick, that, though the queen had set the fourteenth of June for her going to Windsor, where she intended to lie in, and all the preparations for the birth and for the child were ordered to be made ready by the end of June, yet now a resolution was taken for the queen's lying in at St. James's; and directions were given to have all things quickly ready. The Bath water either did not agree with the princess, or the advices of her friends were so pressing, who thought her absence from the court at that time of such consequence, that in compliance with them she gave it out it did not, and that therefore she would return in a few days.

"The day after the court had this notice, the queen said, she would go to St. James's, and look for the good hour. She was often told, that it was impossible upon so short a warning to have things ready. But she was so positive, that she said, she would lie there that night, though she should lie upon the boards. And at night, though the shorter and quicker way was to go from Whitehall to St. James's through the park, and she always went that way, yet now, by a sort of affectation, she would be carried thither by Charing-cross through the Pall-mall. And it was given out by all her train, that she was going to be delivered. Some said, it would be next morning; and the priests said very confidently that it would be a boy.

“The next morning, about nine o’clock, she sent word to the king, that she was in labour. The queen dowager was next sent to, but no ladies were sent for: so that no women were in the room, but two dressers and one under dresser, and the midwife. The earl of Arran sent notice to the countess of Sunderland, so she came. The lady Bellasis came also in time. The Protestant ladies that belonged to the court were all gone to church before the news was let go abroad; for it happened on Trinity Sunday, it being that year on the tenth of June. The king brought over with him from Whitehall a great many peers and privy counsellors. And of these eighteen were let into the bed-chamber, but they stood at the furthest end of the room; the ladies stood within the alcove. The curtains of the bed were drawn close, and none came within them, but the midwife and an under dresser. The queen lay all the while a bed: and, in order to the warming one side of it, a warming pan was brought, but it was not opened, that it might be seen that there was fire and nothing else in it: so here was matter for suspicion, with which all people were filled.

“A little before ten, the queen cried out as in a strong pain, and immediately after the midwife said aloud, she was happily brought to bed. When the lords all cried out of what, the midwife answered, the queen must not be surprised: only she gave a sign to the countess of Sunderland, who upon that touched her forehead, by which, it being the sign before agreed on, the king said he knew it was a boy. No cries were heard from the child, nor was it shewed to those in the room. It was pretended more air was necessary. The under dresser went out with the child, or somewhat else, in her arms to a dressing room, to which there was a door near the queen’s bed; but there was another entry to it from other apartments.

“The king continued with the lords in the bed-chamber for some minutes, which was either a sign of much phlegm upon such an occasion; for it was not known whether the child was alive or dead: or it looked like the giving time for some management. After a little while they went all into the dressing room: and then the news was published. In the mean while, nobody was called to lay their hands on the queen’s belly, in order to a full satisfaction. When the princess came to town three days after, she had as little satisfaction given her. Chamberlain, the man-midwife, who was always ordered to attend her labour before, and who brought the plaisters for putting back the milk, wondered that he had not been sent to. He went according to custom with the plaisters, but he was told they had no occasion for him. He fancied, that some other person was put in his place; but he could not find that any had it. All that concerned the milk, or the queen’s purgations, was managed still in the dark. This made all people inclined more and more to believe, there was a base imposture now put on the nation. That still increased. That night one Hemings, a very worthy man, an apothecary by his trade, who lived in St. Martin’s-lane, the very next door to a family of an eminent Papist: (Brown, brother to the viscount Montacute, lived there) The wall between his parlour and theirs being so thin, that he could easily hear any thing that was said with a louder voice, he (Hemings) was reading in his parlour late at night, when he heard one coming into the neighbouring parlour, and say with a doleful voice, the prince of Wales is dead; upon which a great many that lived in the house came down stairs very quick: upon this confusion he could not hear any thing more; but it was plain, they were in a great consternation. He went with the news next morning to the bishops in the Tower. The countess of Clarendon came thither soon after, and told them, she had been at the young prince’s door, but was denied access: she was amazed at it; and asked, if they knew her; they said, they did; but that the queen had ordered, that no person whatsoever should be suffered to come in to him. This gave credit to Hemings’s story, and looked as if all was ordered to be kept shut up close, till another child was found. One, that saw the child two days after, said to me, that he looked strong, and not like a child so newly born. Windebank met Walgrave the day after this birth, and remembered him of what he had told him eight weeks before. He acknowledged what he had said, but added, that God wrought miracles: to which no reply could, or durst be made by the other: it needed none. So healthy a child being so little like any of those the queen had born, it was given out that he had fits, and could not live; but those who saw him every day observed no such thing. On the contrary the child was in a very prosperous state. None of those fits ever happened, when the princess was at court; for she could not be denied admittance, though all others were. So this was believed to be given out to make the matter more credible. It is true, some weeks after that, the court being gone to Windsor, and the child sent to Richmond, he fell into such fits, that four physicians were sent for. They all looked on him as a dying child. The king and queen were sent for. The physicians went to a dinner prepared for them; and were often wondering that they were not called for. They took it for granted that the child was dead. But, when they went in after dinner to look on him, they saw a sound healthy child, that seemed to have had no sort of illness on him. It was said, that the child was strangely revived of a sudden. Some of the physicians told Lloyd, bishop of St. Asaph, that it was not possible for them to think it was the same child. They looked on one another, but durst not speak what they thought.

"Thus I have related such particulars as I could gather of this birth: To which some more shall be added, when I give an account of the proof that the king brought afterwards to put this matter out of doubt; but by which it became indeed more doubtful than ever. I took most of these from the informations that were sent over to the prince and princess of Orange, as I had many from the vouchers themselves. I do not mix with these the various reports that were, both then and afterwards, spread of this matter, of which bishop Lloyd has a great collection, most of them well attested. What truth soever may be in these, this is certain, that the method in which this matter was conducted from first to last was very unaccountable. If an imposture had been intended, it could not have been otherwise managed. The pretended excuse that the queen made, that she owed no satisfaction to those who could suspect her capable of such base forgery, was the only excuse that she could have made, if it had been really what it was commonly said to be. She seemed to be soon recovered, and was so little altered by her labour, either in her looks or voice, that this helped not a little to increase jealousies. The rejoicings over England upon this birth were very cold and forced. Bonfires were made in some places, and a set of congratulatory addresses went round the nation. None durst oppose them. But all was formal, and only to make a shew.

"The prince and princess of Orange received the news of this birth very decently. The first letters gave not those grounds of suspicion that were sent to them afterwards. So they sent over Zuytlestein to congratulate: and the princess ordered the prince of Wales to be prayed for in her chapel. Upon this occasion, it may not be improper to set down what the princess said to myself on this subject two years before. I had asked her, in the freedom of much discourse, if she knew the temper of her own mind, and how she could bear the queen's having a son. She said, she was sure it would give her no concern at all on her own account: God knew best what was fit for her: And, if it was not to serve the great ends of providence, she was sure that, as to herself, she would rather wish to live and die in the condition she was then in. The advertisements formerly mentioned came over from so many hands, that it was impossible not to be shaken by them. It was also taken ill in England, that the princess should have begun so early to pray for the pretended prince: Upon which the naming him discontinued. But this was so highly resented by the court of England, that the prince, fearing it might precipitate a rupture, ordered him to be again named in the prayers."

"A great meeting was called, not only of all the privy counsellors and judges, but of all the nobility then in town. To these the king complained of the great injury that was done both him and the queen by the prince of Orange, who accused them of so black an imposture: He said, he believed there were few princes then alive, who had been born in the presence of more witnesses than were at his son's birth: He had therefore called them together, that they might hear the proof of that matter. It was first proved, that the queen was delivered abed, while many were in the room; and that they saw the child soon after he was taken from the queen by the midwife. But in this the midwife was the single witness; for none of the ladies had felt the child in the queen's belly. The countess of Sunderland did indeed depose, that the queen called to her to give her her hand, that she might feel how the child lay, to which she added, which I did, but did not say, whether she felt the child, or not: And she told the dutchess of Hamilton, from whom I had it, that when she put her hand into the bed, the queen held it, and let it go no lower than her breasts. So that really she felt nothing. And this deposition, brought to make a shew, was an evidence against the matter, rather than for it; and was a violent presumption of an imposture, and of an artifice to cover it. Many ladies deposed, that they had often seen the marks of milk on the queen's linen, near her breasts. Two or three deposed, that they saw it running out at the nipple. All these deposed, that they saw milk before the pretended delivery. But none of them deposed concerning milk after the delivery, though nature sends it then in greater abundance: And the queen had it always in such a plenty, that some weeks passed after her delivery, before she was quite freed from it. The ladies did not name the time in which they saw the milk, except one, who named the month of May. But, if the particulars mentioned before, that happened on Easter Monday, are reflected on, and if it appears probable by these that the queen miscarried at that time; then all that the ladies mentioned of milk in her breasts, particularly she that fixed it to the month of May, might have followed upon that miscarriage, and be no proof concerning the late birth. Mrs. Pierce, the landress, deposed that she took linen from the queen's body once, which carried the marks of a delivery. But she spoke only to one time. That was a main circumstance. And, if it had been true, it must have been often done, and was capable of a more copious proof, since there is occasion for such things to be often looked on, and well considered. The lady Wentworth was the single witness that deposed, that she had felt the child move in the queen's belly. She was a bed chamber woman, as well as a single witness: And she fixed it on no time. If it was very early, she might have been mistaken: Or if it was before Easter Monday, it might be true, and yet have no relation to this birth. This was the substance of this evidence, which was ordered to be enrolled and printed. But, when it was published, it had a quite contrary effect to what the court expected from it. The presumption of law before this was all in fa-your of the birth, since the parents owned the child: So that the proof lay on the other side, and ought to be offered by those who called it in question. But, now that this proof was brought, which was so apparently defective, it did not lessen but increase the jealousy with which the nation was possessed: For all people concluded, that, if the thing had been true, it must have been easy to have brought a much more copious proof than was now published to the world. It was much observed, that princess Anne was not present. She indeed excused herself. She thought she was breeding: And all motion was forbidden her. None believed that to be the true reason; for it was thought, that the going from one apartment of the court to another could not hurt her. So it was looked on as a colour that shewed she did not believe the thing, and that therefore she would not by her being present seem to give any credit to it."

The following passage in the same author also relates to this Case:

"The duchess of York fell into an ill habit of body, which some imputed to the effect of some of the duke's distempers communicated to her. A story was set about, and generally believed, that the earl of Southesk, that had married a daughter of duke Hamilton's, suspecting some familiarities between the duke and his wife, had taken a sure method to procure a disease to himself, which he communicated to his wife, and was by that means set round till it came to the duchess, who was so tainted with it that it was the occasion of the death of all her children, except the two daughters, our two queens; and was believed the cause of an illness under which she languished long, and died so corrupted, that in dressing her body after her death, one of her breasts burst, being a mass of corruption. Lord Southesk was for some years not ill pleased to have this believed. It looked like a peculiar strain of revenge, with which he seemed much delighted. But I know he has to some of his friends denied the whole of the story very solemnly. Another acted a better part. He did not like a commerce that he observed between the duke and his wife. He went and expostulated with him upon it. The duke fell a commending his wife much. He told him he came not to seek his wife's character from him: the most effectual way of commending her, was to have nothing to do with her. He added, that if princes would do those wrongs to subjects who could not demand such reparations of honour as they could from their equals, it would put them on secreter methods of revenge: for some injuries were such, that men of honour could not bear them. And, upon a new observation he made of the duke's designs upon his wife, he quitted a very good post, and went with her into the country, where he kept her till she died. Upon the whole matter the duke was often ill. The children were born with ulcers, or they broke out upon them soon after: and all his sons died young, and unhealthy. This has, as far as any thing that could not be brought in the way of proof, prevailed to create a suspicion, that so healthy a child as the pretended prince of Wales could neither be his, nor be born of any wife with whom he had lived long. The violent pain that his eldest daughter had in her eyes, and the gout which has early seized our present queen, are thought the dregs of a tainted original. Willis, the great physician, being called to consult for one of his sons, gave his opinion in those words, 'Mala Stamina Vitæ;' which gave such offence, that he was never called for afterwards."

And relating what occurred in the House of Lords, in the interval between the Abdication of king James and the accession of king William, and Queen Mary, he says:

"It was proposed, that the birth of the pretended prince might be examined into. Some pressed this, not so much from an opinion that they were bound to assert his right, if it should appear that he was born of the queen, as because they thought it would justify the nation, and more particularly the prince and the two princesses, if an imposture in that matter could have been proved. And it would have gone far to satisfy many of the weaker sort, as to all the proceeding against king James. Upon which I was ordered to gather together all the presumptive proofs that were formerly mentioned, which were all ready to have been made out. It is true, that these did not amount to a full and legal proof: yet they seemed to be such violent presumptions, that, when they were all laid together, they were more convincing than plain and downright evidence: for that was liable to the suspicion of subornation: whereas the other seemed to carry on them very convincing characters of truth and certainty. But, when this matter was in private debated, some observed, that, as king James by going about to prove the truth of the birth, and yet doing it so defectively, had really made it more suspicious than it was before; so, if there was no clear and positive proof made of an imposture, the pretending to examine into it, and then the not being able to make it out beyond the possibility of contradiction, would really give more credit to the thing, than it then had, and, instead of weakening it, would strengthen the pretension of his birth.

"When this debate was proposed in the House of Lords, it was rejected with indignation. He was now sent out of England to be bred up in France, an enemy both to the nation, and to the established religion: It was impossible for the people of England to know, whether he was the same person that had been carried over, or not: if he should die, another might be put in his room, in such a manner that the nation could not be assured concerning him: the English nation ought not to send into another country for witnesses to prove that he was their prince; much less receive one upon the testimoney of such, as were not only aliens, but ought to be presumed enemies: it was also known, that all the persons, who had been the confidants in that matter, were conveyed away: so it was impossible to come at them, by whose means only the truth of that birth could be found out. But while these things were fairly debated by some, there were others who had deeper and darker designs in this matter.

"They thought, it would be a good security for the nation, to have a dormant title to the crown lie as it were neglected, to oblige our princes to govern well, while they would apprehend the danger of a revolt to a pretender still in their eye. Wildman thought it was a deep piece of policy to let this lie in the dark, and undecided. Nor did they think it an ill precedent, that they should so neglect the right of succession, as not so much as to enquire into this matter. Upon all these considerations no further enquiry was made into it. It is true, this put a plausible objection in the mouth of all king James's party: here, they said, an infant was condemned, and denied his right, without either proof or enquiry. This still takes with many in the present age. And, that it may not take more in the next, I have used more than ordinary care to gather together all the particulars that were then laid before me as to that matter."

Granger, (who notices that queen Anne's children were supposed to have died from the same cause to which Burnet imputes the diseases of queen Mary and queen Anne) says:

"The revenge of the earl of Southesk on king James, when duke of York, who is said to have caught a virulent distemper, which that nobleman communicated with design to his lady, was supposed to be the occasion of the death of several of the children that he had by both his queens, and gave credit to the report of the prince being a supposititious child. In 1699, was published a pamphlet, entitled, 'A brief discovery of the true mother of the pretended prince of Wales, &c. by William Fuller, gent. some time page of honour to the late queen, in France.' The author tells us, that the pretended prince was son of one Mary Gray, an Irish woman, who, in May 1688, was brought over to England, in the Monmouth yacht, by the countess of Tyrconnel. That she was delivered of a child at St. James's, on the tenth of June following; and about the middle of July was, against her inclination, conveyed to the convent of benedictine nuns at Paris, whence she soon after made her escape. That he was commanded by the queen to go to England, with letters to lord Montgomery, and others in relation to this woman: and that they were 'to take care to place people on the coast of England, that might inform them when she landed; and then they were positively commanded to use all endeavours to get her dispatched, to prevent whatever design she might pretend to.' But being, as he informs us, soon apprehended in France, and effectually secured, he believed that she was murdered; as he could not get the least intelligence of her, though he had made the strictest enquiry. The well known story of conveying the child to the queen's apartment, in a warming-pan, is attributed to Fuller. But it should be observed, that Mrs. Margaret Dawson, one of the gentlewomen of the queen's bed-chamber, deposed, that 'she saw fire carried into the queen's room, in a warming-pan, to warm the bed; and that the deponent stirred not from the queen, until her majesty was delivered of a son.' Fuller," [See in this Collection his Case, A. D. 1702.] "was a great dealer in Plots, and was detected in several gross falsehoods, in some of his pretended discoveries, was declared an impostor by the house of commons."

There is in Wodrow, the following curious Relation of an incident in Scotland concerning the Genuineness of the Pretender:

"I shall shut up this section with some narrative of the trouble the late Reverend Mr. Charles Gordon, minister at this time of Campvere, and since the revolution minister, first at Dalmenie, then at Ashkirk, fell under, for his not owning the Legitimacy of the pretended prince of Wales. It is a pretty singular case, and I give it from the original Narrative, written, November this year, by Mr. Gordon, communicated to me by his relations, which consists of some sheets of paper; but I shall reduce it within as narrow a compass as I can with any measure of distinctness and clearness.

"The Rev. Mr. Gordon's character is so savoury yet in this church, that none will question what he hath left under his hand. Many yet alive know how remarkable and eminent he was for piety and learning: and the general assembly of the church was so much apprised of this, that he was very harmoniously voted to be professor of divinity at Aberdeen; but such was his own extremity of modesty, and affection for his people, that he could never actively comply, and died some years ago minister of Ashkirk, his removal being indeed a general stroke to this church. His great literature, solidity, and gravity made him universally regretted.

"Mr. Gordon, minister of the Scots congregation at Campvere, had come over to see his friends in the north, August this year, and coming to Edinburgh upon some business, in his return to Campvere in September, the noise of the prince of Orange broke up, and the council toward the beginning of October emitted a Proclamation, 'discharging all subjects, on the highest peril, to leave the kingdom, without a licence from the council, or one of their number.' It was necessary that Mr. Gordon should go back to his charge as soon as possible, and therefore knowing nothing could be laid to his charge, and being not in the least obnoxious to suspicion, he applied by a friend to the Lord Register, as a counsellor, for a pass; who said, the pass being for Holland, it was necessary he should speak to the chancellor anent it, and the other frankly consented he should do so. When the chancellor was spoke to, he made an objection against Mr. Gordon's brother, a worthy factor in Holland, some years ago dead, who, he alleged, was none of the king's friends, and desired the register to take a care how he gave Mr. Gordon a pass. The register was hearty and kind in the matter, and acquainting Mr. Gordon of what passed, promised, within three or four days, again to deal with my lord Perth.

"Accordingly, October 12, being put in mind of his promise, he undertook to speak to the chancellor in the forenoon at the council, and ordered Mr. Gordon to wait on him in the Parliament Closs, which he did; and when attending there met with an odd incident, which deserves a room here, as what may serve to give a vidimus of the temper of one of the present prime managers. At the rising of the council, the archbishop of Glasgow comes out in his robes, whom Mr. Gordon had never seen before, and knew him not, save that he was a bishop by his garb. It seems, the bishop noticed very narrowly all who did not give him a cap. Mr. Gordon was walking at some considerable distance, and took a turn a little further off the way the bishop seemed to be going. It seems, the bishop observed him at distance, and saw good, after he was gone by Mr. Gordon almost at the breadth of the closs, to return and come straight to him, and accost him in a very odd manner.

"When he came up, he asked Mr. Gordon rudely, What are you, Sir? Mr. Gordon answered, Why do you enquire? Says the bishop, Why do you look with so thravn a countenance? The other replied, My countenance is not thravn, I look as I ordinarily use to do. The bishop said, If your countenance be ordinarily so, it is a very thravn countenance. Says Mr. Gordon, Sir, I wonder why you imagine so, for I have the same countenance that God hath given me. Adds the bishop, you should not look uncivilly upon gentlemen. The other replied, You are mistaken; for I use not, as I think, to look uncivilly or unpleasantly upon any man. Upon this the bishop went off as indiscreetly as he came up, to the great surprise of Mr. Gordon and the spectators. The rencounter was odd, and I set it down at full length, as I find it in the abovementioned narrative. When Mr. Gordon enquired, who it was that had thus accosted him, and had got his character, he began to think it was rather his covered head, than his thravn countenance, brought about this strange attack.

"But to return, when the register came out, he told he had quite forgot his business; but should undoubtedly mind it at three of the clock, when he met with the chancellor in the treasury. Mr. Gordon began to fear there might be more difficulty, than he apprehended, in his business, and so went up to the castle at two, and got access to the duke of Gordon, who knew his relations in the north, and laid his case before him. The duke was very civil, and promised to speak with the chancellor at three, in the exchequer, and ordered him to put him in mind by a macer. He waited on punctually at the hour, and the duke and the register promised to speak presently to the chancellor. In a little the duke was pleased to come to the door, and acquaint Mr. Gordon that he had spoken, and the register seconded him, and the chancellor was desirous to speak with him before he granted a pass, and that it was fit he should name an hour, asking him in a friendly way, whether he were content with this. Mr. Gordon thanked his grace for his kindness, and said, He was satisfied to wait on the chancellor when he pleased, and doubted not to satisfy his lordship in any thing he could reasonably demand. The duke went in, and Mr. Gordon waited on to hear the chancellor's time for a private communing, never once dreaming of a public examination. But very suddenly he was called in before the lords of the treasury, by one of the macers. And the chancellor interrogated him as follows; which, with his answers, I set down as I find them in Mr. Gordon's narrative.

Chancellor. Mr. Gordon, I am informed you are an ill man, and a person of bad principles, and disaffected to the government. Gordon. My lord, if your lordship has been so informed, I must beg liberty to say, that the information is wrong and unjust. Chancellor. I am informed, your business and design in coming to Scotland, is quite another thing than you pretend and give out. Gordon. My business is nothing else than that I pretend and profess; but if your lordship suspect any thing, I am willing to give all the satisfaction I can. Chanc. Do you own the king's authority? Gordon. Yes, my lord. Chanc. Have you preached since you came to the country? Gordon. Yes. Chanc. Did you pray for the king? Gordon. Yes, my lord. Chanc. Do you pray for the royal family? Gordon. Yes. Chanc. Do you pray for the prince of Wales? Gordon. No. Chanc. Why not for the prince of Wales? Gordon. There is no particular order for our praying for him, and I have not used to pray for all the particular branches of the royal family by form. Chanc. It is no limiting of the spirit, to pray for all the branches of the royal family by form. Gordon. My lord, I have not been used to pray by forms. Chanc. Whom do you mean when you pray for the royal family? Gordon. All the princes and princesses of the family. Chanc. Do you not include and intend the prince of Wales? Gordon. My lord, I do not exclude him. Chanc. But do you not include him? Mr. Gordon said nothing, and the Chancellor went on: There is the matter; Sir, I perceive I have not been mistaken nor misinformed concerning you, what for a man you are. Gordon. I am sorry if your lordship apprehend ill concerning me. Chanc. Do you not think that the king hath a son, or that the prince of Wales is heir to the crown? Mr. Gordon was silent. Chanc. Why do you not answer? do you doubt of such a thing? Gordon. My lord, I do not meddle in these matters, nor am I a competent judge of them. Chanc. Sir, if you were your father's eldest son, and he had ten chal-ders of victual by year to bestow upon you, and another should come and take you by the throat, and say, Sir, you are a rogue, you are not such a man's son, and you shall not enjoy his estate, what would you say to that? Gordon. I hope your lordship will not make application of that comparison to any thing I have said. Chanc. Sir, you are the first that ever called the thing in question, and you have said enough to hang an hundred men. But remove you, you shall have the mind and judgment of the rest of the lords. And a macer was called to take Mr. Gordon away, and keep him till further order. In about a quarter of an hour he was called in again.

"Then the Chancellor said, Mr. Gordon, here is a paper you must subscribe. The tenor of it was. 'I Mr. Charles Gordon, minister of the gospel at Campvere, do own and acknowledge the king's son, prince of Scotland and Wales, as apparent heir of the crown, and do promise to pray for him as such.'

"When this Paper was read, Mr. Gordon answered, My lord, I must beg liberty to be excused, I cannot sign this paper in the terms, in which it stands, I am willing to declare, and subscribe that I do not deny, nor disown the prince of Wales. Chanc. Why do you not then own and acknowledge him? You must subscribe it as it stands. Gordon. That I cannot do, my lord. Then the macer was called to remove him. When going away, the clerk spake to him aside, and desired him to consider, there was nothing in the paper but a declaration, that the prince was apparent heir, and that imported no more than, for what we know and appears to us; and when the king, and queen, and court own him as such, then it appears to us. This staggered Mr. Gordon a little, till, he took up the paper and read it, and considered, that the grammatical sense of the word was not meant, but the forensick and law sense was chiefly to be considered in this case. Then he laid it down again on the table, saying, he could not in conscience sign it.

"What? says the Chancellor, pretend you conscience in refusing to own the king's son as apparent heir? Gordon. I cannot help my weakness; conscience cannot be constrained. Chanc. Whether or not, failing the prince of Wales, would you acknowledge the princess of Orange as apparent heir to the crown? Gordon. Yes, my lord. Chanc. And why not the prince of Wales now? Mr. Gordon said nothing. Chanc. There he is taken; for there is the matter, Sir, doubt you, or how dare you question the one more than the other? Would you not own my eldest son as my heir? Gordon. Yes, my lord, I know nothing to the contrary. Chanc. Why not then the king's son? Would you not own the duke of Gordon as heir to Lewis marquis of Huntley? Gordon. Yes.

"Then the duke said, Mr. Charles, why do you doubt the prince of Wales to be heir apparent more than the princess of Orange? you were not witness to the birth of the one more than the other. Gordon. Truly, my lord, for what I know I never saw her highness. The chancellor vehemently urged Mr. Gordon to give his reasons of doubt, and mixed many threats. Mr. Gordon still declined, adding he did not dip into those matters, that he was a plain ignorant, simple man, and begged his lordship would not take advantage against him, and took all the lords witness he did not deny or disown the prince of Wales. The chancellor said, Why then do you not own him? this is such a mortal sin, a crime, that it is enough to damn you. Gordon. I hope there is more mercy with God than to damn me for ignorance and weakness. Chanc. It is enough to damn you and a thousand with you, for by your calling this in question, you are guilty of their sin and damnation who follow your example. Gordon. I hope the Lord will preserve me from being guilty of any person's damnation, for, according to my measure, I have endeavoured to keep a conscience void of offence, either to God or man. Chanc. Sir, you are a person neither of good principles nor practice, and you deserve, &c. Gordon. My lord, I am sorry that your lordship hath received ill impressions of me.

"Then he was removed, and in a little time sent up under a guard to the castle. The warrant was directed to the duke of Gordon, or his depute, and none of them being within, he was kept in the guard, and a private chamber of one of his name, some hours. While there, he had many peaceful and comfortable reflections upon the course and progress of this surprising scene of suffering, which he sets down with much solidity, and at such length, as I cannot give an abstract of them. He regrets that he was called to suffer upon a point that was so much of a civil nature, and would have chosen rather to have his sufferings stated upon a matter of faith, but is fully satisfied what was carved out to him was a matter of great importance, even to religion. He had some fears of the consequences of this incident to his brethren, Presbyterian ministers: And one of the counsellors said, if some people had gotten their will of Mr. Gordon, in a few days not a Presbyterian minister durst have been seen in Scotland. But the chancellor's rashness in starting such questions, was displeasing to all the wiser set of counsellors, who thought such questions most unseasonable and impolitic at this juncture.

"When Mr. Gordon is in the castle some hours, a friend came up to him from the duke of Gordon and register, desiring him to send down a petition for liberation to the chancellor, and they would use their interest to get him liberate. When Mr. Gordon is in a strait what to do, another friend comes up from the advocate upon the same errand, with a warrant to discourse Mr. Gordon in private. The advocate by him signified he was intirely a stranger to Mr. Gordon, but was much concerned at what had passed, and had used freedom with the chancellor for his imprudence in insisting upon such heads with Mr. Gordon, and had ground to assure him, that if he petitioned he should be liberate. In short, the gentleman assured him, that several of the lords had reasoned the matter so plainly with the chancellor, as he was now repenting what he had done. Mr. Gordon returned his thanks for this great kindness, but told, he did not know how to petition, since he could not confess guilt, whereof he was not conscious. He was told, that was not expected, and he needed not touch at any thing that passed, but only seek his liberty, and if any thing had passed that had offended the chancellor, declare he was sorry for it.

"This appearing safe to Mr. Gordon, he wrote the following letter. 'Edinburgh castle, 'October 12. My lord chancellor, I am here 'prisoner by your lordship's order, where ' (saving God's good pleasure) I am loth to 'stay, detained from my charge; therefore I 'humbly beg your lordship will set me at liberty, and give me a pass to return to Campvere. If in any thing I be mistaken by, or 'have offended your lordship, I am sorry for 'it; for I desire to give no offence to Jew nor 'Gentile, nor to the church of God.

'I am, my lord, your lordship's

'Most humble Servant,

'CHARLES GORDON.'

"This was sent down to the advocate, who said he liked it well enough, but was afraid the sting in the tail of it might offend. But being told, by one present, it was a scripture expression, and ought not to offend, it was sent forward; and the Chancellor sent up a warrant for Mr. Gordon's liberation: which as far as he can remember, was to this purpose.

'That whereas it is for his majesty's service 'that Mr. Charles Gordon, prisoner in the 'castle, be set at liberty for reasons whereof I 'shall satisfy the council at their first meeting, 'therefore, &c.' in common form. Mr. Gordon remarks that if it was for his majesty's interest to liberate him, it had been more for his interest, according to those reasons which, he was of opinion, swayed most with the chancellor, that he had not been imprisoned.

"When the duke of Gordon came home about twelve at night, the orders and liberation were presented to him. He called Mr. Gordon, and spake to him alone, and signified his sorrow for his trouble, and blamed him for signifying his contentment to speak with the Chancellor. Mr. Gordon answered, he was conscious of his innocency, and never dreamed the Chancellor would have publicly examined him, or fallen upon such a subject; and he imagined he was the first that had been examined upon such a subject. The duke said, But your fault was that ye owned the princess of Orange; if you had not owned the one more than the other, you had done well. Mr. Gordon begged liberty to say, that was strange, and he could not but think it unjust, and also imprudent and unwise in the chancellor to set up an inquisition to torture and rack mens minds and hearts for what is only secret and latent there. The duke said, Well, Mr. Charles, it is true, &c. And after expressions of regard to his friends, told him he was at liberty. And they parted in good terms.

"In a day or two, Mr. Gordon went to the register, to see if now he might have a pass. His lordship told him, he could not now have it, without tabling the matter before the council, which his friends could not advise him to. And so he got off the best way he could, and came safe to his charge. This original Account I thought worth the reader's while, and from it we may guess what our circumstances would have been, had not the glorious Revolution intervened."

358. THE TRIAL OF THE SEVEN BISHOPS: being the Trial* of the Most Reverend Father in God, Dr. WILLIAM SANCROFT, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, and of the Right Rev. Fathers in God, Dr. WILLIAM LLOYD, Lord Bishop of St. Asaph, Dr. FRANCIS TURNER, Lord Bishop of Ely, Dr. JOHN LAKE, Lord Bishop of Chichester, Dr. THOMAS KENN, Lord Bishop of Bath and Wells, Dr. THOMAS WHITE, Lord Bishop of Peterborough, and Sir JONATHAN TRELAWNEY, bt. Lord Bishop of Bristol, at the King's-Bench, for publishing a Libel: Trin. 4 JAMES II. A. D. 1688.

[The circumstances attending this most interesting Trial, and the characters and conduct of the reverend defendants, have been very copiously treated by Historians and Biographers. See in particular Burnet, the Biographia, and Birch's Life of Tillotson. The following short notices of these bishops are extracted from Granger :

“ Dr. Sancroft, who, according to bishop Burnet, made a much more considerable figure in his college, than in the chair of Canterbury, was promoted from the deanery of St. Paul's to that dignity, upon the demise of archbishop Sheldon. He had several good, but seems to have had few or no amiable qualities. His piety did not sit easy on him ; and his reservedness made his learning appear to be much less than it was in reality. He was slow, timid, and irresolute ; though he acted with firmness in refusing to read the declaration for liberty of conscience, and to take the new oaths enjoined at the revolution. He was placed at the head of the church, because he was like to do no great service to it. It was reasonably supposed, that a man of so recluse and speculative a turn, was very unlikely to disturb the court in their designs upon the religious liberties of the people. His deprivation was probably a matter of no great mortification to him ; as he had raised an estate in the see of Canterbury, which was more than sufficient for one of his retired disposition. Such is the character of this prelate, as drawn by a contemporary writer, who would have considerably softened the harshness of the features, if he had been more like Sancroft, who had a generous and enlarged heart to objects of benevolence. He was highly respected, and great deference was paid to his judgment by the prelates, his fellow-sufferers, in that difficult and dangerous conjuncture for the church, which preceded the revolution: his conduct was indeed judicious and exemplary upon that trying occasion. He gave a thousand pounds towards rebuilding the deanery house of St. Paul's, and was very assiduous in procuring the coal act for rebuilding the cathedral. He bequeathed his valuable library, which he once intended to leave to his successors in the archbishopric, to Emmanuel College in Cambridge, where he received his education, and of which he had been master.* Some of his pieces will set his character, as a writer in a fair point of light. Such are, ‘ Modern Policies ;’ but such more particularly, his ‘ Familiar Letters to Mr. North ;’ both before, but ‘ principally after his deprivation and his retirement to the place of his nativity in Suffolk,’ Lond. 1757, an octavo pamphlet. See the Index to the State Letters of Henry, earl of Clarendon, sub voc. Canterbury.”

* “ After the archbishop had left Lambeth, and retired to a private house in town, Thomas, earl of Ailesbury, went thither to make him a visit. The prelate received him at the door of his apartment, which was opened by himself. The earl, struck with this circumstance of humiliation, and the total change of the scene in which he had frequently seen him at his palace, burst into tears. As soon as he recovered the power of speech, he told him how deeply he was affected with what he saw, and of his inability to suppress his grief. ‘ Oh, my good lord,’ replied the venerable confessor, ‘ rather rejoice with me ; for now I live again.’ This anecdote was communicated by John Loveday, esq. who had it from the earl himself.”

“ [August 30, 1688. Medals of the bishops have been lately made, with this motto, Wisdom hath built her a house, and chosen her seven Pillars ; with the reverse, a church undermining by two Jesuits, with a pick-axe and shovel, and a hand pointing out of a cloud with this motto, The gates of Hell shall not prevail against it.” Narcissus Luttrell's MS. Brief Historical Relation, &c.]

* The Case of the Seven Bishops is reported in 3 Mod. 212.

“ William Lloyd,* bishop of St. Asaph, was son of Richard Lloyd, vicar of Sunning, and rector of Tilehurst in Berkshire. He was master of as much, and as well digested knowledge, as any clergyman of his time. Whatever he knew, he generally knew better than other men; and was better able to display it to advantage. He was never desultory in his studies, but always mastered one branch of science before he applied himself to another. His memory was prompt, his imagination lively, and his judgment exact. He seemed to be as great a proficient in philology, history, philosophy, and divinity, as if each of these had been the sole object of his application. He was a principal reformer of the language and method of sermons; and was an admirable master of the historic style. It is much to be regretted, that so excellent a pen should have been chiefly employed in subjects of controversy, the most perishable of all writings. He supplied a great part of the materials for Dr. Burnet's ‘History of the Reformation,’ and had a great hand in polishing that excellent work. His ‘Chronologia Universalis,’ in folio, which was the most laborious of all his performances, was partly printed, but never published.† It hath already been remarked, that his Index to bishop Wilkins's ‘Real Character’ is a master-piece in its kind. It should also be observed, that his various studies never broke in upon his parochial or episcopal duties, in which he was remarkably conscientious and exemplary. His prophecies, which were but his dotages, have been the subject of much ridicule. Ob. 30 Aug. 1717.

“ Francis Turner, was son of Dr. Thomas Turner, dean of Canterbury, by Margaret, daughter of sir Francis Windebank, principal

* Some curious particulars concerning his taking the oaths to king William and queen Mary are related in the Diary of Henry earl of Clarendon. After the Revolution, he became successively bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, and of Worcester. See in this Collection some proceedings against him (when bishop of Worcester) and his son, for interference in a Worcestershire Election, A. D. 1702.

“ There were two bishops of both names, contemporary with this prelate; one was successively bishop of Landaff, Peterborough, and Norwich; and the other of Killala and Achonry, in Ireland.” Granger.

† I shall mention it here, as a fact scarce known, that he was concerned in the magnificent work called by the name of ‘Pitt's Atlas;’ which, according to the proposals, was to be printed in eleven volumes in folio, at forty shillings a volume to the subscribers. I think only four were printed. This laborious and expensive work did not meet with encouragement.

secretary of state to Charles 1. He received his education at New College in Oxford, was some time chaplain to the king, when duke of York, and a residentiary of St. Paul's. In 1670, he was preferred to the mastership of St. John's College in Cambridge; in which preferment he succeeded Dr. Peter Gunning, and was himself succeeded by Dr. Humfrey Gower. He was afterwards preferred to the deanery of Windsor, which he held, together with the bishopric of Rochester. He was deprived for not taking the new oaths, 1 Feb. 1689-90. The next year he was accused of being a conspirator in a plot of nonjurors for restoring king James, for which some of that party were imprisoned; but he thought it prudent to abscond. A proclamation was soon after issued for apprehending him, Graham, and Penn, as traitors.—Dr. Turner was an affected writer, was author of ‘Animadversions on a Pamphlet, entitled, The Naked Truth;’ of several sermons; and ‘Letters to the Clergy of the Diocese of Ely.’ But the most remarkable of his pieces is his ‘Vindication of the late Archbishop Sancroft and his Brethren, the rest of the deprived bishops, from the reflections of Mr. Marshal, in his ‘Defence of our Constitution.’”

“ Thomas Kenn, a man respected in the court of Charles 2, for his unaffected piety, was some time chaplain to that prince, as he had been before to the princess of Orange.* The openness of his countenance corresponded with the simplicity of his character. His sermons and his other writings had a good effect, as they were well known to be the genuine effusions of his heart. Almost all his works have a tendency to promote practical religion. He lived after his deprivation, with lord Weymouth, at Longleat; where he spent the greatest part of his time in retirement, which he well knew how to enjoy. When he was afflicted with the colic, to which he was very subject, he frequently amused himself with writing verses. Hence some of his pious poems are entitled, ‘Anodynes, or the Alleviation of Pain.’

* “ While he was chaplain in the prince of Orange's court, he obliged one of his highness's favourites to perform his contract, by marrying a young lady of the princess's train, whom he had seduced by means of that contract. This gave great offence to the prince. But Charles 2, was not offended at his religious intrepidity, in peremptorily refusing to admit Nell Gwyn into his lodgings, when the court was at Winchester: on the contrary, he soon after made him a bishop. The king's good sense told him, though the prince of Orange's did not, that if a man is really a Christian, his conduct ought to be uniformly consistent with that character; and that principles of conscience are of too stubborn a nature to yield, even in courts, to modes of complaisance.” Granger.

There is a prosaic flatness in his heroic poem called 'Edmund;' but some of his hymns, and other compositions, have more of the spirit of poetry, and give us an idea of that devotion which animated the author. Ob. 19 March, 1710-11."

"Dr. John Lake, who for several years bore arms for Charles 1, in the civil war, was educated at St. John's College, in Cambridge.* He rose, by the usual gradations, to the bishopric of Man; to which he was nominated by William, earl of Derby, in 1682, and consecrated in December, the same year. He had not sat two years in this see, before he was removed to that of Bristol, whence he was translated to Chichester. Though he was imprisoned with the other bishops, for refusing to cause the declaration for liberty of conscience to be read in his diocese, he is said to have entertained very high notions of regal power; and to have 'declared upon his death-bed, 'that he had been educated in, and also 'taught others the great Doctrine of Passive 'Obedience; which he looked upon as the 'distinguishing character of the Church of 'England; and that he would not have 'taken the oath, though the penalty had 'been loss of life' Upon this declaration, a person of quality in the North, published 'A Letter concerning Bishop Lake's declaration of his dying in the Doctrine of Passive 'Obedience.' Ob. 30 August, 1689."

"Jonathan Trelawney was a younger son of sir Jonathan Trelawney, of Pelynt, in Cornwall. But his elder brother dying in 1680, he inherited the title of baronet. He was a man of polite manners, competent learning, and uncommon knowledge of the world. He was a true son and friend of the Church; and exerted himself with courage and alacrity, with magnanimity and address, in defence of her just rights and privileges. He was friendly and open, generous and charitable; was a good companion, and a good man. He was successively bishop of Bristol, Exeter, and Winchester. He had as much personal intrepidity as his predecessor in the last of these sees, and was, in all other respects, much his superior. The masterly dedication before Dr. Atterbury's sermons, is addressed to this prelate. The reader may see in it some traits of his character without the exaggerations which are too often found in compositions of this kind; and which bring the sincerity of authors in question, before we have read the first page of their works. Ob. July 19, 1721."

* Lake was not the only bishop of this time who had born arms. See in this Collection the Cases of Compton bishop of London, vol. 11, p. 1123, and of Magdalen College, p. 83, of this volume. His portrait is at that College.

White, bishop of Peterborough, on Feb. 1, 1690, was deprived for not taking the oaths to king William and queen Mary. Thus we see that of these seven objects of the persecution of king James, five were deprived for not taking the oaths to his successors. Dalrymple with his usual disregard to exactness, says (Memoirs, Part 2, Book 4, pp. 97, 98, 4to Ed.) that five of the six surviving prelates who had been sent to the Tower by king James, refused to take the oaths to the new government.

"Henry Compton, youngest son of Spencer Compton, earl of Northampton, who was killed in the civil war, was educated at Queen's College in Oxford. Having staid about three years at the university, he made the usual tour of Europe. After the restoration, he became a cornet in the royal regiment of guards, commanded by Aubrey de Vere, earl of Oxford: but a military life not suiting his disposition, he entered into holy orders, and was in a few years advanced to the bishopric of Oxford, and afterwards to that of London. He strongly expected to be promoted to the see of Canterbury; and was greatly disappointed when it was given to Dr. Sancroft, but more, when Dr. Tillotson was preferred to it. His learning was superficial, but his great diligence in discharging the duties of his function was truly exemplary. He is said to have been 'an humble, modest, generous, and good natured man; but weak, 'wilful, much in the power of others, and 'strangely wedded to a party.' He was emphatically called, The Protestant Bishop, for the noble stand he made in defence of the rights of the Church in this reign, when spirit and resolution were much more necessary than learning. He patronized converts from Popery, and was a generous friend to the French Protestants who fled hither from the persecution of Lewis 14. He appeared in arms at Nottingham, a little before the revolution, and declared his readiness to fight for the prince of Orange. He was a true son and brave champion of the Church, and a most munificent benefactor to it. Whatever imperfections there might be in his character, he was allowed to be much a gentleman, and no less a Christian. Ob. 7 July, 1713, Æt. 81."

* For characters of these judges, see lord Camden's judgment in Wilkes's Case, A. D. 1763, in this Collection. In the summer of 1688, king James gave the following INSTRUCTIONS TO THE JUDGES ITINERANT.

"The judges of assizes of the circuits, both in England and Wales, are severally and respectively required by his majesty to take all occasions, both in their public and private discourses, but more especially in their respective charges, by all the pressing arguments that may be to persuade and require, That all his majesty's subjects of what degree, quality or condition soever (especially such as would be esteemed truly loyal and well affected to the government) should give their utmost assistance for the supporting of his majesty's late gracious Declaration for Liberty of Conscience.

"And to let them know, that his majesty intends very speedily to call a parliament, and to use his utmost endeavours that the same may be past into a law; that all his subjects may have that ease and safety, and consequently that plenty, which they now enjoy, continued to them and their posterities.

"The advancement of land, improvement of the trade and manufactures so greatly to the advantage of this kingdom, which are his majesties chiefest arms, being so visibly concerned herein; his majesty cannot doubt but such as desire the common good of this nation will give their utmost assistance to promote these great ends.

"You are to assure such as are of the Church of England, as well as others of his subjects, that his majesty will maintain all his gracious promises in the said Declaration.

"You are to encourage all people, of what persuasion soever, to live friendly together, as becomes good Christians and good subjects, and to dispose them to unite their endeavours to render effectual his majesty's gracious intentions for the common good and advantage of all.

"You are to remove, as much as may be, all fears and jealousies that are endeavoured to be insinuated by persons ill-affected to the government, by representing, that the experience they have now had for three years of the king's government sufficiently shews and ought to satisfy them, how gracious a prince he is, who only designs the universal happiness of his people, that trade may flourish and increase and the honour and reputation of the nation carried to a greater height than ever.

"And you are in order hereunto to contradict the idle and false reports that are industriously spread to distract men's minds, and "You are to take all proper opportunities to inform such you converse with, That the liberty of conscience, his majesty hath been pleased to grant, has already most apparently increased our trade at home, and that the free exercise of religion has been the chief and principal visible cause of the great riches that some of our nearest neighbours abroad at this day enjoy, and would be a certain means to make these kingdoms populous, and by consequence to be the chiefest place of trade in the Christian world, which occasions so many malicious attempts to prevent it.

"You are to let all persons know, within your several districts: that his majesty is unalterably resolved to place trust and confidence in, and to reward all such of his subjects as shall zealously assist in his present measures, and to look upon all that shall oppose him herein as contemners of his royal will and pleasure, and enemies to the common good of his kingdom."

"Gentlemen of the jury; It is a duty incumbent upon me upon this occasion, and at this time, to say something in order to your direction: And I am well satisfied with you, for I presume you are all gentlemen of worth, ability, loyalty and fidelity. Therefore, gentlemen, I will not tell you whatever you enjoy is from the good effects of government, and you may now keep up the good government of this county; for you are now to enquire into all misdemeanors heretofore, and past, that offenders may be met with, and justice done to all. I will only give you this to observe, That in Bills, &c. that come before you, your enquiry is not final, because the parties concerned have liberty to make their defence afterwards when they are brought upon their petty-jury, where they see their accusers face to face: And then on the other side, if you find that any thing proceeds from envy, and malice, and not of due prosecution, then you may acquit the person that is so wrongfully prosecuted, and so justice is done betwixt party and party; so an ignoramus jury may not be of use. [As to this see in this Collection, vol. 8. p. 359.]

"Gentlemen, it is the desire of the king, that we may keep in love and unity, and not to be devouring and harassing one another. We o'clock the same day, the lieutenant returned his writ, and brought the said lord archbishop and bishops into court, where being set down in chairs, set for that purpose, Mr. Attorney General moved the court, viz.

Att. Gen. (sir Thomas Powis.) My Lord, I pray that the Writ and Retorn may be read, have lived in an age where there is great debates and harassing about religion; I say, that we have been under great disputations about religion; and it is no wonder; for there is in religion as much variety as in mens' countenances; and now then you will not think it strange, because that you and I are not of the same religion, that we should be freed from disturbing and harassing one another. Gentlemen, be not mistaken, nor let no false rumour be spread in any place, that I am for taking off the penal laws and tests, but so as in their places to have good laws for your security. Gentlemen, the king himself desires you to make such laws as you will, only do it so as not to hang one another about religion; let no one be prosecuted for religion. If any one distributes such doctrine, he is a man that doth not know the king's intention, but calumniates him in the ——. The king is willing that every one may be as free in his conscience as in his thoughts: pray, Gentlemen, consider what a blessing this is, what a public interest and good it is of.

"First consider, the flourishing of our neighbours: Gentlemen, they have great trade and traffic, and gather riches: they have the protection of the government, and they are true and firm to that government they have their protection under. In a Christian kingdom it is not any one's interest to prosecute one another; then it is not his majesty's desire. Then gentlemen if we will act like free-born Englishmen, no government ought to be so horrible, and cruel as to prosecute one another for religion. Gentlemen, I'll urge it very little more with this instance: remember to do as you would be done by: this, Gentlemen, mankind and human nature tendeth to: but then if we come so far as to profess ourselves to be Christians, then let us consider what our great lawgiver, our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ said, 'Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly:' tenderness has no share of persecution: remember, I say, the true mark of Christianity is humility and mildness. Let me ask you from whence they have such a spirit, or what will be the consequence of it to posterity; what can be the meaning that any man shall be in love with sanguinary and bloody laws? I cannot conceive that any man that rightly lays his hand on his heart, I say, I cannot conceive he can give any reason. Gentlemen, no man that is a well grounded Christian can be for the laws of persecuting one another: I must confess that no man can get the reputation of a good Christian by putting sanguinary laws in execution. So, Gentlemen, though those sanguinary laws were enacted, and but some which my lords the bishops are brought hither.

L. C. J. Read the Retorn.

Clerk reads the Retorn, which in English is as follows:

'I sir Edward Hales, baronet, lieutenant of the Tower of London, named in the writ to this schedule annext, To our most years since, they never had a general approbation, nor no man of the Church of England for putting them in execution.

"Now, Gentlemen, as concerning the Test; if you consider that you will easily part with it. How many gentlemen of great worth to merit something of their fortune from the crown by their own industry, and are hindered because they cannot believe this, or that; there are 1,000 men brought up that cannot agree concerning Transubstantiation, what it is, or not, and concerning the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; and because of this must they be hindered? why then because I cannot take the Test, must I be hindered of an employment in the world? this, Gentlemen, pincheth sore with them in liberal education. It is said, 'Upon this rock will I build my church:' was this meant of the Church of England? it was but of yesterday's standing: so, Gentlemen, it is but a flourish. Gentlemen, the end of the Test is not religion, but preferment: if any one therefore should be hindered upon just pretences for religion, then religion is not at the bottom of it. This, gentlemen, is a matter of great importance. It is in the catechism that Christ is really in the Lord's Supper; nor hath it been objected against the church of Rome by the church of England, that he was not really, but by way of presentation, and that is a great reproach; Christ himself told us he was there: now be you not more strict than Christ himself. I am not arguing what my sense is, but I am only shewing that as the church of England would impose, that Christ was by way of presentation, is it not equally difficult, that we shall believe thus and thus? Is not the like liberty to be had and taken of one side, as well as the other? Gentlemen, I only argue this for the incoherence of the thing.

"Gentlemen, there is another thing to be observed: our lawful superiors must be obeyed in all their lawful commands: this the church of England-men have made their business to preach up. The king is to be obeyed in every thing, if it be not against God's command. The Test is not commanded by the word of God, and the taking away not prohibited. Gentlemen, I hope your solid judgments, and great prudence will supply you with better arguments, and discourses than I shall give you; and whoever is not for love and meekness, never let him challenge to himself to be a good subject, that is not for the taking off the penal laws and Test.

"Gentlemen, I have one thing more to commit to your consideration about the late transaction of the bishops, that were tried lately at the King's-bench: I would not have the world

' serene lord the king, do most humbly certify,
' That before the coming of the said writ, to ' wit, the eighth day of June, in the fourth ' year of the reign of our lord James the second, mistaken: it was not for their religion they were tried: they were tried for acting against the government; for publishing a libel that tended to sedition: the king commands them with the advice of his council for to publish his declaration; they would not do it. If the king had been Turk or Jew, it had been all one; for the subject ought to obey. Gentlemen, it may be the method of their proceeding may stick with persons: some will say, may not a subject petition? now, gentlemen, it is not the name of a petition can justify an unlawful act; nay, gentlemen, it may be the worse and deserve a greater reproof. I do believe of all subjects that have lived under the face of the sun none have the like liberty, as we have under our king; for I may be bold to say, that any one may come to the speech of his majesty, or to petition him; but then, gentlemen, consider what a petition it is, and for what it is; about what the king doth in his government? any man may petition in his private affairs to his majesty; but what have we to do to petition about government? for that which is so, it is a libel, and of bad consequence: so I shall say no more; I hope you are dutiful subjects, and gentlemen of great prudence and worth, and have had no ill principles distilled into you, and so the Lord direct you." From Papers in the handwriting of archbishop Sancroft among Tanner's MSS. in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. See Gutch's Collectanea Curiosa.

The following passages from the Diary of Henry earl of Clarendon, relate to the origin and progress of the proceedings against the Seven Bishops:

" May 12, 1688, Saturday. I dined at Lambeth; where likewise dined the bishops of London, Ely, and Peterborough, Chester and St. Davids. The two last discomposed the company, nobody caring to speak before them. Quickly after dinner they went away: then the archbishop and the rest took into consideration the reading of the declaration in the churches, according to the order of council: and, after full deliberation, it was resolved not to do it. Dr. Tension was present at all the debate. The resolution was, to petition the king in the matter; but first to get as many bishops to town as were within reach: and, in order thereunto, that the bishops of Winchester, Norwich, Gloucester, St. Asaph, Bath and Wells, Bristol and Chichester should be written to, to come to town.

" May 16, Wednesday. The bishop of St. Asaph came to town before noon: he alighted at my house, and dined with me. I sent for the bishop of Ely, who quickly came. In the afternoon they two went to Lambeth; in the evening they came back again: for the bishop

' king of England, &c. William lord archbishop ' of Canterbury, William lord bishop of St.
' Asaph, Francis lord bishop of Ely, John lord ' bishop of Chichester, Thomas lord bishop of of St. Asaph lay at my house. They told me, most of the city clergy had resolved not to read the declaration. The bishop of Winton sent his excuse to the archbishop, that he could not come to town, being indisposed in his health."

" May 18, Friday. In the evening the bishops, six in number, presented a petition to the king, praying, that his majesty would recall his proclamation for reading the proclamation of indulgence in the churches. It was written with the archbishop's own hand, and signed by himself and the other six. The king took them into the room within the bed-chamber: when he had read the petition, he was angry, and said he did not expect such a petition from them. This the bishop of St. Asaph told me, when he came home.

" May 19, Saturday. In the morning all the judges were sent for to Whitehall: the report was that it was about the bishops' petition.

" May 20, Sunday. I was at St. James's church: in the evening I had an account that the declaration was read only in four churches in the city and liberties. Neither Stillingfleet nor Tillotson were at their churches; but, as I am told, went yesterday to their country houses. So otherwise are some sort of men."

" May 23. My Lord [Chancellor] told me the king had been informed that was at Lambeth, at the consultation among the bishops."

" May 28. In the afternoon the bishop of Ely was with me: he told me that my lord Sunderland had sent a summons under his hand and seal to the archbishop; requiring him, and the rest of the bishops who had signed the petition, to appear before the king in council on the 8th of June, to answer to such matters of misdemeanours, as shall be then objected against them."

" June 5. In the evening the bishops of Ely, and Bath and Wells were with me: I advised them to consult with the best lawyers, how to behave themselves at the council board; that the time drew near, and that they should not come unprepared to answer any question that might be asked them upon their petition.

" June 6. In the evening the bishops of Ely, Bath and Wells, Peterborough, and St. Asaph, (the last was just come to town) were with me, and desired to borrow some parliament journals, which they thought might be useful to them, and which I lent them.

" June 7. In the evening the bishops were with me, and told me they had taken advice with the best counsel, and hoped they should have good success to morrow. I asked them, if they had well considered what to do or say, in case they should be required to find bail for their further appearance (for such a thing was whispered); and I found they had not: whereupon I earnestly pressed them to go this very evening and advise therein with sir Robert Sawyer, who could best instruct them what power the council board now had; and so they left me, resolving to go presently to him.

" June 8. In the afternoon, the archbishop and the rest appeared at council. When they were first called in, the petition was shewed them, and they were asked if they owned that petition? The archbishop answered, that the king very well knew what petition was delivered to him, and that it could not be expected they should accuse themselves: upon which they were ordered to withdraw. After a little debate they were called in, and bid withdraw again twice or thrice. What past at each time, I cannot yet particularly learn: but at last they were required to enter into recognizances to appear in the court of king's bench the first day of next term, which they refused to do, and thereupon were committed to the Tower; and the attorney general was ordered to prefer an information against them.

" June 9. Multitudes of people went to the Tower to the Bishops.

" June 10. I kissed his [the king's] hand, and wished him joy [of the birth of the prince of Wales.] I visited the bishops in the Tower; with whom was a vast concourse of people going in and out.

" June 12. In the afternoon I went to the Tower. They told me lord Halifax had been to see them, and advised them to write every one to three peers to be bail for them, when they came to the King's-bench; which, they said, they did not like, and seemed not inclined to do it. I confess I do not understand his lordship's notions; I am sure when the reading the declaration was under consideration, and the petition, for which the bishops now suffer, he was so very cautious, that he would give no advice at all. I told the bishops, that, in my opinion, the best thing they could do, was without any noise, to send to some of their friends (without regarding whether they were peers or not) to be at Westminster the first day of the term in case there should be occasion for them."

" June 14, 1688. In the morning I went to see my lord chancellor, he discoursed very freely to me concerning the bishops, said he was much troubled at their prosecution, and made many professions of service for them, which he desired me to let them know. He said the king was once resolved to let the business fall and not to have proceeded thus against them, that he was grieved to find he had changed his mind, that he knew not how it came to pass; but said there was no remedy, some men would hurry the king to his destruction. In the afternoon I went to the Tower in my custody, by virtue of a certain warrant under the hands and seals of George lord Jeffries, baron of Wern, lord high chancellor of England, Robert earl of Sunderland, lord pre-and gave the bishops an account of all that my lord chancellor had said to me.

" June 15. The first day of the term at the first sitting of the court of King's-bench, the attorney general moved for a Habeas Corpus, returnable immediately to bring the bishops into court. About half an hour after eleven they came; both the hall and palace yard were extremely crowded. All the way as they came from the bridge where they landed, to the very court, the people made a lane for them and begged their blessings. As I was taking coach in the little palace yard by the House of Lords, I found the bishop of St. Asaph in the midst of the crowd, the people thinking it a blessing to kiss any of those bishops hands or garments. I took him into my coach and carried him home to my house, but was fain to turn up through Tuttle-street, and so to go round by the park to avoid the throng the other way in the streets, which neither the bishop nor I cared to be in.

" June 21. I was told that this morning the chancellor had carried sir Samuel Astry to the king. It was presently suspected to be about the bishops' trial; he being the person that is to strike the jury.

" June 25. In the evening the bishop of St. Asaph, Ely, Bath and Wells, and Peterborough were with me. They told me their jury was settled this afternoon. I was told sir Robert Clarke had been very busy at sir Samuel Astry's in that matter."

" June 27. In the afternoon I was with my lord chancellor. He talked very freely to me, and with great trouble upon the bishops' affair. He seemed very apprehensive that their being brought to a public trial would be of very ill consequence to the king, in all his affairs: but he said it would be found, that he had done the part of an honest man. As for the judges, said he, they are most of them rogues.

" June 28. The bishops told me they had settled every thing with their council for their trial, lord Dartmouth had been with the bishop of Ely to persuade him to make application to the king, which got air, and was like to have been very inconvenient, had not the bishop been very steady.

" June 29. The bishops were brought to their trial, which lasted from nine in the morning till past six in the evening. There were five or six and twenty noblemen all the time in the court. When the jury withdrew, the court adjourned till to morrow morning ten o'clock: the bishop of St. Asaph, sir Thomas Clarges and Dr. Tennison supped with me. Mr. Blaney was in court to take the trial.

" June 30. Westminster-hall was extremely full again. The jury (sir Roger Langley foreman) brought in their verdict, Not Guilty: upon which there was a most wonderful shout, that one would have thought the hall had crack-

'sident of the privy council of our lord the king, Henry lord Arundel of Warden, keeper of the privy seal of our said lord the king, William marquess of Powis, John earl of

Mulgrave, lord great chamberlain of England, Theophilus earl of Huntingdon, Henry earl of Peterborough, William earl of Craven, Alexander earl of Murray, Charles earl of ed; insomuch that the court took notice of it. In the evening multitudes of bonfires were made for the bishops being acquitted."

"July 5. In the morning I was with my lord chancellor: he told me, he found the king a little troubled, that the bishops had been brought to their trials; that he seemed to be in a milder temper than he had been, and he hoped he might be persuaded to take moderate counsels. Now, says my lord, honest men both lords and others (though the king had used them hardly) should appear often at court. I am sure, it would do good. He desired I would come sometimes to him, that by me he might have a correspondence with the archbishop; which it was yet too soon for him to have openly.

"August 13. I was at Bulstrode [the residence of Jefferies.] When I was going away my lord chancellor would needs carry me as far as Dr. Hickman's living. I went in his calash with him. He talked very freely to me of all affairs; called the judges a thousand fools, and knaves; that chief justice Wright was a beast: he said the king and queen were to dine with him on Thursday next; that he had still great hopes the king would be moderate, when the parliament met. When we came to Dr. Hickman's, my lord was inclined to be merry; saying he had papists and spies among his own servants, and therefore must be cautious at home."

This lord Clarendon (see more of him in Crone's Case, A. D. 1690) appears to have had a lively feeling of religion, and to have been upon the whole a worthy and conscientious man.* His attachment to the church of Eng-

* The collation of the following passages in his Diary may perhaps excite a smile:

"Nov. 15. Just after dinner Mr. Dent came to Lambeth to me from my wife, to let me know that news was come to town, that my son was gone over to the prince of Orange with his own regiment, the earl of Oxford's regiment of horse, and the duke of St. Alban's regiment. I presently went over the water to my brother's, who confirmed this sad news to me. O God, that my son should be a rebel! the Lord in his mercy look upon me, and enable me to support myself under this most grievous calamity. I made haste home; and, as soon as I could recollect myself a little, I wrote to my lord Middleton to obtain leave for me to throw myself at the king's feet.

"Nov. 30. Before dinner sir H. Capell was with me. I told him, now the writs were issued for a parliament, and that a proclamation was coming forth to allow all men to go to the countries, I resolved to go to Sarum, and so to the prince of Orange; and that I would begin land appears to have been strong, and he is not sparing of asperity of expression towards those whom he denominates fanatics. But neither is he on all occasions destitute of indulgent language towards those whose religious opinions differed from his own.

In a letter, written by him (Sept. 4th, 1686,) while lord lieutenant of Ireland, to his brother lord Rochester, he says, "By my consent any man though a Jew who will bring money and live obediently to the laws shall be welcome, and have all the encouragement and protection the government can give him." And, on the 9th of the same month, he writes to the king, "nor have I presumed to recommend any to your majesty's favour since I came hither but those who have always served you, and I think they have been all Roman Catholics." Of his unwillingness to suffer James's Popish inclinations to be offended under his government, he gave early proof in a letter dated March 2d, 1685-6, before he had been in Ireland two months, he informs the king, "Very lately a young man preaching before me was indeed very impertinent: not so much in relation to your majesty, as in taking notice of the king of France's proceedings towards the Huguenots: though I know your majesty does not approve of those proceedings, yet what has any preacher to do to inquire into the actions of any prince, thought not his own? I therefore sent for him the next morning, and gave him a rebuke. I trouble your majesty with this story, to shew you that no care of mine shall be wanting to hinder all things that I think will displease you; but especially those things, in which I know your mind, as I do in this concerning the preaching. And I beseech your majesty to believe, that no man shall commit these follies twice before me; nor any where else, which I have information of: and though the inferior clergy in most places are unruly, and not so apt to take advice, as to give it; yet I dare undertake to keep ours here, within the bounds of duty and good manners."

In the preceding extracts from Lord Clarendon we find Jefferies hoping that James might be persuaded to take more moderate counsels; while the friends of James have endeavoured to palliate his guilt by imputing his misconduct to the advice of Jefferies. The same recrimination occurred respecting the cruelties in the my journey to morrow. He said, he would go with me; and desired me to take him up at Brentford, as I went by. Lord Drogheda, and lord Blessington being with me in the afternoon, I told them of my journey: they both said, they would go with me.

"The Declaration for liberty of conscience ordered to be reprinted; and to be read in the churches. The bishops address against it; thinking it illegal to dispense with all sorts of laws in cases contrary to the very designs of the law.

"The bishops petition on the 18th of May, against what they were to read on the 20th. The Chancellor advised the king to summon the bishops before the council, on the 9th of June, for a tumultuary petition, liable to a legal prosecution. They, refusing bail, were committed to the Tower. The queen expected to lye-in; and did the next day. The princess Anne contrived to go to Bath, in order to be absent when the queen was brought to-bed. The bishops, perhaps, had some motive in forcing the king to imprison them: for he would not only have taken their recognizance, but even their word, for their appearance. Both were refused; because an imprisonment would inflame the nation, and prevent the archbishop of Canterbury from being at the queen's delivery. The king had earnestly pressed the princess Anne to stay, till the queen should be delivered; but the doctor's opinion pleaded all delays dangerous. The prince was born on the 10th of June. The prince of Orange sent Mr. Keppel to congratulate the king and queen, and prayed for the prince, who had like to have died for want of a wet-nurse to suckle him.

"On the 29th of June, the bishops were tried. The Presbyterians joined with the church party to expose the king.

"In the case of the bishops there is no doubt but the king had done better, in not forcing some wheels, when he found the whole machine stop. But it was his misfortune to give too much ear to the pernicious advice of those who put him upon such dangerous councils with intent to widen the breach between him and his subjects. But his prepossession against the yielding temper, which had proved so dangerous to his brother, and fatal to the king his father, fixed him in a contrary method. He had always preached against the wavering councils of his brother; and seeing that other bishops made not the same difficulty, and since many complied, he thought the rest ought to do the same. The king, therefore, gave more easily into the Chancellor's opinion, who thought that a mere reprimand was not sufficient. It was, however a fatal council: for besides the common reasons against it, nothing ought to have made the king more cautious, in the matter, than the present conjuncture, on account of the queen's being with child. It was that gave the alarm: and by consequence, required a greater attention, to avoid every cause of complaint."

"Mr. Robert Price,* to the Duke of Beaufort.
—An Account of the Trial of the seven Bishops.

"Sir, Lincoln's Inn, June 30, 1688.

"Yesterday, being St. Peter's day, the seven Bishops were brought to their trial, upon the information of publishing a libel, about their refusal to read, or to cause to be read, the king's declaration. Their trial held from nine in the morning, till near seven in the evening. The king's evidence to the number of twelve, laboured to prove the Bishops' hands to the petition; which was done obscurely. Lord Sunderland was sent for, to prove the publication of the libel. His evidence was, that, at the request of the Bishops, he brought them to the king, to whom they delivered a paper; but could not say that it was the same for which the information was there exhibited. The council for the Bishops insisted upon their not proving, that the Bishops wrote these hands; next, that not publishing was proved; and if so, that it was no libel. There Pollexfen and Mr. Finch took no small pains to inveigh against the king's dispensing power. Serjeant Pemberton said, that what the Bishops did, was that which became them as peers; and, if the dispensing power was against law, how came they to be criminals, for not doing that which was against law? and said farther, that he could shew several judgments in parliament, and in cases in law, where the dispensing power was denied. The council for the king waived the point, though Mr. Solicitor was fiercely earnest against the Bishops, and took the management upon himself; Mr. Attorney's province being to put in a smooth question now and then. Mr. Justice Powell declared himself very freely, that he could not find the petition to be a libel; for then it must be false, scandalous and malicious. False it was not; because he took the law to be, that the king had not a dispensing power; for, if he had,

He rendered himself remarkable by a spirited speech in the House of Commons, in the year 1696, against some grants of the demesnes of the prince of Wales, made by king William to his favorite, the earl of Portland. Many of his original letters to the duke of Beaufort are in the hands of the editor." Macpherson.

“ ment, and them safely to keep in your cusmost part of the statute books might be dispensed with, and there would be no need of parliaments. Scandalous or malicious it was not ; because drawn with all privacy, and presented with all humility. Mr. Justice Holloway had a mind to say somewhat to the purpose ; but did declare against the dispensing power. The chief justice doubted, as to the proof of the publishing ; but took the petition to be a libel. Justice Allybon believed throughout, and doubted nothing. The jury withdrew.

The hall being full, and the Palace Yard, they made three huzzas that were heard at the Temple. The jury staid till nine this morning, Arnold a brewer till then dissenting, when they brought in the Bishops Not Guilty ; which was followed with so many shouts in the hall, that it was with much difficulty they could be quieted. This is the result of the long expected cause. The court of King’s Bench was yesterday and to day very full of the nobility and gentry of the best quality. I doubt this day’s work will give Justice Powell a remove ; and it is thought, Holloway also ; there being candidates enough for the vacancies. Mr. Ser-jeant Lehunt had his train carried through Westminster Hall, which is not usual ; but whether ominous of promotion, I know not.
It is, however, a plain demonstration of his train-bearer’s ignorance.”

Mr. Williams Wynn has permitted me to compare this Report of the case of the Seven Bishops with a Report in MS. which belonged to sir William Williams the Solicitor General at the time of their trial. This MS. contains many alterations of sir William Williams’s speeches (in several instances softening down his expressions. Burnet says, ‘ Powis acted his part in this Trial as fairly as his post could admit of, but Williams took very indecent liberties’); some of which are noted in the Report here given, and some are incorporated into it.
And on the first leaf of the MS. is written by sir Wm. Williams the following memorandum :

‘ I am against printing or publishing this ‘ sort of Narrative of the proceedings in the ‘ late case of my lord archbishop and bishops
‘ and do hereby disclaime the printing or pub‘ lishing of it.’ W. WILLIAMS.

“ To the Lieutenant of the Tower
“ of London.”

“ taining, &c.”

L. C. J. Well, what do you desire, Mr.
Attorney ?

Mr. Att. Gen. We pray for the king, that the retorn may be filed.

L. C. J. Let it be filed.

Att. Gen. By this retorn your lordship observes what it is my lords the bishops were committed to the Tower for ; it is by warrant from the council board, where, when their lordships appeared, they were not pleased to give their recognizances to appear here, as they were required by the king to do : and thereupon they were committed to the Tower, and now come before the court upon this retorn of the king’s writ of Habeas Corpus ; and by the retorn it does appear, it was for contriving, writing, framing, and publishing a seditious libel against his majesty and the government.
My lord, it is our duty, who are the king’s counsel, pursuant to our orders, to prosecute such kind of offences : and when the proper time shall come for us to open the nature of the offence, your lordships will then judge what reason there is for this prosecution : but in the mean time, what we are now to offer to your lordship is, The officer of this court has an information against his grace the archbishop of Canterbury, and the rest of my lords the bishops, which we desire may be read to them, and pray that they may plead to it, according to the course of the court.

Sir Robert Sawyer.* If it please your lordship to spare us a word for my lords the bishops.

Att. Gen. My lord, we pray for the king the information may be read.

Sir R. Sawyer. We desire to be heard a word first.

Sol. Gen. (sir William Williams). We oppose your speaking any thing, till the information hath been read.

Sir R. Sawyer. But what we have to offer is proper before it be read.

Att. Gen. Your time is not yet come, sir Robert.

Sir R. Sawyer. Yes, this is our proper time for what we have to say, and therefore we move it now, before there be any other proceedings in this matter.

Sol. Gen. It is irregular to move any thing yet : pray let the information be read first.

Serj. Pemberton. If your lordship please to spare us, we will offer nothing but what is fit for us to do.

* See in this Collection some account of him,
vol. 10, p. 117. See also sir William Williams’s Case, infra.

Sir R. Sawyer. And now is our proper time for it.

Sol. Gen. Gentlemen, You do know the way of proceeding in such cases better than so : I am sure, as for you, sir Robert Sawyer, you have often opposed any such motion as irregular : and I hope the case is not altered ; however you may be, the course of the court is the same.

Sir R. Sawyer. With submission, if your lordship please to spare me a word, that which I would move, is, to discharge my lords the bishops upon this return, and from their commitment upon this warrant.

Att. Gen. Surely these gentlemen think to have a liberty above all other people : Here is an Information, which we pray my lords the bishops may hear read, and plead to.

Sol. Gen. Certainly, sir Robert Sawyer, you would not have done thus half a year ago.

Sir R. Sawyer. What would not I have done ? I move regularly (with submission) to discharge my lords the bishops from their commitment ; if they are not here legally imprisoned, now they are before your lordships upon this writ, then you will give us leave to move for their discharge, before any thing else be said to them ; and that is it we have to say, to demand the judgment of the court upon this return, whether we are legally imprisoned ?

Att. Gen. Under favour, my lord, neither the court, nor they, are ripe for any motion of this nature yet.

Serj. Pemberton. If we do not move it now, it will afterwards (I fear) be too late.

Sol. Gen. These gentlemen are very forward, but certainly they mistake their time ; this is a Habeas Corpus that is brought by the king, and not by the prisoners ; and therefore they are too soon, till they see what the king has to say to them.*

Att. Gen. Your lordship cannot as yet be moved for your judgment about the legality of this commitment, because this writ was granted upon our motion, who are of counsel for the king, and upon this writ they are brought here : And what is it we desire for the king ? Certainly nothing but what is regular. We have here an information for the king against my lords, and we desire they may plead to it.

Serj. Pemberton. Good my lord, will you please to hear us a little to this matter.

L. C. J. Brother Pemberton, we will not refuse to hear you by no means, when you speak in your proper time, but it is not so now ; for the king is pleased, by his Attorney and Solicitor, to charge these noble persons, my lords the bishops, with an information ; and the king's counsel call to have that information read, but you will not permit it to be read.

Serj. Pemberton. Pray, my lord, spare us a word : If we are not here as prisoners regularly before your lordship, and are not brought in by the due process of the court, then certainly the king's counsel, or the court, have no power to charge us with an information ; therefore we beg that you will hear us to that, in the first place, whether we are legally here before you.

Sol. Gen. These gentlemen will have their proper time for such a motion hereafter.

Mr. Pollexfen.* No, Mr. Solicitor, this is, without all question, our only time for it ; we shall have no time afterwards.

Att. Gen. Yes, you will, for what do we, who are of counsel for the king, now ask of the court, but that this Information may be read ? When that is done, if we move to have my lords the bishops plead, then they may move what they will ; but before we make that motion, they cannot break in upon us with their motion ; and, with submission to your lordship, whether my lords the bishops were duly committed, is not yet a question.

Mr. Finch. But it is, and this is the fittest time for it.

Sol. Gen. Pray will you hear us quietly what we have to say, and then answer us with reason, if you can : I think we are in a proper way, but they are not, my lord ; for (as I said) my lords the bishops are brought by the king's writ upon our motion for the king, not upon theirs ; and now we have them here before the

* The following very curious passage respecting Pollexfen occurs in the Diary of Henry earl of Clarendon :

"1688, Dec. 14," [King James had secretly withdrawn from Whitehall on the 11th and had been detained at Feversham.] "My brother gave me an account of the manner of the king's being taken ; and that the peers, who met every morning and afternoon in the council chamber at Whitehall, had sent to him, as soon as they heard of it. I sent Mr. Knight, to desire Mr. Pollexfen to come to me tomorrow morning, as early as he could."

"Dec. 15. Saturday. In the morning Mr. Pollexfen was with me. I told him, I had a great desire to confer with him, that I might the better know how to govern myself in this wonderful exigence. He very readily told me, he wondered, the prince of Orange had done no more ; that the king by withdrawing himself had left the government ; that he had made a cession, and forfeited his right ; that his being now at Feversham, though he should come back to London, signified not a rush ; that the prince of Orange had nothing to do, but in the head of his army to declare himself king, and presently to issue out writs for the calling a parliament according to Cromwell's model ; which he said was a far more equal way of election than the old constitution. Good God bless me ! what a man is this ? I confess he astonished me ; and so we quickly parted."

* In sir William Williams's MS. corrections, this speech is thus given :

"These gentlemen are very forward, but certainly they mistake their time. This is a Habeas Corpus that's brought by the king and not by the prisoners, and therefore they ought to hear what the king shall say to them by his information before they make their objections."

court, we for the king will charge them with an information; which information, that they and the court may know what it is they are charged with, we pray it may be read to them by the clerk; and when it is read, let these gentlemen say what they will for them, they shall have their time to speak; but certainly they ought not to obstruct the king's proceedings, nor oppose the reading of the information to these noble lords who are brought here in custody into court, to this very purpose, that they may be charged with this information.

Serj. Pemberton. But we have somewhat to say before you can come to that, Mr. Solicitor.

Sol. Gen. You ought not to be heard as yet.

Serj. Pemberton. Under favour, we ought to be heard.

Sir R. Sawyer. My lord, Mr. Solicitor has opposed our being heard, but we now desire he would hear our answer to it; and that which we have to say, is this, That my lords the bishops are not here regularly in the court to be charged with an information; and if the law be not with us in that point, as we doubt not to make appear it is, no question but when your lordship has heard what we have to say, you will give a right rule in it. My lord, we say, that by the rules of law, no man ought to be charged with an information or indictment, by the express statute of Edward the 3d, unless he come into the court by legal process: That is a standing rule, and the practice of this and all other courts is pursuant to it. Now in this court you have several processes that go out of this court, and he that comes as taken by virtue of a Capias, or an attachment after a summons, or by Venire in the nature of a Subpoena; I say he that comes in upon these processes, may be charged with an information: but where a person is in prison, committed by another jurisdiction, and another authority than that of this court; when the prisoner is brought here by Habeas Corpus, the first thing the court has to do, is to enquire whether he be legally committed; to that end the return is filed, and the party has leave to make his exceptions to it, as we do in this case, my lords are brought here upon a Habeas Corpus, the return of which has been read, and now the return is filed, we are proper to move, that my lords may be discharged; for you now see what they are committed for; it is for a misdemeanor in making and publishing a libel, that is the matter for which they are committed; and it appears by the return likewise, that they who are thus committed are peers of the realm; for so my lords the bishops all are, and for a misdemeanor they ought not by law to have been committed.

L. C. J. You go too far now, sir Robert Sawyer; I would willingly hear you whatsoever you have to say; but then it must be in its due time.

Att. Gen. This very discourse (indeed I have heard) has passed up and down the town for law; we see now whence they had it.

Sol. Gen. I know it has heretofore been urged by me, but denied by them who now urge it,* and I am glad that they now learn of me to tack about.

L. C. J. Look you, gentlemen, do not fall upon one another, but keep to the matter before you.

Serj. Pemberton. So we would, my lord, if the king's counsel would let us. First, we say, we being brought here upon a return of a Habeas Corpus, there was neither at the time of the commitment cause to imprison us, nor was there by the warrant any cause to detain us in prison; and for that, besides what has been hinted at, we say further, that here it is returned, that we were committed by such and such persons, lords of the privy-council; but the return doth not say, that it was done by them, as lords of the privy-council, which must be in council; for if it be not in council, they have not power to make such a warrant for the commitment of any person; and that we stand upon. Here is a return that is not a good return of a legal commitment, and therefore we pray my lords may be discharged.

Mr. Pollexfen. Pray, my lord, spare me a word: that is the thing we humbly offer to your lordships' consideration; and, under favour, I think we are proper both as to the matter, and as to the time: the return is now filed before you; if by this return there appears to have been such a cause to commit these lords to prison, as is legal, then we acknowledge they may in a legal course be brought to answer for their offence; but with submission, it appears not by any thing that is in this return, that my lords the bishops were committed by the order of the privy-council. All that is said, is, that they were committed by my lord chancellor, and those other persons, named lords of the privy-council; which we conceive is not a good return; for they can do nothing as lords of the privy-council, except only as they are in council, and by order made in council; except that do appear, they have no power to commit: then take the case to be so; here is a man committed by one that has no authority to commit him, and he is brought by Habeas Corpus into this court, what shall the court do with him? Shall they charge him with an information? No, it does appear that he was in custody, but under a commitment by those who had no legal power to commit him; and therefore he must be discharged; and that we pray for my lords the bishops. What the king's counsel may have to say to them afterwards, by way of information or otherwise, they must take the regular methods of the law to bring my lords the bishops to answer; but as the case stands here before you, upon this return, it does appear, they had no authority to commit them by whose warrant they were committed; and therefore this court has nothing to do but to discharge them.

* In sir William Williams's MS. the remaining words of this speech are cancelled.

Mr. Finch. I beg your lordship's leave to say one word farther on the same side: I think, with humble submission, this is the most proper time for us to make this motion; for here is a Habeas Corpus returned; this return is filed, and then the king's counsel move to charge my lords the bishops with an information. That motion of theirs (we say) is too soon, unless my lords are here in court, I mean legally in court; for no man is in court so as to be liable to be charged with an indictment, or information, that is not brought into court by legal process, or as a prisoner upon a legal commitment: then, my lord, with humble submission, we say, that it doth appear by this return, that my lords the bishops are not here legally in court, because this commitment of theirs was not a legal commitment; and two objections we have to it, the one is, that the persons committing had no authority to commit; for the return says, that it was by virtue of a warrant under the hands of such and such, being lords of the council, and they (we say) have no authority to do this. The other objection is, that the fact for which they were committed, they ought not to have been imprisoned for: the fact charged upon them is in the nature of a bare misdemeanour, and for such a fact it is the right of my lords the bishops (as peers of the realm) that they ought to be served with the usual process of Subpœna, and not to be committed to prison. These are the two objections that we have to this return, and this is, under favour, the proper time for us to make this objection, before the king's counsel can charge my lords the bishops with an information.

L. C. J. What say you to it, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. With submission, my lord, these gentlemen have, out of course, and preposterously, let themselves into this discourse; and, when all is done, we must recur to that which we moved to your lordship before, to desire that your lordship would order the information to be read; and when we call my lords to plead to the information, then will be their proper time to make this objection; for 'tis a strange thing, certainly, for men to make objections before they know what it is they are charged with! They say, the ground of their motion is, because my lords the bishops are here in court upon the return of an Habeas Corpus; and therefore they come in upon a commitment (as they say) for that which they ought not to be committed for at all, and we cannot charge them, unless they be properly in court. Now for that, it is true, if that commitment of theirs were the only thing that was here before the court, then the court would, if that commitment were illegal, discharge them of that; but when a man is present here in court, brought into court, let him come how he will, he is not to have any longer time than that instant to appear to, and be charged with, the information. 'Tis true, upon a Subpœna, which is in the nature of a summons, there a man hath, as it were, an essoin, and may make his excuse, and he shall have time; but when he is present in court, either as a person privileged, as an officer, or as a prisoner, he shall be charged presently; and these gentlemen are not to let themselves into invectives against the commitment, thereby to keep off their being charged with the information. Besides that, it is strange these gentlemen should know the privilege of my lords the bishops as peers, better than all the lords of the council, who are most of them themselves peers; and they that make the objection should have considered, whether these lords that made the commitment, did not think themselves concerned in all the privileges of peerage, as well as these seven noble lords!

Sir R. Sawyer. Is this an answer to our objection, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. I say, it is a strange objection; and I answer, it is out of due time: for this we say, that my lords the bishops, being now here in court as prisoners upon a commitment, and we desiring to charge them with an information, you are not to examine the matter of their commitment, and therefore I do insist upon it, that the information should be read, and then you will consider, whether they are not bound to plead to it.

Mr. Finch. My lord, I hope Mr. Attorney General will not think legal objections to be invectives.

Att. Gen. Truly I know not what you call legal objections; I do not think yours are so, nor do I think legal objections are invectives; but I used that expression, as very proper for what you urged against the commitment.

L. C. J. Nay, gentlemen, do not quarrel about words.

Mr. Finch. My lord, we would not willingly have words given us to quarrel at.

Sol. Gen. My lord, the question is, Whether we are in the right method of practice, as to the course of the court; or they? It may be, these gentlemen think to make us angry, and take advantage of our being in a passion.

Mr. Finch. Mr. Solicitor, we desire to have our objections answered.

Sol. Gen. Nay, if you begin to be angry, gentlemen, we can be angry too.

L. C. J. I would have neither of you be angry.

Sol. Gen. It seems they would have an answer to their objections, but will not suffer us to give it; they would first examine, whether my lords the bishops have been duly committed? That, we say, is not to be done by the court as yet: your lordship sees they are actually in custody, by a commitment of the lords of the council; that appears by the return before your lordship, and for what they were committed. What do we now pray for the king? First, we move for a Habeas Corpus, then that this information may be read, and all is in order to bring this fact, for which they were committed, to a trial. It is said upon the return, they were sent to the Tower, for contriving, writing, and publishing a seditious libel against the king's person and government, which, I think, is crime enough for a man to deserve to be committed for: they would have you to discharge these lords from this commitment (the return, as they say, being not legal) and that before the information be read: but we think their motion is irregular; for here is a crime charged in the commitment, and upon that commitment they are here now as criminals before your lordship; and Mr. Attorney has exhibited an information for the king, which is in the nature of a declaration at the king's suit; and that in this court, which is the supreme court now in being for the trial of matters of this nature. We will come to that question, whether they were legally committed, when there is a proper time for it. But now we find my lords the bishops in court, upon a commitment for a great crime: I repeat it again; it is for contriving, writing, and publishing a seditious libel against the king's government; and whether the king's counsel shall not have leave to make out this charge by an information, sure, can be no question at all in this court. I hear them mention the statute of Edward the third; but that is not at all to the purpose; that is but what was offered in another case that may be remembered,* and offered by way of plea, and pressed with a great deal of earnestness, but rejected by the court; and now what could not be received then by way of plea, these gentlemen would, by their importunity, have you receive by parole at the bar. I suppose the design is to entertain this great auditory with an harangue, and to persuade the weak men of the world (for the wise are not to be imposed upon) that they are in the right, and we in the wrong. Under favour, my lord, we are in the right for the king; we desire this information may be read, and let them plead what by law they can to it, according to the course of the court: but that which they now urge, is untimely and out of course.

Sir R. Sawyer. My lord, we offer this to your lordship—

Att. Gen. Why, gentlemen, you have been heard before your time already.

Serj. Pemberton. Pray, my lord, give us leave to answer what the king's counsel have objected.

L. C. J. The king's counsel have answered your objections, and we must not permit vying and re-vying upon one another: if you have no more to say, but only as to the matters that have been urged, you have been heard to it on both sides already.

Serj. Pemberton. I would, if you please, answer what has been objected by the king's counsel, and state the case aright.

Justice Allybone. Brother Pemberton, I do not apprehend that the objection you make against this commitment has any weight in it. The objection (as I take it) is this, that these lords were not legally committed, because they were committed (says the return) by such and such lords of the council particularly named; and it does not specify them to be united in the privy council: now truly, with me, that seems to have no weight at all; and I will tell you why: If my lord chief justice do commit any person, and set his name to the warrant, he does not use to add to his name lord chief justice, but he is known to be so, without that addition. And would you have a different return from the lieutenant of the Tower to a Habeas Corpus, than the warrant itself will justify? The lords do not use to write themselves privy-counsellors; they are known to be so, as well as a judge, who only writes his name and does not use to make the addition of his office.*

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray, my lord, give me leave to be heard to this; I think truly it is a weighty objection; for, under favour, we say, it must upon the return here appear, that they were legally committed, before you can charge them with an information. I do not take exceptions to the warrant, because it is subscribed by such lords, and they do not write themselves lords of the council; they need not do that: and the return has averred that they are so; but the return ought to have been, that it was by the order of the privy-council, and so it must be, if they would shew my lords to be legally committed, that they were committed by order of the privy council, and not by such and such particular persons, lords of the privy-council. So in the case put by Mr. Justice Allybone, of a commitment by your lordship or any of the judges, it must be returned to be by such a warrant, by such a one Chief Justice, for that shews the authority of the person committing, and then your lordship's name to it, indeed, is enough, without the addition: but if it does not appear by the return, that there was sufficient authority in the person to commit, your lordship cannot take it to be a legal commitment. But now in this case they could have no authority to commit but in council; and this return seems to make it done by them as particular persons, and that is not a good return, with your lordship's favour, upon which these reverend and noble lords can be detained in prison. But what do they on the other side say to this? Why, we shall be heard to it anon: But, my lord, they very well know, it would be too late for that effect which we desire of our motion, and therefore we lay the objections now before you in its proper time: (say we) you ought not to read any information against us, because we are not legally here before the court; and sure, that which was said by the king's council, that your lordship may charge any one that you find here in court, which way soever he comes in, cannot be legal.

Att. Gen. Who ever said so?

Sir R. Sawyer. I apprehend you said so, Mr. Attorney, or else you said nothing.

* In Mr. Sidney's Case. See it in this Collection, vol. 9, p. 817.

* See the Case of Seizure of Papers, A. D. 1765.

Att. Gen. Sir Robert Sawyer, you of that side have a way of letting yourselves in to say the same things over again, and of making us to say what you please.

Sir R. Sawyer. Truly I did apprehend you laid down that for doctrine, which I thought a very strange one: for we say, with your lordship's favour, he that is in court without legal process, is not in court so as to be charged with an information.

Serj. Pemberton. My lord, it is not the body being found here that intitles the court to proceed upon it, but the person accused is to be brought in by legal process: Then if we be not here by legal process, the information cannot be charged upon us; and if we suffer it to be read, it will be too late for us to make this objection.

L. C. J. That you have all said over and over, and they have given it an answer.

Att. Gen. Pray, Mr. Serjeant, will you make an end? You have repeated your objection over and over, I know not how often, and will never be contented with our answer,

Just. Allybone. Sir Robert Sawyer, that which you said in answer to the case I put, methinks does not answer it: for if the return be as good, that it was by a warrant from such an one, lord chief justice, as if my lord chief justice had added the title of his office to his own name, when he subscribed the warrant; then this return, That this was done by such and such lords of the council, must be as good as if they had added that to their own names.

Sir R. Sawyer. That is not our objection.

Att. Gen. Your objection has been heard, and answered; we pray the information may be read.

Serj. Pemberton. No, we are not come to that yet.

Just. Allybone. Pray, would you have an averment by the lieutenant of the Tower, in his return to an Habeas Corpus, that it was done by them in the council-chamber?

Mr. Finch. My lord, the difference is this, with submission; a commitment by sir Robert Wright, chief justice, is a good commitment, and a return of that nature were a good return, because he is chief justice all over England, and hath authority to commit wherever he is; but a commitment by such an one, or such and such lords of the privy council, cannot be a return of a commitment; because, though they be lords of the council, yet neither single or apart, nor all together, have authority to do such an act, unless they be assembled in the privy council: there their authority is circumscribed; so that that must needs be a great difference between a commitment made by a judge who is always so, and a commitment made by a lord, or so many lords, by the name of lords of the privy council, who carry not their authority about with them, but are limited to their assembly in council.

Just. Allybone. Mr. Finch, indeed your objection is worth something, if my lord chief justice could not act but as under the character of chief justice; for you are now arguing, that these lords could not do this act, but as lords of the council in council: the same (say I) may be said of a commitment by the lord chief justice; he cannot do it but under the formality of his authority, as he is chief justice, unless you will make it impossible for him to do any thing but as chief justice; or unless you make it impossible to separate his person from his authority.

Mr. Finch. Sir, the difference lies here; the authority of the one is general and universal, and goeth with him wherever he goes; the other's authority is limited to a particular sphere.

Just. Allybone. Why, would you have it averred, that they did it being assembled in council?

Mr. Finch. Under favour, they cannot justify any thing that was done by them as lords of the council, but in the privy council.

Just. Powell. Truly, my lord, for my part, I think there is no such great necessity of haste in this matter: here are exceptions taken to this return; and the matter transacted now before us, appears to me to be of very great weight; peradventure a greater or weightier has not been agitated in this place in any age: it concerns these noble and reverend lords in point of liberty: it comes suddenly upon us, and therefore my lord, I think it very fit we should consider a little of this matter, and consult the precedents of returns, how they are; for there are multitudes of returns of writs of Habeas Corpus in this court; therefore it were requisite, that we did consult the forms of other returns, and how the precedents, as to this matter, have always been: if they are according as this is, then all is well; but if they be otherwise, it is fit we should keep to the usual forms.

L. C. J. What's your opinion of it, brother Allybone?

Just. Allybone. I am still of the same mind I was, my lord, That he could make no return but this return he has made; and if his warrant was insufficient upon this account, that these particular persons, lords of the privy-council, did this act without saying, that they did it in privy-council; then it is not his return that could mend it; and truly I do not know that there does need any precedent for this; for every one knows where the lords of the council are; and it is a sufficient averment, this that is in the return.

Mr. Pollexfen. They are lords of the council every where; but they do not act as lords of the council any where but in council.

Just. Allybone. So my lord chief justice is chief justice every where.

Mr. Finch. And he can do judicial acts, as such, every where; but the lords of the council cannot act but in the council.

Just. Allybone. Nor is it to be presumed that they do it.

Mr. Finch. It is not a presumption that is to make any thing in this case, but the question is, whether there be a legal return of a legal commitment?

Just. Allybone. Such public persons, in such public acts, can never be presumed to act in their separate private capacities.

Mr. Finch. But with submission, your lordships can judge only what is before you in this return, whether it be a good return, and whether here be a good authority asserted in the persons that did commit my lords the bishops?

L. C. J. Truly, as to this objection and exception that has been made by them, I have considered of it, and what has been said on all sides, and I think it is the usual way of commitment; I never saw any other; all the warrants that ever I saw, are of this form; if there were any precedents they should be shewn of that side.

Sir R. Sawyer. There are multitude of precedents otherwise, and none of this form.

L. C. J. I confess it is a case of great weight, and the persons concerned are of great honour and value; and I would be as willing as any body to testify my respects and regards to my lords the bishops, if I could see any thing in it worth considering of.

Sol. Gen. There's no colour for it, if they do but look upon the statute of the 16th and 17th of the late king, which arraigns the proceedings of his privy-council: That tells you what things belong to the cognizance of the privy-council, and what not; and there you have all the distinctions about commitments by the king and council, and by the lords of the council: and that act will shew, that this is a commitment according to the usual form. They know very well what the common stile of the orders and commitments of council is, as in other places and other commitments. By such an one, chief justice, that is the stile that is very well known for such warrants: so a commitment by such and such, naming them particularly, lords of the council, that's an order made by the lords in council; and that statute distinguishes between commitments of one sort and the other; and it does it, because sometimes warrants run in one form, and sometimes in another; but they all come within the direction of that statute. My lord, we are in a plain case, my lords the bishops come regularly before you, upon a commitment by the council; and therefore we pray they may be charged with this information.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray, will your lordship give us leave to have that statute looked into, which Mr. Solicitor speaks of; and then we shall see whether it be to his purpose.

L. C. J. Let the statute be read.

Sol. Gen. If it be Keeble's book, it is the 16th of Charles the first; if it be the old book, it is the 16th and 17th of Car. towards the end.

Clerk reads. 'Provided always, and be it enacted, that this act, and the several clauses therein contained, shall be taken and expounded to extend only to the court of star-chamber; and to the said court holden before the president and council in the marches of Wales, and before the president and council in the northern parts.

Sol. Gen. It is the paragraph before that.

Clerk reads. 'And be it also provided and enacted, that if any person shall hereafter be committed, restrained of his liberty, or suffer imprisonment, by the order and decree of any such court of Star-chamber, or other court aforesaid, now, or at any time hereafter, having, or pretending to have the same, or like jurisdiction, power, or authority to commit, or imprison, as aforesaid; or by the command or warrant of the king's majesty, his heirs or successors, in their own persons; or by the command or warrant of the council board, or of any of the lords, or others of his majesty's privy council, that in every such case, every person so committed, restrained of his liberty, or suffering imprisonment, upon demand——'

Sol. Gen. That is all: your lordship sees these several distinctions of the stile of commitment.*

Att. Gen. Now, pray favour us a little. My lord, I think these gentlemen will not deny, but that the lords of the council can commit. I must confess, they ask that which was pretty reasonable, if the case was as they would make it. They would have my lords the bishops discharged, because there is not a return of a good commitment, and that stands upon this presumption, that what is here said to be done by all these lords, at the end of whose names this is added, 'lords of the privy council,' was done by them out of council, which, I suppose, your lordship will not presume, but will take it, that they did this as lords of the council in council; and no man can say, but the lords in council can commit.

Sol. Gen. You may as well presume upon a warrant made by my lord chief justice, because it is not said where he did it, and therefore he did it in Scotland.

Att. Gen. I say again, unless your lordship will presume that which is not to be presumed, this must needs be a very good return.

Just. Allybone. Truly (as Mr. Solicitor says) you may as well desire us to presume that my lord chief justice would commit a man in Ireland or Scotland; I can see no imaginable difference.

Mr. Finch. My lord, that which we pray, is, not that your lordship would presume, but that you would not presume, but take the return as it is before you; and then see whether it can be thought to be a commitment by the lords in council?

Serj. Pemberton. Pray, my lord, spare us a

* In sir William Williams's copy it appears to have been at first written as it is printed in the text, and to have been afterwards corrected as follows: "Your lordship hath the several styles of commitments by the council board, mentioned in that statute, wherein you have a commitment in the stile of this commitment."

ing and legal understanding are two things, and we pray the judgment of the court.

Sol. Gen. And so do we, my lord, and pray your rule in it.

Just. Allybone. You may by the same reason say, that upon all commitments by warrant from justices of the peace, that the commitment was out of the county, if the party does not alledge in the warrant, or return, that the commitment was in the county. It is an objection that would put us upon presuming what we have no reason to presume.

L. C. J. If you would have our opinions, let my brothers declare theirs, I will soon tell you my mind.

Just. Holloway. Pray let the return be read again. [Which was done.]

Att. Gen. So that the return says, they were committed by virtue of a warrant of such and such by name, lords of the council, and whether this be a warrant of the council is the question; and we think it is plain enough, that it is a good return.

Just. Powell. I have given you my thoughts already: I think we ought to consult precedents in a case of this weight and nature; and truly I will not take upon me to say, whether it be a good return or not a good return, without looking into precedents.

Just. Allybone. For my own part, it does not stick at all with me, for the reasons I gave before. When any man that has an authority to commit, does commit a person to an inferior officer, and that officer has an Habeas Corpus brought to him, it is enough for him to return his warrant, by which the party was committed, and whatsoever he says by the bye, cannot have any influence, one way or other, to alter the nature of the thing. Now unless you would make every man that is a justice of the peace, to write his name, and stile himself justice of the peace, this must be a good commitment. Every commitment shall be presumed to be pursuant to the power of the person committing; and I am sure, take these lords separately, and they had no power to commit, and consequently such a warrant would be no authority to the lieutenant of the Tower to receive them: but when they send such a warrant as this, we shall presume it to be according to the power they have, and not according to the power they have not. This warrant is returned by the officer, and I cannot but presume that it is all very well.

Just. Holloway. My lords, I am very desirous and willing your lordships should have all the right and justice done you that can be, and, by the grace of God, I will endeavour it all I can. I see in this case it is agreed on both sides, that the council have a power to commit, and the commitment is here certified in the words of the warrant, and the lieutenant has made his return, that they were committed by virtue of this warrant. If the lieutenant of the Tower had returned any other commitment, you would have blamed him for a false return; but now you find fault with his return, because he does not say, the warrant was made by the lords of the council, and in council: that is a thing so notoriously known to all the kingdom, that my lords were sent to the Tower by the council, that nobody doubts it; and being thus sent by this warrant, I do not see but that this is a very good return, and my judgment is, that the information ought to be read.

L. C. J. I told you in the beginning, after you had made your objections, that I thought it was as all other returns are; and I am of the same opinion still, I find no fault with the warrant, nor with the return.

Serj. Pemberton. There is no objection to the warrant at present upon this question.

L. C. J. Neither do I take upon me to say any thing, nor is there any thing now to be spoken of touching the fact for which these noble lords were committed.

Att. Gen. We pray, my lord, the information may be read.

Just. Holloway. There is no question about the fact; but whether this be a good return which is here made, that they were committed by such and such lords of the council?

L. C. J. I would do as much to give my lords the bishops ease, and set them at liberty, as I could possibly by law; but we must not break the rules of law for any one.

Sol. Gen. Pray read the information.

Mr. Finch. No, my lord, we oppose the reading of it.

Sol. Gen. Why! ought you not to be satisfied with the opinion of the court?

Mr. Finch. We have another thing to offer, which we must have the opinion of the court in, before this information can be read.

Att. Gen. Pray let us hear what it is?

Mr. Finch. My lord, we did humbly offer one objection more to your lordship against the reading of the information: the former objection was concerning the persons committing, in that it does not sufficiently appear upon the return, that they were committed by the lords in council; the court have given their opinion in that: but the other objection still remains, whether they ought to have been committed at all; and therefore when they now appear upon this Habeas Corpus, we say they were not legally committed to prison, because a peer ought not to be committed to prison in the first instance for misdemeanor.

Sol. Gen. If you please you may speak to that by and by; but that is not proper now for you to offer, or for the court to determine, whether a peer may be committed upon an accusation for a misdemeanor?

Mr. Finch. With submission, that is such a difficulty that lies in the way against the reading of the information, that you must get over it, before you can come at the reading of it.

Att. Gen. You will have your time for all this matter by and by; but certainly you cannot be admitted to it yet.

L. C. J. Truly I think you are too early with that exception.

Mr. Finch. With submission, we think this is the proper time, and I will tell your lordship the reason why.

L. C. J. Mr. Finch, certainly every thing in the world that can be said, you will say for clients, and you shall be heard; for we are very willing to deliver these noble lords, if we can by law, and if the exceptions you make be legal.

Mr. Finch. My lord, we do not doubt your justice; and therefore we desire to offer what we have to say in this point: the only question (now it seems) is about our time of making our exception. Mr. Attorney (we apprehend) did say one thing which was certainly a little too large; that however any man comes into court, if the court find him here, they may charge with an information.

Att. Gen. Who says so? I said no such thing.

Mr. Finch. Then I acquit Mr. Attorney of it, he did not say so: then both he and I agree the law to be, that a man does not come into court, if he does not come in by legal process, he is not to be charged with an information; then, since we do agree in that proposition, certainly we must be heard to this point, whether we are here upon legal process, before you can charge us with this information?

Att. Gen. You think you have said a fine thing now, and take upon you an authority to make me agree to what you please.

Mr. Finch. Certainly the consequence is plain upon your own premises.

Att. Gen. Do you undertake to speak for me?

Mr. Finch. I am in the judgment of the court, and to them I leave it.

Att. Gen. I know you thought you had got an extraordinary advantage, by making me say what you please; but there has been very little said, but what has been grounded upon mistakes all along. This is that I do say, if a man comes in voluntarily upon any recognition, though he be not in custody; or if he comes in upon any process, if the court find him here, though that process be not for the thing charged in the information, yet the court is so much in possession of the person, that he shall plead to any information; and that I do say, and will stand by.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we are here in an extraordinary auditory, and this court is always a very great court, (but here is a greater and more noble assembly than usually we have) and these gentlemen to shew their eloquence and oratory, would, by converting propositions otherwise than they are delivered, put another construction upon them, than they do reasonably bear, and so draw strange inferences from them. But those arts, we are sure, will not prevail in this auditory; we say plainly, and the law is so (let them apprehend as they please) that your lordship cannot exhibit an information against any man that you find accidentally here in court. Then, says Mr. Finch, we are agreed: But withal (say I) take my other propositions; If a person be brought into court by legal process, or upon any contempt whatsoever, by an attachment or warrant, or upon a Habeas Corpus after a commitment, being thus found in court, your lordship may charge him with an information. When these gentlemen, who are so vehement on the other side did preside here or stood in the places where Mr. Attorney and I now are, I can name them numbers of cases of the like nature with this, when good men and honest subjects have been compelled by them to appear to informations, and plead presently: They are the persons perhaps that made the precedents; they made the law by their authority for aught I know: I am sure I find the court in possession of this as declared law, and therefore I presume to pray the usual course may be followed.

Mr. Finch. Pray, my lord, spare us a word in this matter: I do agree with Mr. Attorney in this matter, but I do not agree with Mr. Solicitor.

Sol. Gen. You do not agree with yourself.

Mr. Finch. I hope I do, and always shall agree with myself; but I do not agree with you, Mr. Solicitor.

Sol. Gen. You do not in 1688, agree with what you said and did in 1680.

Mr. Finch. Says Mr. Attorney, a man that comes voluntarily in cannot be charged with an information; with him I agree. Says Mr. Solicitor, a man that comes in, and is found in court by any process, may be charged with an information: I say no, if the process be wholly illegal; for he cannot be said to be legally in court. Suppose a peer of the realm be taken upon a Capias, and is committed to the Marshalsea, and is brought up upon a Habeas Corpus, I would fain know, whether you could declare against him?

Att. Gen. No, we cannot.

Mr. Finch. And why is that, but because the process is illegal, and he is not truly in court: Then is it a proper time now to make this a question, Whether my lords here were legally committed, before you can lay any thing to their charge by way of information? For if the commitment be illegal, it is a void commitment; and if the commitment be void, the process is void, and then my lords are not legally in court.

L. C. J. That sure is but returning again to the same question that has been determined already.

Sol. Gen. If your lordship will permit them to repeat and reiterate the same things, we shall never have an end.

Mr. Finch. My lord, we pray these gentlemen of the king's counsel may be a little cool with us, and then they will find, we do not talk the same things over and over again, nor meddle with that which the court have given their judgment in.

L. C. J. Well, go on, Sir.

Mr. Finch. My lord, we say it is the privilege of the peers of England, that none of them shall be committed to prison for a misdemeanor, especially in the first instance, and before judgment. This (we say) is the right of my lords the bishops, and that which they claim as lords of parliament. Now it appears upon this return and the warrant, that the council-table hath committed them (for your lordship and the court hath ruled it, that this commitment must be taken to be by order of the privy council, and we meddle not with that further); but we say that the council-table may commit a man unjustly, that is certain. There has been relief often given in this court against commitments by the council-table: And that they were unjustly committed, depends upon that point of their privilege as peers.

Serj. Pemberton. My lord, we say, that the lords of the council have illegally committed these noble persons, who are peers of the realm, and ought to have the privilege of their peerage, which is not to be committed for a misdemeanor; that the council ought not to have done: For the peers of England ought no more to be committed for a misdemeanor, and to be imprisoned, especially upon the first process, than they may be in a case of debt. It is true, in the case of treason, felony, or the breach of the peace, the peers have not such a privilege; they may be committed: But for a misdemeanor (as this does appear to be in the warrant of commitment) they ought not to be committed. But they were committed by the lords of the council; and we now complain of this to your lordship as illegal, and therefore pray my lords may be discharged.

Sir R. Sawyer. Will your lordship be pleased to favour me a word on the same side, for my lords the bishops. It must be agreed to me, that if a peer be brought into court, as taken by a Capias, he cannot be charged with a declaration: and the reason is, because the process is illegal: Then, my lord, with submission, when a peer comes upon a foreign commitment, and is brought in custody upon a Habeas Corpus, this is either in the nature of a process, or a final commitment, as a judgment; they will not say, that this is a good commitment, so as to amount to a judgment; for the council board could not give a judgment in the case; besides, the commitment is illegal, because it is not a commitment till they find security to answer an information here, but it is a warrant to keep them for a misdemeanor: Besides, there is another thing we have to say to this warrant (for I am making objections against the validity of this commitment), it does not appear that there was any oath made, and therefore the court must adjudge that there was no oath made, and then no men ought without oath to be committed, much less a peer. But that which we chiefly rely upon is, That my lords ought not to have been committed for this, which is but a misdemeanor at most: And if they use it as process, to bring my lords the bishops to answer an information, we say, by the law no such process can be taken out against the persons of peers for bare misdemeanors. I do agree, that for felony, treason, or surety of the peace, the persons of peers may be committed; and that which is called surety of the peace in our books, Mr. Solicitor knows very well, in some of the rolls of parliament, is called breach of the peace, but it is all one; and the meaning, in short, is, that it is such a breach of the peace, as for which a man by law may be obliged to find sureties for the peace. If it should mean a breach of the peace by implication, as all trespasses and misdemeanors are said to be contra Pacem in the indictment, or information, then it were a simple thing to enumerate the cases wherein privileges did not lie; for there could be no information whatsoever, but must be contra Pacem, and so there could be no such thing as privilege at all. And besides, we say, the very course of this court is contrary to what they would have; for in the case of a peer, for a misdemeanor, you go first by summons, and then you do not take out a Capias as against a common person, but the next process is a Distringas, and so ad infinitum. And I do appeal to them on the other side, and challenge them to shew any one precedent, when a peer was brought thus into court, to be charged with an information, without it were in the case of an apparent breach of the peace; for he must be charged in custody, and there must be a Committitur to the marshal, to entitle the court to proceed. Your lordship will find but very few precedents of cases of this nature about common persons; for till within these fourteen or fifteen years there was no such thing ever done against a common person: But this was the rule; First there went out a Subpœna, and then an attachment, and when the party was taken upon the attachment, he is taken to come in upon process, and then the court would charge him presently: but if he did appear upon the summons, they would not charge him, but he had time to take a copy of the information, and an imparlance of course, till the next term, before he could be compelled to plead. But in the case of a peer, there never was any such precedent as the attaching his person, but only a summons and distress: And I would be glad the king's counsel would shew, that ever there was any such process taken out against the person of a peer, for a meer misdemeanor. My lord, it is plain, what breach of the peace means in every information; and I only speak this to acquaint the court how the constant proceedings in all these cases have been. These informations were anciently more frequent in the star chamber; and what was the process there? Not the common process of a Subpœna, that was not the course there; but the process was a letter from the chancellor; that if the party upon that letter did not appear, in a common case, there went out an attachment; but in a peer's case, never: And so it appears by Crompton's Jurisdiction of Courts, Tit. Star Chamber 35. This appears likewise by the proceedings in chancery against the peers, till the queen's time. They did not so much as take out an attachment after default upon a Subpœna, but they would then, in the queen's time, be so bold as to take out an attachment against a lord for not appearing; but that course was condemned as illegal; so we find in my lord Dyer.

Att. Gen. That was at a common person's suit.

Sir R. Sawyer. But the proceedings in the star chamber were at the king's suit, and I am sure Mr. Solicitor knows, that the peers privileges reach to informations; but, as I was saying, it was so adjudged as to the chancery in my lord Cromwell's case, 14 Eliz. Dyer, 315.

L. C. J. You take a great compass, sir Robert Sawyer; but pray remember what you laid down at first, for the ground of your discourse, That there was never any commitment of a peer for a bare misdemeanor: You must keep to that; that is the point you are to look after.

Sir R. Sawyer. My lord, I will so; I do not cite these cases but for this purpose, to shew, that in all courts the peers have particular privileges; and I am sure they can produce you no precedents for any such proceedings against a peer. In my experience of these matters, I never knew any such; nay, I knew it always to be otherwise, that in informations for misdemeanors, there did never issue out a capias against a peer: and Mr. Attorney knows very well, it was so in the late case of my lord Lovelace; for that case of my lord Devonshire,* that it was an express breach of the peace, though it was debated and disputed then; so that I take it, these noble lords cannot be charged with this information, because they do not come in by legal process; and unless they can shew me any cases, where a peer did ever come in upon such a commitment, and answered to an information upon that commitment, it must certainly be allowed not to be the legal course; though if such a precedent could be shewn, that passed sub silentio, without debate or solemn determination, that would not do, nor could bind the rest of the peers. If one man would lose a particular benefit he has, all the whole body must not lose it; and the benefit is not small, of time to make his defence; of imparling, of taking a copy of the indictment, and preparing himself to plead as his case would bear; and indeed a common person has used to have these privileges, though in some cases of late, they have taken the other course; and if a capias went out (which we say cannot go against a lord) and the party were brought in, he was to answer immediately. Now, my lord, I take it, that the privileges of peers is in all times the same with the parliamentary privilege in parliament-time, which reacheth to informations, as well as other actions. My lord Coke is express in this point, in the 4 Instit. 25. If that objection should hold good, that every information being contra pacem, that should be a breach of the peace, then (as I said before) privilege will hold in no information, which is contrary to that and all our other books: it is only such a breach of the peace, as for which security of the peace may be required. But further, that this is a privilege enjoyed by the peers, spiritual as well as temporal, I suppose will not be denied; for I think they will not question, but that the bishops and abbots that were lords of parliament were peers; and we find in our books, when the court has been moved for a capias against an abbot, if he were a mitred abbot, and sat in the Lords' House, it was always said, that no such process ought to go; and so it is in the case of bishops: but indeed for other noblemen, the difference is this: where it does not appear upon record, that they are lords in parliament, there the courts have put them to bring their writs of privilege; but where it does appear upon record, that they are peers, the court is to allow and take notice of their privilege; and there needs no such writ. Now that the parliament privilege, and the privilege of peers (as to their persons) is the same, appears by the form of the writ in the register, fol. 287, Fitz. Herb. Nat. Brev. 247. The words of the writ are these, That if such a one be sued at the suit of another, the writ commands, that a peer out of parliament-time should have the same privilege with those summoned by the king to the parliament; and I know not any difference that can be put between them; and it cannot be denied, that all informations whatsoever, unless such as are for breaches of the peace, for which surety of the peace may be required, are under the controul of the parliament privilege: so that upon these grounds, I do press that my lords the bishops may be discharged. If there be any information against us, we are ready to enter our appearance, to answer it according to the course of the court: but if the information be for no other thing than what is contained in the warrant of commitment, then their persons ought to be privileged from commitment.

Mr. Pollexfen. If your lordship please to take it altogether, you will find it a case very well worth your consideration, it being the case of all the peerage of England.

Att. Gen. My lord, these gentlemen have taken a great deal of liberty, and spent much of your time in making long arguments, and after all, truly, I do not know where to have them, nor can understand what they would be at. It seems they agree, that for treason, felony, and breach of the peace, a peer may be committed.

L. C. J. That is, say they, such a breach of the peace, as for which surety of the peace may be required.

Att. Gen. Then all the learning they have been pleased to favour us with is at an end; for if here be any thing charged upon the bishops, for which sureties of the peace may be required, then this is a good commitment.

* See vol. 11, p. 1354, of this Collection.

L. C. J. That they must agree upon their own arguments.

Att. Gen. Can then any man in the world say, that a libel does not require sureties of the peace? For we must now take it as it is here upon this return. How my lords the bishops will clear themselves of it, is a question for another time; but the warrant says, they were committed for contriving, framing, and publishing a seditious libel against his majesty and his government: is there a greater misdemeanor? or is there any thing on this side a capital crime that is a greater offence? is there any thing that does so tread upon the heels of a capital offence, and comes so near the greatest of crimes that can be committed against the government? not to enlarge at this time upon what the consequences of such things may be; is there a greater breach of the peace than such seditious practices? no doubt, any man may be committed for it, and may be bound to find sureties for his good behaviour.

Sir R. Sawyer. I say sureties of the peace, not of the good behaviour.

Sol. Gen.* Pray my lord, would you consi-

* Of this Argument of sir William Williams (including what follows the interruption by the bishop of Peterborough) in his MS. alterations are made in almost every sentence. The following is its altered state:

Mr. Sol. Gen. Pray, my lord, will you consider where we are, and where we are going; these gentlemen are out of the way and would have us follow them. We are now upon a single question as this case stands before your lordship upon the Habeas Corpus and return. Here is a supposed libel said to be contrived, made, and published against the king and his government by my lords the bishops. This is the accusation; I hope they are innocent and will prove themselves so. But suppose it be true that they have made a seditious libel against the king and government, will any man say that this is not done vi et armis in construction of law? And all the informations that were exhibited by sir Robert Sawyer when he was attorney general, and he exhibited a great many for libels against the king and the government, are alleged to be vi et armis et contra pacem.

Bp. of Peterborough. Was it so in your own case, Mr. Solicitor?

Mr. Sol. Gen. Yes, it was so in my case; and you are one of them that prosecuted me for aught I know, such kind of prosecution being preached to the people. But so my lord it was in many other cases within time of memory. The counsel for my lords the bishops admit a peer may be imprisoned for treason, felony, or breach of the peace, but that breach of the peace they say is where the law requires sureties of the peace; but is there any certainty where sureties of the peace shall be required, and where not? Then I would put this case: These lords have contrived and published a seditious libel against the king and his der where we are; we are going towards France, I think, or some farther country: they have set us out to sea, and I do not see after this rate, when we shall come to land. Certainly, these gentlemen are mightily out of the way, and would fain have us so too! we are here upon a single question, as this case stands before your lordship, upon the return. Here is a libel, a seditious libel, said to be contrived, government, whether this be not such a breach of the peace as will require sureties of the peace? This is the question before the court, and the law plainly appears to be so in sir Baptist Hicks's Case in Hobart, fol. 215. A man writes a private letter, and delivers it closed and sealed up into the hands of sir Baptist Hicks privately, wherein were contained some reproachful reflexions upon sir B. H. although no fighting, this was sentenced a libel and breach of the peace in the Star-chamber, because such letters incite and stir up to fighting, which may occasion bloodshed; and I think there cannot be a greater breach of the peace than for a man to come to the king's face and publish a libel against him; and yet, according to their assertion, this man shall go away, and you shall not take him up but take a subpoena against him, and wait upon the delays of all the ordinary process of the court in common cases; and they tell you another thing, that a Capias does not lie upon an information for misdemeanor against the person of a peer, and that there is no precedent of any such thing; but I would pray them to remember the Case of my lord Lovelace, in the first year of this king's reign, in this court, for breaking a footman's head upon a public affront given him by the footman. His lordship was bound in recognizance to appear in this court the first day of the then next term, and upon his appearance was charged with an information for the misdemeanor without any process; and as to that precedent I think sir Robert Sawyer and Mr. Finch will not contradict me. There was likewise the late earl of Pembroke's Case, who in a disorderly house occasioned the flight of some disorderly persons for fear. Upon a motion in this court in the last king's reign, an attachment was awarded against him for this supposed misdemeanor. My lord, we have gone out of the way too much already, and these gentlemen would lead us further, if the court will endure it, but I hope your lordship will reduce us to the methods of proceedings in this court in matters of this nature. Here is an information which we desire may be read; if they have any thing to plead to it, their time for that will come after it is read. If they think they have been illegally imprisoned, it appears plainly upon the face of this return who they were that did commit them. Here are a great many noble lords to answer an accusation of false imprisonment or otherwise. If my lords the bishops will think fit to question them, these learned gentlemen are very able to advise them what they should do in it.

made and published against the king and his government, by these noble lords the prisoners. This is the accusation; suppose this be true, that is to be proved hereafter; I hope they are innocent, and will prove themselves so: but suppose it to be true, that they have made a seditious libel against the king and his government, will any man say, that this is not done 'vi et armis?' this is a libel with a witness; nay, two or three degrees more will carry it to high treason, and all the informations that were exhibited by sir Robert Sawyer, when he was Attorney General (and he exhibited a great many for libels,) constantly these words were in, 'vi et armis et contra pacem.'

Bishop of Peterborough. Was it so in your own case, Mr. Solicitor?

Sol. Gen. Yes, it was so in my own case, and you were one of them that prosecuted me, for aught I know; or if you did not prosecute me, you preached against me; or if you did not, some of your tribe did: but so, my lord, it was in many other cases, within time of memory. Sir Robert Sawyer has passed a compliment upon me, of my great skill in parliament matters; but truly there needs no great skill in matters where the law is so plain. A peer they agree may be in prison for treason, felony, or breach of the peace; but that breach of the peace, say they, is where the law requires sureties of the peace: but is there any certainty where sureties of the peace shall be required, and where not? then I would put this case; these lords have contrived and published a seditious libel against the king and his government; and whether this be not such a breach of the peace, as will require sureties of the peace, is the question before you.* And it plainly appears to be so, in sir Baptist Hicks's case, in Hobart, 215. [See, too, Poph. 139, and 1 Keb. 676, 1 P. Wms. 17.] If a man write a private letter provoking another to fight, although there be no fighting, this is a breach of the peace. Now a letter can do no wrong in that kind, but as it incites and stirs up to fighting, which may occasion bloodshed; and I think there cannot be a greater breach of the peace, than for a man to come to the king's face, and publish a libel against him, and yet, according to their doctrine, this man shall go away, and you shall not take him up, but take a subpœna against him, and wait for the delay of all the ordinary process; and they tell you another thing, that a capias does not lie upon an information against the person of a peer, and that there is no precedent of any such thing; but I would pray them to remember the case of my lord Lovelace, about some three years ago, for breaking a footman's head.† It seems, if a man libels the king in his own presence, that is not so great a matter as a little correction to an insolent footman; but there he was bound in a recognizance to appear there in this court, and accordingly he did appear, and was charged with an information; and as to that precedent, I do believe sir Robert Sawyer and Mr. Finch won't contradict me. This was in the first year of this king. There was likewise my lord of Pembroke's case, who* went to a disorderly house, and there frightened some people: we moved the court, and had an attachment against him for a misdemeanor, and he was glad to compound the thing, or it had not ended so soon as it did; and yet if a lord comes to the king's person, and affronts him to his very face, will not an attachment lie against him for it? certainly it will. My lord, we have gone out of the way too much already, and these gentlemen will lead us farther; but we hope your lordships will reduce us to the methods of the law. Here is an information which we desire may be read; if they have any thing to plead to it, their time for that will come after it is read: if they think they have been illegally imprisoned, it appears plainly upon this return, who they were that did commit them. Here are a great many noble lords to answer an action of false imprisonment, if these lords think fit, and may have these learned gentlemen, that are very well able to advise them what they should do in it.

* As to this point, see in this Collection the Case of John Wilkes, esq. A. D. 1763.

† Lord Lovelace had beaten his footman, who obtained a warrant, which lord Lovelace refused to obey: To this alludes the following clause in the prince of Orange's Declaration of October the 10th, 1688; "Those evil counsel-

Sir R. Sawyer. We pray your lordship's judgment, whether the cases put by Mr. Solicitor are like our case?

Sol. Gen. They are as like, as sir Robert Sawyer is to Mr. Attorney that was.

Sir R. Sawyer. Those cases are of apparent breaches of the peace; so likewise was my lord of Devonshire's Case; but certainly that was not at all like this.

Mr. Finch. With your lordship's favour, I would add but one word, and I would repeat nothing of what has been said: All that I shall say is this; There is a great deal of difference between an actual breach of the peace, and that which in the bare form of an information is a breach of the peace, by construction of law, it being contra Pacem. Suppose it be laid that lors have also treated a peer of the realm as a criminal, only because he said, that the subjects were not bound to obey the orders of a Popish justice of peace; though it is evident, that they being by law rendered incapable of all such trust, no regard is due to their orders: this being the security which the people have by the law for their lives, liberties, honours and estates, that they are not to be subjected to the arbitrary proceedings of Papists, that are, contrary to law, put into any employments civil or military." See 1 Ralph, 1025.

* Perhaps the same who was tried for murder, in the year 1678. See the Case in this Collection, vol. 6, p. 1309. In a note to that Case, mention is made of other outrages committed by lord Pembroke.

a man did vi et armis speak words, will that make the words a breach of the peace?

Sol. Gen. It must be vi et armis, and certainly is a breach of the peace; if the words be alleged to be scandalous against the king's government.

Mr. Finch. If a man write a petition, are the pen and ink that he uses the arms?

Sol. Gen. My lord, I hope, Mr. Finch remembers what I heard him say in Algernon Sidney's Case, 'scribere est agere.' Were the pen and ink the agents in that case: Mr. Sidney was the patient we know.

Mr. Finch. I think it is so, Mr. Solicitor, but every action is not a breach of the peace.

L. C. J. Well, let my brothers deliver their opinions, I will give you mine.

Just. Allynbone. The single question now is, Whether or no that which Mr. Solicitor was pleased to name as the crime, and lay it to the charge of my lords the bishops, that is, a seditious libel, be a breach of the peace? I do confess that there is little of argument to be drawn from forms of indictments; and I shall put no great stress upon the words, Vi et Armis, where the fact will not come near it; but if a commitment may ensue (as they seem to agree) where ever surety of the peace may be required, nothing seems more important to me, than that surety of the peace should be required, where there is any thing of sedition in the case; and wherever there is a seditious act, I cannot tell how to make any other construction of it, but that it is an actual breach of the peace; that is my opinion.

Just. Powell. I am of the same opinion in this point too, as I was in the other point before: it was a matter of great consequence, I thought, upon the former point, but now it appears to me, to be of far greater consequence than it did at first; for here, all the great, high, and noble Peers of England are concerned in it, as to their privilege. Our predecessors in this court heretofore would not determine the privileges of the peers, but left them to themselves to make what judgment they pleased of them. I think truly it is a thing of that weight, that it may be very fit for the court to take time to consider of it, and I declare, for my own part, I will not take upon me to deliver any opinion in a matter of this consequence, before I have consulted all the books that can give me any light in the case.

Just. Allynbone. Brother Powell, I am not determining, limiting, or cramping the privilege of peers, but I am only considering whether or no a seditious libel be a breach of the peace. It is agreed to be on all hands a breach of the peace. Is there any thing that will require sureties of the peace to be given upon the doing of it? For there sir Robert Sawyer has laid the foundation of his distinction, and if that shall draw any person under a commitment, then, say I, in my judgment, wherever there is a seditious libel, there is that which is an actual breach of the peace; for I am sure there is that which is sufficient to require sureties of the peace. I controvert not the right of the peers one way or other, but only declare my opinion, that this is a fact that comes within the rule laid down by them, that what will require sureties of the peace, is a breach of the peace.

Just. Holloway. God forbid that in a case of this nature, any one shall take upon him here to say that every misdemeanor were a breach of the peace: I say not so; but certainly there are some such misdemeanors as are breaches of the peace; and if here be such a misdemeanor before us, then it is acknowledged, that even in parliament-time, a privileged person might be committed for it: For in treason, felony, and breach of the peace, privilege does not hold. I will not take upon me, as my brother said, to determine concerning the privilege of the peers, it is not of our cognizance, nor have we any thing to do, either to enlarge or confine privilege, nor do we determine whether this be such a libel as is charged in the information, that will come in question another time; but certainly as this case is, the information ought to be read, and my lords ought to appear and plead to it.

L. C. J. Certainly we are all of us here as tender of the privileges of the peers as any in the world can be, and as tender as we would be, and ought to be in trying any man's right: It becomes us to do it with great respect and regard to my lords the bishops; and therefore I would be as careful (if that were the question before me) to consider very well before I give my opinion, as ever I was in my life. But when I see there can come no mischief at all to the privileges of the peers, by what is agreed on all hands, I think I may very justly give my opinion: For here is the question, Whether the fact charged in the warrant be such a misdemeanor as is a breach of the peace? And the words of the warrant (which is now upon the record) being such as have been recited, I cannot but think it is such a misdemeanor as would have required sureties of the peace; and if sureties were not given, a commitment might follow; and therefore I think the information must be read.

Att. Gen. We pray the Clerk may read it.

‘JAMES R.

‘It having pleased Almighty God, not only to bring us to the imperial crowns of these kingdoms through the greatest difficulties, but to preserve us by a more than ordinary providence, upon the throne of our royal ancestors, there is nothing now that we so earnestly desire, as to establish our government on such a foundation as may make our subjects happy, and unite them to us by inclination as well as duty, which we think can be done by no means so effectually, as by granting to them the free exercise of their religion for the time to come, and add that to the perfect enjoyment of their property, which has never been in any case invaded by us since our coming to the crown; which being the two things men value most, shall ever be preserved in these kingdoms during our reign over them, as the truest methods of our peace, and our glory. We cannot but heartily wish, as it will easily be believed, that the people of our dominions were members of the Catholic church, yet we humbly thank Almighty God, it is, and hath long time been our constant sense and opinion (which upon divers occasions we have declared,) that conscience ought not to be constrained, nor people forced in matters of mere religion. It has ever been directly contrary to our inclination, as we think it is to the interest of government, which it destroys by spoiling trade, depopulating countries, and discouraging strangers; and finally, that it never obtained the end for which it was employed. And in this we are the more confirmed by the reflections we have made upon the conduct of the four last reigns. For after all the frequent and pressing endeavours that were used in each of them, to reduce these kingdoms to an exact conformity in religion, it is visible, the success has not answered the design; and that the difficulty is invincible. We therefore, out of our princely care and affection unto all our loving subjects, that they may live at ease and quiet, and for the encrease of trade, and encouragement to strangers, have thought fit, by virtue of our royal prerogative to issue forth this our declaration of indulgence, making no doubt of the concurrence of our two houses of parliament, when we shall think it convenient for them to meet. In the first place, we do declare, that we will protect and maintain our archbishops, bishops, and clergy, and all other our subjects of the church of England, in the free exercise of their religion, as by law established, and in the quiet and full enjoyment of all their possessions, without any molestation or disturbance whatsoever. We do likewise declare, that it is our royal will and pleasure, that from henceforth the execution of all and all manner of penal laws in matters ecclesiastical, for not coming to church, or not receiving the sacrament, or for any other nonconformity to the religion established, or for or by the reason of the exercise of religion in any manner whatsoever, be immediately suspended, and the further execution of the said penal laws, and every of them is hereby suspended. And to the end that by the liberty hereby granted, the peace and security of our government, in the practice thereof, may not be endangered, We have thought fit, and do hereby straightly charge and command all our loving subjects, that as we do freely give them leave to meet and serve God after their own way and manner, be it in private houses, or places purposely hired or built for that use, so that they take special care that nothing be preached or taught amongst them which may any ways tend to alienate the hearts of our people from us or our government, and that their meetings and assemblies be peaceably, openly, and publicly held, and all persons freely admitted to them; and that they do signify and make known to some one or more of the next justices of the peace, what place or places they set apart for those uses. And that all our subjects may enjoy such their religious assemblies with greater assurance and protection, We have thought it requisite, and do hereby command, that no disturbance of any kind be made or given under them, under pain of our displeasure, and to be further proceeded against with the uttermost severity. And forasmuch as we are desirous to have the benefit of the service of all our loving subjects, which by the law of nature is inseparably annexed to, and inherent in our royal person, and that none of our subjects may for the future be under any discouragement or disability (who are otherwise well inclined and fit to serve us) by reason of some oaths or tests that have been usually administered on such occasions, we do hereby further declare, That it is our royal will and pleasure, that the oaths commonly called the oaths of supremacy and allegiance, and also the several tests and declarations mentioned

‘ in the acts of parliament made in the twenty ‘ fifth and thirtieth years of the reign of our ‘ late royal brother king Charles the second,
 ‘ shall not at any time hereafter be required to ‘ be taken, declared, or subscribed by any per‘ son or persons whatsoever, who is, or shall be ‘ employed in any office or place of trust, either ‘ civil or military, under us, or in our govern‘ ment. And we do further declare it to be ‘ our pleasure and intention, from time here‘ after, to grant our loyal dispensations, under ‘ our great seal, to all our loving subjects so to ‘ be employed, who shall not take the said
 ‘ oaths, or subscribe or declare the said tests
 ‘ or declarations in the above-mentioned acts,
 ‘ and every of them. And to the end that all ‘ our loving subjects may receive and enjoy the ‘ full benefit and advantage of our gracious in‘ dulgence hereby intended, and may be ac‘ quitted and discharged from all pains, penal‘ ties, forfeitures and disabilities by them, or any ‘ of them incurred or forfeited, or which they ‘ shall or may at any time hereafter be liable ‘ to, for or by reason of their nonconformity, or ‘ the exercise of their religion, and from all ‘ suits, troubles or disturbances for the same,
 ‘ We do hereby give our free and ample par‘ don unto all nonconformists, recusants, and ‘ other our loving subjects, for all crimes and ‘ things by them committed, or done contrary ‘ to the penal laws formerly made relating to ‘ religion, and the profession or exercise there-
 ‘ of; hereby declaring that this our royal par‘ don and indemnity shall be as good and effec‘ tual to all intents and purposes, as if every in‘ dividual person had been therein particularly ‘ named, or had particular pardons under our ‘ great seal, which we do likewise declare shall ‘ from time to time be granted unto any person ‘ or persons desiring the same, willing and re‘ quiring our judges, justices, and other officers, ‘ to take notice of, and obey our royal will
 ‘ and pleasure herein before declared. And ‘ although the freedom and assurance we have ‘ hereby given in relation to religion and pro‘ perty, might be sufficient to remove from the ‘ minds of our loving subjects all fears and jea‘ lousies in relation to either; yet we have ‘ thought fit further to declare, that we will ‘ maintain them in all their properties and pos‘ sessions, as well of church and abby lands, as ‘ in any other their lands and properties what‘ soever.

JAMES R.

‘ Our conduct has been such in all times, as ‘ ought to have persuaded the world, that we ‘ are firm and constant to our resolutions; yet, ‘ that easy people may not be abused by the ‘ malice of crafty, wicked men, we think fit to ‘ declare, that our intentions are not changed
 ‘ since the 4th of April, 1687, when we issued
 ‘ out our Declaration for liberty of conscience
 ‘ in the following terms:—

His Majesty's gracious Declaration to all his loving subjects for Liberty of Conscience.

JAMES R.

‘ It having pleased Almighty God, not only ‘ to bring us to the imperial crowns of these ‘ kingdoms through the greatest difficulties,
 ‘ but to preserve us by a more than ordinary ‘ Providence upon the throne of our royal ‘ ancestors, there is nothing now that we so ‘ earnestly desire as to establish our govern‘ ment on such a foundation as may make our ‘ subjects happy, and unite them to us by in‘ clination as well as duty; which we think ‘ can be done by no means so effectually, as ‘ by granting to them the free exercise of their ‘ religion for the time to come, and add, that
 ‘ to the perfect enjoyment of their property, ‘ which has never been in any case invaded by ‘ us since our coming to the crown; which ‘ being the two things men value most, shall ‘ ever be preserved in these kingdoms during ‘ our reign over them, as the truest methods
 ‘ of their peace and our glory. We cannot ‘ but heartily wish, as it will easily be be‘ lieved, that the people of our dominions were ‘ members of the Catholic church; yet we ‘ humbly thank Almighty God, it is, and hath ‘ long time been our constant sense and opi‘ nion (which upon divers occasions we have ‘ declared) that conscience ought not to be ‘ constrained, nor people forced in matters of ‘ mere religion. It has ever been directly ‘ contrary to our inclination, as we think it is ‘ to the interest of government, which it ‘ destroys by spoiling trade, depopulating coun‘ tries, and discouraging strangers, and finally,
 ‘ that it never obtained the end for which it
 ‘ was employed. And in this we are the more ‘ confirmed by the reflections we have made ‘ upon the conduct of the four last reigns. For ‘ after all the frequent and pressing endeavours ‘ that were used in each of them, to reduce ‘ these kingdoms to an exact conformity in ‘ religion, it is visible the success has not an‘ swered the design; and that the difficulty is ‘ invincible. We therefore, out of our princely ‘ care and affection unto all our loving sub‘ jects, that they may live at ease and quiet,
 ‘ and for the increase of trade, and encourage‘ ment to strangers, have thought fit, by ‘ virtue of our royal prerogative, to issue forth
 ‘ this our declaration of indulgence, making no ‘ doubt of the concurrence of our two houses.

' of parliament, when we shall think it con' venient for them to meet. In the first place
 ' we do declare, that we will protect and ' maintain our archbishops, bishops, and clergy,
 ' and all other our subjects of the church of ' England, in the free exercise of their religion,
 ' as by law established, and in the quiet and ' full enjoyment of all their possessions, with' out any molestation or disturbance what' soever. We do likewise declare, that it is ' our royal will and pleasure, that from hence' forth the execution of all and all manner of ' penal laws in matters ecclesiastical, for not ' coming to church, or not receiving the sacra' ment, or for any other non-conformity to the ' religion established, or for or by reason of the ' exercise of religion in any manner what' soever, be immediately suspended, and the ' further execution of the said penal laws, and ' every of them is hereby suspended. And to ' the end that by the liberty hereby granted,
 ' the peace and security of our government, in
 ' the practice thereof, may not be endangered,
 ' we have thought fit, and do hereby streightly
 ' charge and command all our loving subjects,
 ' that as we do freely give them leave to meet
 ' and serve God after their own way and ' manner, be it in private houses, or places
 ' purposely hired or built for that use, so that ' they take special care that nothing be ' preached or taught amongst them which ' may any ways tend to alienate the hearts of ' our people from us or our government, and ' that their meetings and assemblies be peace-
 ' ably, openly and publicly held, and all per' sons freely admitted to them; and that they ' do signify and make known to some one or ' more of the next justices of the peace, what ' place or places they set apart for those uses.
 ' And that all our subjects may enjoy such ' their religious assemblies with great as' surance and protection, we have thought it
 ' requisite, and do hereby command, that no
 ' disturbance of any kind be made or given to ' them, under pain of our displeasure, and to ' be further proceeded against with the utmost ' severity. And forasmuch as we are desirous ' to have the benefit of the service of all our ' loving subjects, which by the law of nature is ' inseparably annexed to, and inherent in our ' royal person, and that none of our subjects
 ' may for the future be under any discourage' ment or disability (who are otherwise well in' clined and fit to serve us) by reason of some ' oaths or tests that have been usually ad' ministered on such occasions, we do hereby ' further declare, that it is our royal will and ' pleasure, that the oaths commonly called the ' oaths of supremacy and allegiance, and also
 ' the several tests and declarations mentioned
 ' in the acts of parliament made in the twenty-
 ' fifth and thirtieth years of the reign of our
 ' late royal brother king Charles the second,
 ' shall not at any time hereafter be required to
 ' be taken, declared, or subscribed by any ' person or persons whatsoever, who is or shall ' be employed in any office or place of trust,

' either civil or military, under us, or in our ' government. And we do further declare it ' to be our pleasure and intention, from time to ' time hereafter, to grant our royal dispensa' tions under our great seal, to all our loving ' subjects so to be employed, who shall not ' take the said oaths, or subscribe or declare
 ' the said tests or declarations in the aboye-
 ' mentioned acts, and every of them. And to ' the end that all our loving subjects may re' ceive and enjoy the full benefit and advantage
 ' of our gracious indulgence hereby intended,
 ' and may be acquitted and discharged from all
 ' pains, penalties, forfeitures, and disabilities
 ' by them or any of them incurred or forfeited,
 ' or which they shall or may at any time
 ' hereafter be liable to, for or by reason of ' their nonconformity, or the exercise of their ' religion; and from all suits, troubles or dis' turbances for the same; we do hereby give ' our free and ample pardon unto all non' conformists, recusants, and other our loving ' subjects for all crimes and things by them ' committed or done, contrary to the penal ' laws formerly made relating to religion, and
 ' the profession or exercise thereof; hereby ' declaring, that this our royal pardon and ' indemnity shall be as good and effectual to
 ' all intents and purposes, as if every indi' vidual person had been therein particularly
 ' named, or had particular pardons under our ' great seal, which we do likewise declare
 ' shall from time to time be granted unto any ' person or persons desiring the same; willing ' and requiring our judges, justices, and other ' officers, to take notice of, and obey our ' royal will and pleasure herein-before de' clared. And although the freedom and as' surance we have hereby given in relation to ' religion and property, might be sufficient to ' remove from the minds of our loving subjects
 ' all fears and jealousies in relation to either;
 ' yet we have thought fit further to declare,
 ' that we will maintain them in all their pro' perties and possessions, as well of church and ' abbey lands, as in any other their lands and ' properties whatsoever.

' Given at our Court at Whitehall, the 4th
 ' day of April, 1687, in the third year of ' our reign.'

' Ever since we granted this indulgence, we ' have made it our principal care to see it pre' served without distinction, as we are en' couraged to do daily by multitudes of ad' dresses, and many other assurances we re' ceived from our subjects of all persuasions,
 ' as testimonies of their satisfaction and duty,
 ' the effects of which we doubt not but the ' next parliament will plainly shew; and that ' it will not be in vain that we have resolved to ' use our uttermost endeavours to establish li' berty of conscience on such just and equal ' foundations as will render it unalterable, and ' secure to all people the free exercise of their ' religion for ever; by which future ages may ' reap the benefit of what is so undoubtedly for the general good of the whole kingdom. It is such a security we desire, without the burden and constraint of oaths and tests, which have been unhappily made by some governments, but could never support any. Nor should men be advanced by such means to offices and employments, which ought to be the reward of services, fidelity and merit. We must conclude, that not only good Christians will join in this, but whoever is concerned for the encrease of the wealth and power of the nation. It would perhaps prejudice some of our neighbours, who might lose part of those vast advantages they now enjoy, if liberty of conscience were settled in these kingdoms, which are above all others most capable of improvements, and of commanding the trade of the world. In pursuance of this great work, we have been forced to make many changes both of civil and military offices throughout our dominions, not thinking any ought to be employed in our service, who will not contribute towards the establishing the peace and greatness of their country, which we most earnestly desire, as unbiassed men may see by the whole conduct of our government, and by the condition of our fleet, and of our armies, which, with good management, shall be constantly the same, and greater, if the safety or honour of the nation require it. We recommend these considerations to all our subjects, and that they will reflect on their present ease and happiness, how far above three years, that it hath pleased God to permit us to reign over these kingdoms, we have not appeared to be that prince our enemies would have made the world afraid of; our chief aim having been not to be the oppressor, but the father of our people, of which we can give no better evidence than by conjuring them to lay aside all private animosities, as well as groundless jealousies, and to choose such members of parliament as may do their part to finish what we have begun, for the advantage of the monarchy over which Almighty God hath placed us, being resolved to call a parliament, that shall meet in November next at farthest.

At the court at Whitehall, the 4th of May, 1688. It is this day ordered by his majesty in council, That his majesty's late gracious declaration, bearing date the 27th of April last, be read at the usual time of divine service, upon the 20th and 27th of this month, in all churches and chapels within the cities of London and Westminster, and ten miles thereabout; and upon the 3d and 10th of June next, in all other churches and chapels throughout this kingdom. And it is hereby further ordered, That the right reverend the bishops cause the said declaration to be sent and distributed throughout their several and respective dioceses, to be read accordingly.

licaverunt, et publicari causaverunt; in quo quidem falso, ficto, malitioso, pernicioso et seditioso libello continetur—

‘ The humble Petition of William Archbishop ‘ of Canterbury, and of divers of the suff‘ ragan bishops of that province (now pre‘ sent with him) in behalf of themselves
‘ and others of their absent brethren, and ‘ of the clergy of their respective Dioceses,

‘ Humbly sheweth

‘ That the great averseness they find in ‘ themselves to the distributing and publishing
‘ in all their churches, your majesty’s late de‘ claration for liberty of conscience, proceedeth
‘ neither from any want of duty and obedience ‘ to your majesty : our holy mother, the church ‘ of England, being both in her principles, and
‘ in her constant practice, unquestionably loyal,
‘ and having, to her great honour, been more ‘ than once publicly acknowledged to be so by ‘ your gracious majesty ; nor yet from any ‘ want of due tenderness to dissenters, in rela‘ tion to whom they are willing to come to such ‘ a temper as shall be thought fit, when that ‘ matter shall be considered and settled in par‘ liament and convocation. But among many ‘ other considerations, from this especially, be‘ cause that declaration is founded upon such a ‘ dispensing power, as hath been often declared ‘ illegal in parliament, and particularly in the ‘ years 1662, and 1672, and the beginning of ‘ your majesty’s reign ; and is a matter of so ‘ great moment and consequence to the whole ‘ nation, both in church and state, that your ‘ petitioners cannot in prudence, honour, or ‘ conscience, so far make themselves parties to
‘ it, as the distribution of it all over the nation, ‘ and the solemn publication of it once and ‘ again, even in God’s house, and in the time of ‘ his divine service, must amount to, in com‘ mon and reasonable construction.*

“ In contemptum dicti Domini Regis nunc,

* “ The king,” says Kennet, “ was not contented to have this declaration published in the usual manner, but he was resolved to have it solemnly read in all churches, as the political gospel of his reign. The bishops and clergy were of all others the most averse to the subject-matter of the declaration, as being most sensible of the ill design and ill effects of it ; and therefore the court seemed the more willing to mortify these their enemies, and make them become accessory to their own ruin ; and even to eat their own dung, as father Petres proudly threatened, and therefore this order of council was made and published.”

Hume takes notice that when Charles [the second] dissolved his last parliament he set forth a declaration, giving his reasons for that measure, and this declaration the Clergy have been ordered to read to the people after divine service. These orders, says Hume, were agreeable to their party prejudices and they willingly submitted to them. The contrary was now the case.

“ T. POWIS. W. WILLIAMS.”

Att. Gen. My lord, we humbly pray, that according to the rules of the court in such cases, my lord archbishop of Canterbury, and my lords the bishops, may plead to the Information.

Sol. Gen. My lords the bishops are here in custody in the court, upon the highest commitment that can be in this kingdom, to wit, that of the king in council ; and we pray, that according to the course of the court, they may plead to the information presently.

L. C. J. What does his Grace and my lords the bishops say to it ?

Serj. Pemberton. Will your lordship give us leave, who are of counsel for his grace my lord of Canterbury, and the rest of my lords the bishops, to speak a word in this matter ?

L. C. J. Ay, brother, go on.

Serj. Pemberton. That which we have to desire of your lordship and the court, is this ; we have now heard this information read, and it is plain we could know nothing of this before, the warrant of commitment being only in general for a libel ; and this being a case of the greatest consequence, peradventure, that ever was in Westminster-hall (that I think, I may boldly say, it is a case of the greatest consequence that ever was in this court) and it being a matter of this nature, that those great and noble persons, my lords the bishops are here taxed with ; that is, for making a seditious libel, contained in such a petition (as though it was a libel to petition the king,) we do beg this of your lordship that (it being of this great importance) to the end we may come prepared to say what we have against it, we may have an imparlance till the next term.

Mr. Finch. Pray, my lord, favour me with a word on the same side, for my lords the bishops. Your lordship sees now how necessary the trouble we gave you before, in making our objections against the reading of the information was, and what the drift and aim of the king’s counsel was, in the desiring the information to be read first ; for now it is read, what is it that they desire of your lordship ? They desire that my lord archbishop, and my lords the bishops, being in custody, and brought here in custody, they may be now so charged with this information, as to plead presently. This, my lord, we oppose, and with humble submission we ought to have time to imparle, and a copy of the information, that we may consider what we have to plead to it; for however we come here into court, whether legally or not legally, yet ought we in the one and in the other case, to have time to consider of our defence. And, my lord, till of latter time this practice which the king's counsel now calls the course of the court, was never used, nor was any man required to plead immediately; and, my lord, if the practice of the court has not been antiently so (as I do believe they will scarce shew it to be antienter than a few years last past,) then with humble submission, though the course of the court have been so for some little time past, yet it is not in the power of the court (as we humbly conceive) to make a course in prejudice of all the privileges that the king's subjects are by the antient rules of law intituled to; they cannot make a new law in prejudice of any right or privilege which the subject hath, and call it the course of the court. Now that this which we desire for my lords the bishops, is the right and privilege of the subject, is most manifest; for there might be many defences that a man may have to make to an accusation of this nature, which it is impossible for him to know at the first hearing of an information read, and yet which would be necessary for him to make use of, or at least it would be impossible for him to make use of in such a manner as the law doth allow of and require. It may be the pleas which he has to plead, may be such as that he has not time to put into form; there may be matters upon the hearing the information read, that it would be necessary for him to give answer to, which he knew not of before, and therefore may neither have materials ready, nor be capable of putting them (if he had them ready) into such form as the law requires. They tell you on the other side, that if a man be brought into court by legal process, he may be charged with any information whatsoever; that they are not tied to the fact alledged in the commitment, but finding the party under a legal imprisonment, they can exhibit an information against him for any other offence. Then, my lord, would I fain know which way any man alive can be prepared to make his just and legal defence, for he knows not his accusation; for though he think it may be for that for which he was committed, yet it may prove otherwise, and then he can be no way provided with materials for his defence, but he must lose all advantages which the law gives him for his defence. My lord, if this be the course of latter times, yet you will not take that to be such a law as is binding to all future times; and we are sure the king's counsel cannot shew that this was the antient practice, for that was quite otherwise.

L. C. J. Mr. Finch, you were not here, I suppose, when this question came in debate in this court lately, in the case of a very great person: it was urged very earnestly and very learnedly by one that stands by you. We upon that debate asked sir Samuel Astry, what the course of the court was? And he told us, that the course of the court (of his own knowledge for all the time that he had sat as clerk of the crown in this court) was, that when any one was brought in custody, or upon a recognizance, they were to plead presently.

Mr. Finch. Sir Samuel Astry has not been here so very long, as to make the practice of his time the course of the court.

L. C. J. But I will tell you what he said further, if you will hear me: he said, he had enquired of Mr. Waterhouse, whom we all know to have been an old clerk in the Crown-office, and he told him, that that had been the practice all his time.

Serj. Pemberton. My lord, I hope the course of the courts of Westminster-hall shall not depend upon the certificate of such a one as Mr. Waterhouse, who is a man, we all know, superannuated, and very defective in his memory.*

Just. Powell. Certainly what they desire for the defendants is very reasonable, for I take the point to be only this: Whether a man may be compelled, being in custody, to plead to an information presently?

Just. Allynbone. Pray, brother Powell, spare me a word in this matter. Mr. Finch, I suppose you labour for what the court will not deny you, that you may have time to plead according to the course of the court. We are not making courses for particular facts, that by my consent we will never do; but if you say such a thing is not the course of the court, and the king's counsel affirm it is, how shall this be determined? And from whom can we take our information to determine what is the course? I am sure there is none of us that are here now, can pretend to tell what the ancient course was; for my part, I declare it, I cannot; and I know no reason there should be any novelty introduced into the court upon any ground or reason whatsoever, nor will I consent to any while I sit here: therefore I desire to know what is the ancient course, and how we shall come to the knowledge of that course, if not by the certificate of those who have been ancient officers of the court?

L. C. J. Nay, that is certain, the court will bring in nothing new in any such case as this.

Just. Allynbone. If that hath not been the ancient course without exception, I am against it; I know no reason my lords the bishops should have any thing new put upon them: on the other side, they must not expect to have the ancient course of the court declined in their case.

Mr. Pollexfen. Pray, my lord, hear me a little in this matter: it is not my desire that any law should be altered for any particular case, and the course of the court I know is the law of the court; but I humbly crave leave to say, that I take the ancient course of the court to be quite otherwise than what the king's counsel would have it. There may be particular things done now and then, perhaps in particular cases, and upon particular occasions, which will not make what is so done to be the course of the court, nor be a binding rule to you. Now, as to this matter of time or no time, to plead to an information, I remember the time very well, when I and some others that stood at the bar, and wondered when we saw this practice coming in, and thought it a very hard and mischievous thing; for, in truth, the several plots that have been, and the heats of men about these things, have brought in this course: for certain I am, and I dare affirm, there never was any such course here before, neither upon warrant from the chief justice, nor upon recognizance, or any other process, was a man compelled to plead instantly, without having a Capias in the regular form, after a contempt for not appearing upon summons. Truly, my lord, we had no interest in the matter one way or other, to make us scruple it any otherwise than as we were concerned that the law and justice of the nation should have its true and ancient current. And this I can assure your lordships, that here was both my lord chief justice Saunders, and Mr. Serjeant Holt, and myself, who taking notice when this was first offered at, to make a man plead immediately, without giving him time to consider what he should plead, could not but say among ourselves, that it was an unreasonable thing; and we were inclined to speak to the court to inform them of the consequence of it, which needs must be very mischievous. Sir Samuel Astry, we know, came to be clerk of the crown in my lord Scroggs's time. We know it is usual and customary for the court to ask what is the course of the court in doubtful cases, and to receive the information from the officers of the court on both sides. If it be on the plea-side, from Mr. Aston; if on the crown-side, from sir Samuel Astry, concerning things of practice; but I did never think that what they reported was final and conclusive to the court: but to make this matter clear, I humbly pray, that you would please to give order for the search of old precedents, how the old practice really hath been: every thing that has been done in hot times, is not to be made a standing rule. If there do any such thing appear to have been done and practised anciently, truly, my lord, I will submit, and say I am under a mighty mistake; but if this which is now urged for the course of the court, is nothing but what the zeal of the times, and heat of persecutions hath introduced, surely that is not fit to be a constant rule for the court to go by; for every one knows, that the zeal of one time may bring in that by surprize upon one man, which, when things are cool at another time, will appear to be plain injustice. We have indeed seen strange things of this kind done before, but I hope to God they are now at an end, and we shall never see any such thing done hereafter; and as for this particular point, I think it is a wonderful thing in the consequence of it, if the law should be as they would have it. Here is a long information just read over to a man (but whether long or short, as to the main point, it is the same) and you say the course of the court is, he must plead to it immediately. Surely matters of crime that require punishment to be inflicted on men, are of as much consequence and concern, as any civil matter whatsoever; and men are to have their rights in those matters preserved, as well as in other matters, which is all I press: for suppose a man has a special matter to plead; as particularly, suppose it be the king's pardon, I cannot give this in evidence upon a trial after not guilty pleaded, then I ought to plead it. But what if I have it not ready? 'Tis not telling the court of it without shewing of it, that will do; and it may be a man that is taken up, and brought hither in custody, cannot have it ready to shew; but yet then, by this rule a man shall lose the benefit of his plea, by being compelled to answer immediately. But they say, the court will do right: I suppose they will; and my lords the bishops in this case, I believe, do not distrust but that the court will do right; but I never thought the law was brought to that pass, that such things as these were left wholly in the discretion of the court. Certainly imparlances, time to plead, and just preparations for a man's defence, are things that the law has settled, and not left in the discretion of the court: and truly to me it seems all one utterly to take away a man's defence, as to hinder him of the means to prepare for it. My lord, here is an information before you against these noble lords, 'tis a matter of great moment, and though I hope in God there is no great cause for it, yet however, since such persons are concerned, and 'tis a matter of such great weight, I hope you will give us such an imparlance, as if we had this day appeared upon the ordinary process, which is an imparlance untill the next term.

* For what is said of him in the Case of Green, Berry, and Hill, when they were brought up for judgment, see vol. 7, p. 221, of this Collection.

L. C. J. There is a difference between this and that other case: if my lords the bishops had appeared upon the summons, they would have had an imparlance of course; but when they are brought up hither in custody, that mightily alters the case. But that we may not be too hasty in a thing of this nature, let the clerk of the court be consulted with, that we may know what the true course is.

Att. Gen. My lord, we pray sir Samuel Astry may be examined a little about it.

Just. Allynbone. Mr. Pollexfen, I believe the court is unanimous in their resolutions of making nothing new in this case; but pray give me leave to tell you, this is not the first time that this question has come to be agitated in this court since I came hither. Now from whence can the court take their measures to be rightly informed what the practice of the court is, but from the information of the officers of the court? who by their constant employment, are most capable of knowing what the course is. Now, if you come to offer any thing that may be matter of doubt to the court, concerning the practice of the court, you having known that this thing was controverted before (for so it has been) should have provided yourself with something that must be a reasonable motive for us to doubt; for this has not been only once, but often moved, and our officers have been consulted with concerning this question, which took its rise from such objections as you have made now. Now for you to tell us, that you desire that we would look into precedents, is, methinks, pretty odd. If you had brought us any precedents, it had been something: and withal I must tell you, that you must not reckon the favour of the court, in any particular case, to be the standing rules for the practice and course of the court; but instead of bringing precedents, you only offer your own thoughts, and those would create no doubt in us but what has been before satisfied upon examination of the officers of the court.

Mr. Pollexfen. Pray, sir, will you give me leave to answer one word?

Mr. Just. Powell. Truly I have not observed that ever this point was started so as to beget a question since I came hither, but only in the cases of the Quo Warrantos; and truly in that case I thought it hard they should be denied time to plead, especially the consequence being so fatal.

L. C. J. Yes, yes, brother, it has been several times.

Just. Powell. Truly, my lord, I have not observed it, nor do I remember it.

Sir R. Sawyer. My lord, I have always taken the distinction, as to these matters, to be this—

Just. Powell. But, my lord, if the ancient course of the court hath been to grant an imparlance, and a copy of the information before they plead, I see no reason why my lords the bishops should not have the benefit of that ancient course: for if a man that is sued at law for a two-penny trespass, shall have that advantage as to receive a declaration, and have time to plead what he can to it, why should not my lords the bishops, in a matter of so great a weight, have the same advantage too? But indeed, if the course of the court had been anciently otherwise, I can say nothing to it; for the course of the court is certainly the law of the court.

Just. Allybone. Brother Powell, you say well, if they did produce any one precedent to give us occasion to doubt in the matter.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray, good my lord, will you give me leave—

Att. Gen. Why, sir Robert Sawyer, will you never have done?

Sol. Gen. No, they are so zealous and eager in this case, that they won't permit either the court, or any body else, to speak a word but themselves.

Serj. Pemberton. Good Mr. Solicitor, give us leave to answer the objection that the court hath made to us; we would satisfy your lordship where the distinction really lieth, where there has been an opportunity for the party to come in, as by summons or Subpœna, or the like, and he has slipped that opportunity, and so the king is delayed. In that case they always used to put the party upon pleading presently, when he was taken up upon a Capias, and brought in custody; but when there was never any Subpœna taken out (as the case is here) so that the party never had an opportunity to come in and render himself, and appear to answer it according to the due course of law, an imparlance was never yet denied, nor time to plead; and that is the case here.

Sir R. Sawyer. My lord, Mr. Serjeant has given you the true distinction, where process has gone out to summon any one to appear to an information, and he hath failed to appear according to the summons, and the prosecutor for the king makes out a Capias; if he be brought in upon that Capias, the ancient course has been so as they say: but for that other matter, where a man comes in upon a commitment at the first instance, and an information is put in just as this is, the same morning, and not before; if they can shew any one precedent of this kind fifteen years ago, I would be contented to yield that they are in the right; but I am sure they are not able to do it. In sir Matthew Hale's time when this was moved, it was refused; and he was clear of another opinion.

Att. Gen. I hope now, my lord, we shall be heard a little for the king; and I cannot forbear observing, in the first place, somewhat that these gentlemen have offered at, who are now inveighing against the heat of the times, when a great part of that heat we know who were the inflamers of: but what is all this to the purpose? The question is barely this, Whether when a man is brought into custody into this court, and charged with an information, he shall not by the course of the court be compelled to plead presently?

Sir R. Sawyer. To indictments for treason and felony he shall be compelled to plead presently, but not to an information for misdemeanors.

Just. Powell. It seems to me very hard he should.

Att. Gen. Sir, there are many things that seem hard in law, but yet when all is done, the judges cannot alter the law. It is a hard case that a man that is tried for his life for treason or felony, cannot have a copy of his indictment, cannot have counsel, cannot have his witnesses sworn; but this has been long practised, and the usage is grown to a law, and from time to time it hath been so taken for law; it cannot be altered without a new law made; as it hath been heretofore, so it must be now, till a greater authority alter it; and so, as to the case here at present, if it were a new case, and it was the first instance, I must confess, I think I should not press it; but if this be the constant practice of the court, and if these gentlemen that now oppose it, some of them ministerially, some of them judicially, have themselves established this practice, they have no reason to wonder that we follow them in it. We do not blame them for what they do now; for men, when they are of counsel, may be permitted to argue for their client contrary to their former opinions; but if these things, by their procurement, have been done thus heretofore, surely without offence we may pray the like may be done now even in the case of my lords the bishops. It is our duty, on behalf of the king, to desire that he may have right done him, as well as they on behalf of my lords the bishops; and to cite precedents were endless, especially of late times; and these gentlemen know them all very well, for they were some of them parties to them themselves, and we can do no more, nor need we, than to put them in mind of their own doings; whether it was so before their time or not, it concerns them to make out and retract their own errors; but in our observation, if ever this was pressed, or insisted upon on the king's behalf, this course has always been pursued.

Sir R. Sawyer. For a precedent, my lord, there is the case of my lord Hollis, where there was given time after time.

Sol. Gen. That was time given by the court to argue the plea to the jurisdiction of the court.

Just. Powell. Mr. Solicitor, have you ever known it contested, and upon debate so ruled, in an information for a misdemeanor, as this case is?

Sol. Gen. If you please to ask sir Samuel Astry, he will inform you how the course has been.

L. C. J. What say you, sir Samuel Astry?

Sir S. Astry. My lord, when I came into this place, there was an antient gentleman that had been long a clerk in the office.

L. C. J. How many years is it since you came into this office?

Sir S. Astry. About a dozen years, I think, my lord; and he sat in this place where Mr. Harcourt does now. He was always accounted a loyal, honest and intelligent man, that is Mr. Waterhouse, who is now alive; and when I came into my office, I took my instructions in a great measure from him, and asked him, what the course of the court was, in such cases which I myself did not understand? For though I had been an attorney twenty years, yet it was on the other side, the civil side; and though I knew some things of my own knowledge, yet I did not so well know the whole practice of the court; and particularly I asked him, what was the course of the court in this case, that is now in question? And he told me, that in all his time and experience, if a man appears upon a recognizance, or was a person in custody, or appeared 'in propria persona,' as a person privileged, he ought to plead at the first instance; and according to that practice, when sir Robert Sawyer was attorney-general, it was the constant practice; and I am sure he knows it is no new thing.

Sir R. Sawyer. But upon what information, sir Samuel Astry? Were they informations upon misdemeanors?

Sir S. Astry. Yes, several.

Sir R. Sawyer. But was there no process taken out first to call the party in?

Sir S. Astry. Yes, where process was never taken out.

Att. Gen. For how long time is that you speak of your own knowledge, sir Samuel?

Sir S. Astry. About a dozen years.

Serj. Pemberton. It was never done till very lately, but after the party was in contempt for not appearing.

Sol. Gen. I would ask you, sir Samuel Astry, one question: Was the usual process of subpoena first taken out? For Mr. Serjeant Pemberton says it was, do you find any warrant for such a difference as that?

Serj. Pemberton. Do you find any such case as this is?

Sol. Gen. Nay, pray, Mr. Serjeant, give us your favour, and let us ask our questions according to your own doctrine. How do you find the practice to have been as to that distinction they have made?

Sir S. Astry. Sir, I would be very loth to enlarge the precedents of the crown-office further than the truth is; I tell you whence I took my instructions, from Mr. Waterhouse, who was an antient clerk in the office, he has been in that office sixty years, and the instructions I took from him, were, that this was the practice all his time, and it has been asserted all my time. It has been often contested I confess, and Mr. Pollexfen has always opposed it, and moved against it, but it has been always ruled against him: I know it was against his judgment, but the court always over-ruled it.

Sir R. Sawyer. Sir Samuel Astry, can you give any one precedent before you came into this office?

Sir S. Astry. Sir, I can go no farther than this, that I have told you what information I received from him.

Sir R. Sawyer. What is all this but a certificate from Mr. Waterhouse?

L. C. J. We can be informed no otherways than by certificate from the old clerks of the office.

Serj. Pemberton. Alas, he is a child and not fit to do any thing.

Mr. Pollexfen. We all know Mr. Waterhouse very well, he is a very weak man, and alway was so, and there is no depending upon any thing that he says.

Sol. Gen. Pray, my lord, will you hear us a little for the king.

The bishop of Peterborough whispering with sir Robert Sawyer, Mr. Solicitor said to him, 'My lord, you had better look another way, and look towards the court, for there your business lies.'

L. C. J. Well, Mr. Solicitor, what say you?

Sol. Gen. My lord, it appears plainly, that the king is in possession of this privilege, and has been so for these dozen years; for so long the justice of the kingdom towards all the subjects hath run in all the instances of it in this channel; and though it hath been contested as often as Mr. Pollexfen has been of counsel for the defendant, in such cases it has always been ruled against him. He indeed has made his continual claims (sir Samuel Astry says,) he has raised the dust, and made a hue and cry, but it has always gone against him: and I would ask the rest of you, gentlemen, that are of counsel for my lords the bishops (for some, or one of you, I am sure has been concerned in every information that has been exhibited in this court for these nine or ten years last past, I would ask you) whether in any information that you have been concerned in, if the party being brought in upon a commitment, and it was insisted upon by the king's counsel that he should have neither imparlance nor time to plead, that you [he] ever obtained either without the special grace of the court. I know you will not say it ever was; why then should there be more done in this case, than has been done in all other cases these ten years? It is not sufficient to make declamations against the unreasonableness of the practice; for it is but what you have done yourselves, and insisted upon for law; and all those men that upon informations have been compelled to plead, have had injury done them; or else these lords will have no injury by the court's taking the same course. It is true, my lords the bishops are peers, and here are seven of them, and seven lords go a great way; they make a committee, I think, in the house of peers, and a mighty matter is made of it, that this is the case of so many lords! but will you alter the course of the court, because seven of my lords the bishops are concerned in it, and they make a mighty stir about the unreasonableness of the thing? How it can be believed that the law will not give a man time to make his defence. They agree themselves, that if it were in the case of life and death, they must plead presently; and doth not the same reason hold? And may not an argument be drawn à fortiori, in the case of a misdemeanor? If I am not to have time when I plead for my life, there is less reason I should have time to answer a trespass: but, my lord, it is not ordinary reason that weighs in the case, it is the course of the court, which is the law of the court that we are contending for: and what is there in this case that should require so much time for my lords the bishops to plead to it? It is charged in the information, that these noble prelates did make a libel which was produced by them, and published in the king's presence; they can easily tell whether they have done this or not done it. What can they plead but the general issue? They talk of special matter to be pleaded, but can they shew any more that they can say, than what any poor ordinary countryman, if he were here to plead to an information, could say? That is, whether he was guilty or not guilty. These lords can tell whether it be true, that they did publish the paper laid in the information, and then your lordship will acquaint them what will be the consequences of that publication in point of law. We say all this was done at Westminster; there the scene is laid, and it is not an information for an old stale thing done a great while ago, but a thing that was done yesterday, and a thing notorious enough, their contesting with the king about his declaration of indulgence. And as to what Mr. Finch has said, that this is a novel invention and a trick to rob a man of his just defence; sure he forgets who it was that taught us the trick. If it be a trick, we have learnt it from those that tricked before us; and what is it that these lords do desire? They would have an imparlance till Michaelmas term: does, or can your lordship think they ask that which is reasonable? To have six months time to plead not guilty to an information for a libel, and when so many men have been denied it formerly upon the instigation of those very gentlemen that now press so very hard to have it granted, sure they must expect to be denied it too; and all this while these lords lie under this accusation, which is not so trivial a matter as some would make it. I believe my lords the bishops have a desire to be cleared, I suppose it is only their counsel that desire to delay it, upon what ground I know not; I believe they themselves would be glad to remove the imputation, which would be best done by a trial, and the sooner the better: If they have a mind to justify themselves, that is the readiest course for it, and they may do it presently, by pleading not guilty. My lord, I know I am in a great auditory, and abundance of your lordship's time has been taken up already; I press it therefore for the sake of the king, and for the sake of my lords the bishops, we shall else have all these things hang in suspence, and in the air for six months longer; therefore let the matter be put upon a fair issue, so as it may come to a speedy determination. I am sure if the lords be innocent to-day, they will be innocent to-morrow, and if it were my own case, I would desire to have it tried as soon as I could, and therefore I pray they may plead immediately.

Just. Powell. Mr. Solicitor, what do you say to the difference that was taken between a person that was brought in in custody at the first instance, where there is no contempt to the process of the court, and one that comes here by Capias, upon default of appearing at the summons?

Mr. Finch. My lord, if I apprehend them aright, they give us more than we did ask, for Mr. Solicitor has laid it down as a rule, that if a man is taken upon a capias in a mean process, he shall have no imparlance.

Sol. Gen. No, you are greatly mistaken, sir, and I pray don't lay down rules for me.

Mr. Finch. If I am, sir, I beg your pardon, but this I am sure of, if a Venire Fac goes out, which is in the nature of a Subpana, and the party appear to it, that being the first time he could come into court, you cannot force him to plead to an information, but he has an imparlance of course.

Just. Powell. Methinks it seems very reasonable, that this forcing a man to plead presently should be only a punishment for a contempt of the court, and pray, were my lords the bishops in contempt to the court when they came here to-day? Certainly they were not, for no man is in contempt, but he that, being served with process, disobeys that process; and if my lords the bishops had been served with a subpana and had not appeared, then there would have gone out a capias to bring them in, and then they would have come in upon a contempt, and then they would have come within the rule.

Sol. Gen. If you have a mind to it, you may ask sir Samuel Astry again.

Att. Gen. If they come in upon bail, they ought to plead presently.

Just. Allybone. Mr. Finch, I'll tell you what sticks with me, truly you could not but be aware that this would be required of you; for this very thing was in debate last term, and you know what rules the officer said was the course of the court, why did you not therefore come prepared with some precedents, to shew us what the course of the court is?

Att. Gen. Truly, my lord, at this rate, we shall keep your lordship here all this afternoon, if these gentlemen will not be satisfied with the rule of the court: and for an answer to what Mr. Justice Powell says, if any riot be committed in the country, and the parties are bound by recognizance to appear here, that is no process of this court, and so consequently there can be no contempt, and yet they must plead presently.

Just. Powell. There is a particular reason for that, because they are bound by recognizance, sir Samuel Astry and others say, that if they come in by recognizance they must plead presently.

Sol. Gen.* But for the thing itself (that the people that hear us may not imagine that this court puts a hardship upon my lords the bishops, more than is done in other cases) it is best to keep the same rule as in all other cases; for when all is done, when justice goes with an equal current, without any regard to one person or other, then every body is safe, and all persons concerned do their duty: so in this case, here be no precedents produced wherein it has been otherwise; then can no person complain but that things go in this case as they do in all other cases; perhaps such a case (as to the fact of it) never happened before; but for the law of it, that is plain, and the same as in all other cases; for that there may be an information against my lords the bishops, as well as other people, if they make libels, sure it is no doubt at all; and if an information lies against them for it, they are under the same rules as others are: but these gentlemen talk of being surprized, and that this is the first time they have heard of this information; but have we told any news in this information? Was not all that is contained in it, notoriously enough known before? Was not the king's first declaration very well known? Was not his second declaration very well known? Was not his order of council for reading of this declaration very well known? Is not your own petition a thing very well known to yourselves and all the world? Then these being the particular facts of which this information is made up, and we only say you did this fact, and we ask you, did you do it, or did you not? Can there be any great surprize in this? My lord, I cannot see any thing that alters this from the common case, but only their being peers; and since this question has been heretofore under contest, these gentlemen have had time enough to have prepared precedents, to differ this from the common rule, if they could; but since they cannot, we desire they may have the same rule that is in all other cases, and then to be sure all will go right.

L. C. J. Sir Samuel Astry, pray will you tell us, whether ever the court used to grant an imparlance where a person comes in in custody? Or did you ever know, when a person comes in upon a commitment, time was given him to plead?

Serj. Pemberton. Have you ever known it disputed and denied?

Sir S. Astry. My lord, I have known that 'tis in the discretion of the court to grant what time they please.

L. C. J. Is it the course of the court to give an imparlance?

Sir S. Astry. No, 'tis the favour of the court, and if the defendants have at any time shewed a reasonable cause, that they have a special matter to plead, or any other cause allowed by the court, the court has sometimes indulged them so far as to give them time.

L. C. J. But how is the ordinary course, sir Samuel Astry?

Just. Allybone. Ay, for as I said before, things done in particular cases in favour are not precedents.

Sir S. Astry. I have told your lordship the course is this, that any person that appears upon a recognizance, or is taken up by your lordship's warrant, or by a warrant from a justice of peace, or any other way in custody, or any officer of the court that is a privileged person, and that must appear in propria persona, must plead presently, if the court upon particular reasons do not give him time; and this I received information of, as the practice of the court, from Mr. Waterhouse, who had been a clerk in the office sixty years.

Sol. Gen. He said so before, but these gentlemen will never be contented, unless they have a new law made for them.

Mr. Pollexfen. My lord, I would not unnecessarily trouble your lordship; but truly this is a case of great concern. And first of all, I think we shall all agree, that what has been used for ten or twelve years past will not make the course of the court, and next I perceive they do not bring any one instance for any proceeding of this sort above ten or twelve years old. But then say they on the other side, why do not you bring precedents that it has gone otherwise heretofore? My lord, that cannot be done, for it is a negative on our side, that this which they desire is not the course of the court: but then, as it is impossible to prove a negative, so the proofs should come on the other side, that this has been done: they ought to shew it if there has been any such thing as a standing rule, or else it shall be presumed an innovation, as being contrary to all reason. But, my lord, because they put it upon us, there is this proof on our side, as much as a negative can afford. In those proceedings that were in the great case of the Habeas Corpus, there was an information against Elliot and others;* they had time given them to plead over and over, so that there is one precedent: and as many of these cases in former times as can be found, will shew that this was always the course. But pray, say they, produce us one instance, that ever there was a man that came in upon a recognizance, that had time to plead. Truly, my lord, I cannot just now tell whether any such instance can be produced, but I verily believe there may be a great many; but I turn it upon them, and that with great reason. With submission to your lordship shew me any man, if you can, above a dozen years ago that had not time allowed him to plead. Ay but, say they, Mr. Waterhouse, an ancient clerk of the crown-office, that has been there these sixty years, hath certified that this hath been the practice of all his time. My lord, we that have been conversant in the business of this court, did all very well know Mr. Waterhouse when he was here, and sat in court in the place of sir Samuel Astry.

Sir S. Astry. No, sir, it was in Mr. Harcourt's place.

Mr. Pollexfen. Well, he executed a place here, and 'tis no matter whether he were master of the office or no; but I think we all knew him very well, he was a man as lame in his business as could be; for there are some men that will never do business well, let them be never so long at it; and he was as weak in the practice of the court and every thing else, as 'tis possible for one that has been bred in an office to be; and at this time he is grown so decrepid and superannuated, that you may as well depend upon the certificate of an old woman, as any thing that he shall say in such a matter as this: he is now almost fourscore years of age, and has lost that little memory and understanding he had; but if his certificate must be depended upon because of his standing in the office, pray, my lord, let him come hither, and do you ask him what he has to say in this matter.

Sol. Gen. Ay, that is very well indeed.*

Mr. Pollexfen. Good Mr. Solicitor, spare us, certainly there needs not such great haste in this matter, we are upon a business of very great weight and concernment; for you are now making a law for the whole kingdom, in point of practice, in cases of this nature. We do say indeed, that by the reason of the heat and zeal of these last ten years, such a usage has been introduced, but sir Samuel Astry tells you it was opposed, and I hope that neither I, nor the thing will be the worse thought of, because I opposed what I thought an unreasonable and new invention. My lord, I know in the Case of the City of London,† we had time to plead a whole vacation after an imparlance, and were not at all hurried on, as the king's counsel would do in this case. My lord, if they can produce any ancient precedent for it, I will say no more; but there is no case in print in any of our books, that ever I read, or can remember, that countenances such an opinion. A man by this means may lose his just defence, and he has no remedy, nor will it ever be in his power to retrieve it, for he may be brought on a sudden into court upon a warrant, and when he is here, he shall be charged with an information, and presently he must plead not guilty, because he has not time to prepare a plea of any other nature, let him have never so much other special matter or occasion for it. If you please to let this matter be examined what the precedents are, and of what age those precedents are, then perhaps your lordship will get some satisfaction; but otherwise, if the bare certificate of the master of the office is to be a guide to the court what is law, and what is not, we shall be in a very uncertain condition, especially when the matter carries in the very face of it a great deal of unreasonableness and injustice. They on the other side will argue, that it is not more unreasonable than the practice in the case of treason and felony, where persons are compelled to plead instantly. But under favour, my lord, there is no comparison between this case and that, though I know it was always thought a hardship and defect in our law, that a person should be denied time to plead in case of life and death, except he can shew some special matter of law that he has to plead, and then he has always time allowed him to put it into form; and I could never think there was any reason to be given for it, but because the common defences of felons would be little shifts and arts, which would destroy proceedings, and make them tedious, and that would be an encouragement to people to commit felony; and besides there is a trust which the law reposes in the court in capital cases, to take care that these men should not suffer upon any little tricks in law; but if you come below treason and felony, the law puts no such hardship upon the defendant, nor reposes such a special trust in the court; but a man may plead any thing he has to plead; and can any man plead before he sees what he is to plead to? And shall the law allow him counsel to prepare his plea, and not allow him time to consult with that counsel about it? These are things, my lord, that truly to me seem unreasonable: but as to the practice and course of the court, I pray your lordship to give order that the precedents may be searched, that you may know what the ancient practice was.

Mr. Finch. Whether you will grant an imparlance now or no, yet I hope, however, you will think fit to give my lords the bishops time to plead.

L. C. J. But Mr. Finch, we have had a certificate from sir Samuel Astry, which truly weighs a great deal with me; he tells you the practice has been so ever since he came here, and that Mr. Waterhouse told him that it had been so all his time, which is sixty years.

Mr. Pollexfen. My lord, there are persons here that will upon their oaths declare, that Mr. Waterhouse has often told them the practice was otherwise, even in his time, and afterwards a long time before this new way of proceeding came in.

Mr. Ince. My lord, if I might have liberty to speak, I can say Mr. Waterhouse has told me—

L. C. J. Pray be quiet, Mr. Ince.

Just. Allynbone. But pray, Mr. Pollexfen, give me leave to mind you how the evidence stands against you; the objections are, that this has been a practice but for twelve years last past: if that be true, I think it goes a great way, for the practice of twelve years is precedent enough, prima facie, that such is the practice: for how shall we come to the knowledge of the practice, but from our officer sir Samuel Astry, who has been here examined? And he tells you, that upon his coming into the office, when it could not be so doubtful, as now it seems it is, he took instructions from Mr. Waterhouse: I allow you it is but his certificate, but that must go a great way with the court.

Sir R. Sawyer. Such a practice as this has been always very rare in informations for misdemeanours; and they bring you nothing of any precedent older than sir Samuel Astry's time.

Mr. Finch. Pray, my lord, give me leave to vary the question; I do not now make it a question, whether your lordships should grant my lords the bishops an imparlance, but whether you would think fit to look into the course of the court before that time that sir Samuel Astry speaks of, and take time to consider and search into precedents.

Just. Allynbone. Do you, Mr. Finch, give us any one reason or precedent that may make us doubt, whether this be the course of the court or no? And you could not but be aware of this before, and therefore should have come prepared to make out your objection.

Mr. Finch. Mr. Pollexfen and the rest of the practisers in my lord Hale's time will tell you, that the course was otherwise in his time. Sir Samuel Astry indeed tells you it has been so since his time; but this was one of the points it seems, that he was ignorant of, which made him enquire of Mr. Waterhouse, so doubtful was his practice.

Sir S. Astry. I was an attender upon this court before I came into this office, but it was in another place, on the other side of the court; and therefore was not concerned so much to know what was the course on this side, till I came into this office.

Sol. Gen. These gentlemen differ among themselves, one would have an imparlance, the other only time to plead; I believe truly they cannot tell what they would have; I pray the rules of the court may be kept to.

Sir S. Astry. Here are two clerks that sit by me, that have been a long time in the office, Mr. Harcourt my secondary, and the clerk of the rules, I pray they may be asked their knowledge of this matter.

Att. Gen. Certainly these gentlemen think they have a privilege above all other persons, that they must not be subject to the same rules as others are! We on our parts have taken all the methods that we could to make this matter manifest, and what is it that these gentlemen now propose? They pray you to take time to consider, but have they used the right means of creating a jealousy or suspicion in the court, that the course is otherwise? They can give no instance of it, and all they say is, it is a negative, that this is not the course of the court, but the imparlance that they beg is in the affirmative, surely that they can find proof of it, if it be so. As for my lord Hollis's Case, that is with us, and not against us; let Mr. Pollexfen shew that ever any one of the men, that were brought into court in custody, either had time to plead, or an imparlance.

L. C. J. Sir Samuel Astry says he has given you his opinion, and here are two other clerks of the office that he refers himself to, are you willing that they should be asked?

Serj. Pemberton. Yes, my lord, with all our hearts.

L. C. J. Mr. Harcourt, how long have you been a clerk in the Crown-office?

Mr. Harcourt. About 17 or 18 years, my lord.

L. C. J. How long have you known the practice of the court in this matter, and what is it?

Mr. Harcourt. I cannot charge myself so with particulars from the time of my coming into the office, but for these ten or twelve years past (I remember) it has been as the king's counsel pressed, and as sir Samuel Astry has declared.

L. C. J. What say you, Mr. Sillyard, how long have you known the Crown-office?

Mr. Sillyard. I have been a clerk here about 30 years.

L. C. J. Well, and how has the practice been all your time?

Mr. Sillyard. I have not sat here as clerk of the Rules but a little while, but since I have sat here, I have always observed it to be the practice, that one that comes in custody should plead immediately; it was a thing heretofore that did not so often happen as it hath done here of late, therefore I cannot so well speak it; but it hath fallen out frequently within some years last past, and that hath been the constant course.

Sir S. Astry. When you first came to be Attorney-General, sir Robert Sawyer, I am sure it was so.

Att. Gen. Pray let me ask you, Mr. Sillyard, you say you have known the office thirty years; when you first came to the office, were informations as frequent as they are now, and have been of late?

Sol. Gen. It was so in the case of Mr. Hampden,* when you were Attorney-General, sir Robert Sawyer, he was forced to plead immediately to an information for a misdemeanor, for a crime that perhaps you will say was bordering upon treason.

Sir R. Sawyer. Yes, truly, it wanted but one witness, that was all.

Sol. Gen. But yet the indictment was only for a misdemeanor, and there we struggled and debated the matter, but were forced to give it over, because the course of the court and sir Robert Sawyer, and the then king's counsel, were against us, so it has been by the then unquestionable testimony of sir Samuel Astry for these 12 years last past; and in those 12 years we have had many changes in court, perhaps there may have been twelve Chief Justices and more, with other Judges,† al-

"In the reign of Charles the Second.

"1. John Archer was appointed a judge of the court of Common Pleas on the 4th of November, 1663, and was removed in the Christmas vacation in 1672, (24 Car. 2.) being then the senior puisne judge, and was succeeded by sir William Ellis. Sir Thomas Raymond says Archer was removed, 'pro quibusdam causis mihi incognitis,' but having a patent 'quam diu se bene gesserit' he refused to surrender tered in that time, they have all affirmed and it without a Scire Facias. Notwithstanding he was prohibited from sitting in the court or exercising his office elsewhere, he continued to be a justice, and received a share in the profits of the court as to fees and other proceedings, and his name was used in fines, &c. when Rushworth wrote, and until his death. Sir William Ellis sat in court on the first day of Hilary Term, 1672; and on the same day, sir Hugh Windham, who was the puisne baron of the Exchequer, also took his place as senior judge of the Common Pleas, Wild being removed from the Common Pleas into the King's Bench, to fill up the vacancy occasioned by Morton's death. These removals were made at the desire of sir Edward Thurland, who chose rather to be a baron of the Exchequer, than a justice of either of the other courts, and the chancellor in his speech complimented him upon his modesty, 'in that he chose rather to be serviceable than rich.' [T. Ray. Rep. p. 217. Sir T. Jones Rep. p. 42. Rushw. iii. p. 1365.]

"2. Sir William Ellis was appointed one of the justices of the court of Common Pleas in 1672, removed in the long vacation in 1676, and succeeded by sir William Scroggs, who was sworn in on the first day of Michaelmas Term. Sir William Ellis was afterwards made one of the justices of the court of King's Bench, with presidency to sir Thomas Jones and sir William Dolben, justices of that court, because they were 'put in after his turning out;' but this was only signified verbally by the king, and not expressed in his patent. He died in that situation on the 3d of December, 1680, aged 71; though upon the duke of York's return from Scotland in that year, the cavaliers were displeased that he was not turned out. [Freem. Rep. p. 212. T. Ray. Rep. p. 251. 407. Macph. St. Pap. i. p. 105.]

"3. Sir Thomas Twisden, was appointed a justice of the court of King's Bench in 1660, and in 1678, his attendance was dispensed with on account of his great age. He still continued to be a judge, and, as was said, had a pension of 500*l.* a year. Sir William Dolben was appointed a judge of this court, and sat, instead of Twisden, till his death, which happened in 1682, he died aged 81 years. Sir William continued to be judge of this court after Twisden's death, but only for a short time before he was himself removed. Noble, in his Memoirs of the Protectoral House of Cromwell, says of Twisden, that 'being too virtuous for the place he held he received his quietus, after sitting 'upon the bench 20 years.' [T. Ray. Rep. p. 475. Mod. Rep. iii. p. 4. Noble, p. 438.]

"4. Sir Robert Atkins, was made a justice of the court of Common Pleas in 1672, [E. 24 Car. 2), and displaced upon the day before Hilary Term in 1679, by writ under the great seal. He was succeeded by sir Thomas Raymond, a baron of the Exchequer. The cause of his removal probably was that he was con-allowed this course; and if I then make it out, nected with lord Russell and the Whigs, who withdrew from the council board about this time, being displeased with the king and the majority of the council for treating lightly the Popish Plot. In the New Biographical Dictionary it is said, that 'from a foresight of very 'troublesome times, he resigned his office, and 'retired into the country.' At the Revolution he was made chief baron of the Exchequer. [T. Jones. Rep. p. 42. Mod. Rep. iii. p. 4. Comp. Hist. iii. p. 379.]

" 5. Sir William Wild was appointed a justice of the King's Bench in 1672, (24 Car. 2), and sworn in upon the day before Hilary Term began, and removed in 1679. (P. 31 Car. 2). His successor was sir Francis Pemberton. [T. Jones. Rep. p. 43. Show. Rep. ii. p. 23. Keb. Rep. iii. p. 102.]

" 6. Francis Brampton, a baron of the Exchequer, was appointed in the year 1678. (T. 30 Car. 2), and removed in April 1679. And was succeeded by sir Edward Atkyns. [Ray. Rep. p. 244.]

" 7. Sir Francis Pemberton, a justice of the King's-bench, was appointed in April, and sworn in the 5th of May, 1679, was removed in the month of February following, (32 Car. 2.) and succeeded by sir Thomas Raymond. He practised again in all the courts of Westminster hall, but without the bar, as a serjeant. [Raym. Rep. p. 251. Show. ii. p. 33, 94.]

" 8. Sir William Scroggs, chief justice of the King's-bench, was appointed in 1678, (T. 30, Car. 2.) and removed in 1681, in the Easter vacation, (33 Car. 2.) being succeeded by sir Francis Pemberton. In 1680, the House of Commons fell upon the duke of York's friends, and among the rest lord chief justice Scroggs; they resolved that he should be impeached of high treason, and articles were prepared and ordered to be sent to the lords, but the king prorogued the parliament on the 10th of January, and dissolved it on the 20th. And in the Easter term following, Scroggs who had declined to sit in court for several preceding terms, was discharged from his office, in order that Fitzharris might be tried, but was recompensed with a pension. [Vent. 1. p. 329, 354. Show. ii, p. 155. Macph. Stat. Pap. 1, p. 106. Vol. 8, p. 430, of this Collection.]

" 9. Sir Francis Pemberton, chief justice of the King's-bench, was appointed in 1681, for the trial of Fitzharris, and made chief justice of the common pleas on the day before the first day of Hilary term, 1683, (34 Car. 2.) in the room of sir Francis North, who on the death of lord Nottingham about Christmas had been appointed keeper of the Great Seal. Sir Thomas Raymond says, he changed to the court of common pleas at his own desire, "for that it is a place though not so honourable, yet of more ease and plenty, as the lord keeper said in his speech to Saunders." But it is probable that he was compelled to make the change in order that sir Edmund Saunders that in the time of all judges within our re-might preside at the decision of the great Quo Warranto case against the city of London, in which he had drawn all the pleadings for the crown. The demurrer in that cause was filed in the same term, on the first day of which he took his seat as his successor, namely (Hilary Term, 34 Car. 2.) 1683; he died in the next Trinity term, 19th of June, 1683; and sir George Jeffries succeeded him, and sat on the bench in Mich. Term, 1683. [Show. ii. p. 232, 311. T. Ray. p. 478. T. Jones, p. 231, 233. Mod. 3. p. 38. V. 3, p. 1086, in this Collection.]

" 10. Sir Francis Pemberton, made chief justice of the common pleas in Hilary term, 1683, (35 Car. 2.) was removed in the long vacation of that year, and sir Thomas Jones a justice of the court of King's-bench succeeded him, and sat in court at the beginning of Michaelmas term, 35 Car. 2. The removal of sir Francis Pemberton has been supposed to be occasioned, by the honourable manner in which he had conducted himself, when presiding at the trial of lord Russel on the 13th of July preceding, or, as Kennet says, by his not "being able to go into all the new measures of the court." His fate is rather singular, he filled three judicial offices, was removed from each, returned twice to practise at the bar, and died at last a puisne serjeant. [T. Jones, p. 234. Compl. Hist. iii. p. 416.]

" 11. Sir William Dolben, a justice of the King's-bench, was appointed in 1677, (29 Car. 2.) and received a supersedeas to his commission on the 20th of April, 1683, (35 Car. 2.) being succeeded by sir Francis Wythens, who was sworn in on the first day of Easter term, the 25th of April, in the same year. After the revolution he was restored to his office. A message was sent from the lords on the 19th of February, 1688, by serjeant Dolben, so possibly he had returned to the bar. [T. Ray. p. 496. Show. ii. p. 282. Mod. iii. p. 253. Lords' Journ. xiv. p. 129.]

" 12. Thomas Street, was made a baron of the Exchequer in 1681, (33 Car. 2.) sworn in the 23d of April, and was discharged in 1684. He was succeeded by sir Robert Wright, but appears to have been a justice of the King's-bench in (T. 4. Jac. 2.) 1688. [T. Ray. p. 431. Mod. iii. p. 220.]

" In the reign of James the Second.

" 1. Sir Creswell Levinz, was made a justice of the Common Pleas in 1680, (Hil. 32 Car. 2.) and being removed in 1685, two days before the end of Hilary term, (1 and 2 Jac. 2) was succeeded by sir Edward Lutwyche, as is said in 2 Shower. The removal was by supersedeas under the Great Seal, and he returned again to the bar where he continued to practise so late, as Trin. 8 Will. 3. and his reports down to that time are published. [Lev. ii. p. 257, 260. Show. ii. p. 471.]

" 2. William Gregory, made a baron of the Exchequer, in 1679, was removed in the be-membrance, it has gone thus, then there are sufficient precedents in the matter.

Sir R. Sawyer. But, my lord, I desire to ginning of 1685, (2 Jac. 2.) and on February the 13th his place was supplied by sir Thomas Jenner. At the revolution he was made a justice of the King's-bench. [Comp. Hist. iii. p. 444. Mod. iii. p. 253.]

"3. Sir Thomas Jones made chief justice of the Common Pleas in 1683, (35 Car. 2.) was discharged the day before Easter term in 1686, (2 Jac. 2.) and succeeded by sir Henry Bedingfield. The cause of his removal was, notwithstanding the application of the king, his positively refusing to support the dispensing power of the crown. [Skin. p. 251. Show. ii. p. 471. Mod. iii. 99. Comp. Hist. iii. p. 451. See also Reresby's Memoirs, p. 233.]

"4. William Montague, appointed chief baron of the Exchequer in 1676, (28 Car. 2.) was removed in Easter term, 1686, (2 Jac. 2.) and succeeded by sir Edward Atkyns one of the barons of that court. This removal was occasioned by his refusal to support the dispensing power. [Show. ii. p. 471. Mod. iii. p. 99.]

"5. Sir Job Charlton, was chief justice and one of his majesty's council at Ludlow for the marches of Wales, with which he had a pension because he did not practise at the bar. Sir George Jeffryes being Recorder of London, and desirous to enjoy his place, prevailed upon him, contrary to his inclination, to become one of the justices of the Common Pleas in April, 1680, and then obtained the appointment with the same pension, though he still continued to practise, and to be Recorder of the City of London. This is one of the signal frauds in the public revenue mentioned by lord keeper North. Sir Job Charlton was removed in 1686 for resisting the dispensing power, but upon his petition was replaced in his former situation with a patent of precedency as he had been a judge, and to wear a judge's robe at Chester. He was succeeded according to 2 Shower's Reports by — Powell. [Comp. Hist. iii. p. 391. Show. ii. p. 94. Dalr. Mem. App. to 1. Part ii. p. 103. Mod. iii. p. 99. Show. ii. p. 471.]

"6. Sir Edward Nevill, was made a baron of the Exchequer in the long vacation 1685, (1 Jac. 2.) and was removed in the Christmas vacation of 1686, for resisting the claim to the dispensing power, and was succeeded by sir Thomas Jenner. At the restoration [revolution] he resumed his seat in that court. Show. ii. p. 434, 436. Skin. p. 237.]

"7. Sir Edward Herbert, was made chief justice of the King's Bench in the long vacation of 1685, (1 Jac. 2.) and removed into the Common Pleas and made chief justice of that court, on the 21st of April, 1687, (P. 3. Jac. 2.) [Show. ii. p. 434. Mod. iii. p. 125. Comb. p. 47.] The removal of this judge, and sir Francis Wythens from the same bench, forms one of the most serious charges against James the second. In prosecution of his arbitrary and bigotted designs, he had deemed it necesknow, whether that were the ancient course, Mr. Solicitor?

Sol. Gen. They that make the objection sary to have a well disciplined standing army at his command, and for the purpose of keeping his soldiers in a state of strict subordination to their officers, and enforcing a prompt obedience to his commands, had determined to revive an obsolete statute*, and a soldier of the name of Beale, (or Dale) was indicted for deserting, tried at Reading, convicted, sentenced to be hanged, and respited. [Inst. iii. p. 86. Rep. vi. p. 27. Mod. Rep. iii. p. 124. Show. Rep. ii. p. 511.] The king was extremely anxious that the sentence should be put in execution at Plymouth, where the troops were in the garrison, to which the prisoner belonged, that his example might make a stronger impression upon the soldiers there, as well as upon the army in general. For this purpose the attorney general, on Saturday the 15th of April in Easter term, 1687, moved in the court of King's Bench, where sir Edward Herbert presided, and Wythens, Powell and Holloway were justices, (all of whom, it is observable, were removed from that bench within little more than a year afterwards) that execution should be awarded against the prisoner, and that he might be executed at Plymouth. The chief justice in some heat refused the motion, as irregular, the prisoner not being before the court. The attorney general then moved for and obtained a Habeas Corpus to bring up the prisoner, and on Tuesday the 18th of April it was moved again. The chief justice and Wythens were of opinion, that the law did not authorize the court to make the order, for the prisoner could be executed only in the proper county where the trial and conviction was, or in Middlesex where the court of King's Bench sat. The order being refused, the prisoner was committed to the prison of the King's Bench. But James was determined to carry his point,† and on the 20th of April, two days afterwards, sir Francis Wythens was removed, and sir Richard Allibone appointed in his room, and on the

* "The statute is not mentioned in either of the reports of the case, but the prosecution must have been founded upon either the 7 H. 7. c. 1, or the 3 H. 8. c. 5. See Co. Rep. vi. p. 27. 3 Instit. p. 86." Heywood.

† "The extreme anxiety of James about his army may be traced in a case, which occurred previously to that mentioned above. Browne was an attorney, and being employed by one Corbet, had arrested a soldier without leave, and both of them had been committed to the custody of a messenger for so doing. They were brought into the King's Bench by Habeas Corpus in the Michaelmas term, 2 Jac. 2. but the warrant being under the hand of the king, without any seal, or mention of any officer, it was held to be illegal, and they were discharged.—Rose v. Browne, and others, Show. Rep. ii. p. 484." Heywood.

ought to prove it to be otherwise of old ; but I 21st, sir Edward Herbert was obliged to change situations with sir Robert Wright, who had been appointed chief justice of the court of Common Pleas in the preceding term. On that same day, so indecently anxious was the king, sir Robert Wright took his seat, as chief justice, Holloway and Powell justices being also on the bench, but sir Richard Allibone not making his appearance, and the prisoner being again brought up, an order was granted for his execution at Plymouth, which was accordingly carried into effect.

" 8. Sir Francis Wythens was made a justice of the King's Bench in 1683 ; removed in 1687, (E. 3 Jac. 2.) on the 26th of April, for the same reason as sir Edward Herbert, and succeeded by sir Richard Allibone. He came on the next day to Westminster-hall, and practised as a serjeant. In the year 1680 he had been expelled the House of Commons for preferring a petition to the king, against the right of the people to petition, and was excepted out of the general act of indemnity after the Revolution. [Show. ii. 512. Comp. Hist. iii. p. 385. 468. 557. Wynn. p. 37.]

" 9. Sir Richard Holloway was appointed a justice of the King's Bench in the long vacation, 1683, (35 Car. 2.) and removed in Trinity vacation, 1688, (4 Jac. 2.) for his honest conduct in the trial of the seven bishops ; and succeeded by sir Thomas Powell, a baron of the Exchequer. [Skin. p. 122. 486. Mod. iii. p. 239. Comb. p. 95.]

" 10. Sir John Powell was appointed one of the justices of the King's Bench in 1687, and removed in Trinity vacation, 1688, for the same reason as sir Richard Holloway ; and was succeeded by sir Robert Baldock. At the Revolution he was made a justice of the Common Pleas. Comp. Hist. iii. p. 486. Mod. iii. p. 239. Comb. p. 95.]

" 11. Sir Christopher Milton was a Catholic, and appointed one of the justices of the King's Bench in April, 1687 ; and in July, 1688, he had a writ of ease, for which the ostensible reason was his great age and infirmities ; but they must have come upon him suddenly, for he was made a baron of the Exchequer only in Easter term, 1 and 2 Jac. 2. He was removed in good company, with Holloway and Powell. Perhaps it might be thought that, however strong his wishes to serve the prerogative and further the royal cause, it might not be prudent to leave him the senior puisne judge. He was succeeded by sir Thomas Jenner, a baron of the Exchequer. [Comp. Hist. iii. p. 468. 486. Skin. p. 521.]

" 12. Sir Richard Heath was made a serjeant in 1683 ; appointed one of the barons of the Exchequer in April, 1686 ; and removed the 3d of November, 1688. He was succeeded by John Rotherham, whose call to be a serjeant is no where recorded. [Comp. Hist. iii. p. 451. Beatson's Pol. Ind. Wynne, p. 37. note.]

" 13. Charles Ingleby was a Catholic, and will name sir Robert Sawyer another case, and made a baron of the Exchequer in Trinity vacation (4 Jac. 2.) 1688. He was removed November the 3d, in the same year ; and the vacancy does not appear to have been filled up before James abdicated the throne." Mod. iii. p. 239. Beatson.

With respect to Street, Beatson (who, however, as Mr. Serjeant Heywood observes, is by no means always correct as to such matters) represents his appointment of Baron of the Exchequer to have been made April 21, 1681, and revoked October 28, 1684 ; and that on October 29, 1684, he was made a puisne judge of the Common Pleas. I speak of the first edition of Beatson, which mentions no more of Street. But I have in my custody [August, 1811] a MS. Collection of Reports made by Street himself, which Mr. Hargrave has lent to me : and from the contents of this I infer that Street was a judge of the Common Pleas, Mich. 36 Car. 2. Trin. 1 Jac. 2, and also Trin. 4 Jac. 2.

It appears from the following passage in Narcissus Luttrell's MS. " Brief Historical Relation," &c. that the removal of Jones, Levinz, and Montague was expected within a few days after the accession of king James.

" Feb. 14, 1685. A proclamation by his majesty hath been published, reciting that whereas the commissioners of the treasury to his late majesty, had, on the 5th instant (but the day before his majesty died) contracted and agreed with three persons for three years for the whole duty of excise, rendering the rent of 550,000*l.* per annum ; and that the said contract is good for that part of the excise which was to determine by his late majesty's death, notwithstanding the same ; he did command the said persons to collect the same and pay their rent, and all his subjects to pay the same.

" His majesty (as is said) advised with his judges about it, and four of them were of opinion the contract was not good in law ; they were the lord chief justice Jones, Mr. Justice Levinz, lord chief baron Montague, and Mr. Baron Atkins ; since which, some are apt to think they will have their quietus sent them."

I find by the Commons' journals, that on Friday, December 17, 1680, the House having been resolved into a committee of the whole house, Mr. Powle reports from the committee of the whole house, That the committee having taken the matters to them referred into consideration, had agreed upon several resolves ; which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered them in at the clerk's table, where the same were read ; the second of which is as follows :

Resolved, " That it is the opinion of this committee, that the house be moved that a bill be brought in, that the Judges may hold their places and salaries quam diu se bene gesserint."

The above resolution being, together with that is the case of sir Samuel Barnardiston, which was the case of a very light libel too, but received a heavy fine to plead immediately, and it cost him 10,000*l.* fine.

L. C. J. Well, gentlemen, have you done on either side?

Serj. Pemberton. If your lordship will please to give us time till to-morrow morning, we will come hither by rule of court, and bring you some certificates and affidavits, or else some precedents, that we hope will satisfy your lordship in this matter.

L. C. J. No, brother, we cannot do that; the question is, what the course of the court is? We have an account of that from sir Samuel Astry, for twelve years of his own knowledge, and from Mr. Waterhouse by him for sixty years; but for Mr. Waterhouse they except against him, and say he was a person that was always lazy and did not so well understand his business, and now is superannuated: that is the others, read a second time, and a motion being made, that the words "hereafter to be named and appointed," be inserted after the word "judges," and before the word "may," and that the words "and also to prevent the arbitrary proceedings of the judges," be added at the end; which being agreed to by this house:

Resolved, "That this house doth agree with the committee, That a Bill be brought in, that the Judges, hereafter to be made and appointed, may hold their places and salaries quam diu se bene gesserint; and also to prevent the arbitrary proceedings of the Judges."

No such bill, however, was passed into a law, till the statute of 12 and 13 William 3.

Concerning the constitution of the Scots Judges during this period, Mr. Hume, in his Commentaries, after deducing the history of the court of justiciary to the year 1671, says:

"At this period, it was judged proper by his majesty, and certainly not without sufficient reasons, to throw the whole of this department into an entire new and more provident order; such as might be followed with more honour and authority, and a higher security for the qualifications and good deportment of the Judges, than under those occasional and discretionary nominations of Justices-depute and assessors. With this salutary purpose, on considering a report made to him by certain counsellors, with whom he thought proper to advise concerning the best means of attaining this important object, his majesty, on the 11th of January, 1671, issued a commission of justiciary in a new form, and purporting to be intended as a model of all commissions for the future; and whereof the substance, along with a set of articles subjoined to it, for the regulation of criminal process, was therefore immediately transferred into a law,—that part of the statute 1672, c. 16, which has for title, Concerning the Justice Court. This act suppresses the office of justice-depute, and said, but is but gratis dictum, perhaps it may be so, perhaps not; and they have offered to examine Mr. Ince about some opinion that he has had from this Mr. Waterhouse: it may be he may have asked him some question that may lead to it, and he may have given him some slight answer; but then here are these two persons, Mr. Harcourt and Mr. Sillyard, and the one has been a clerk these sixteen or seventeen years, and the other has known the office thirty years, though there were not heretofore so many informations of this nature and kind as now of late, but still they say, that a person that comes in upon a commitment, or a recognizance, shall never have any imparlance.

Sol. Gen. Can they give any one instance that has any the least shadow to the contrary?

Mr. Pollexfen. My lord, if we had time, we hope we should be able to satisfy you in this matter.

Sol. Gen. You have had time enough to orders that the criminal court shall consist of five of the lords of session, added to the justice-general and justice-clerk; of which the justice-general, and in his absence, the justice-clerk to be president, and, in default of these, any one of their number, chosen by themselves.

"Whether the new judges were to hold their places for their lives, or during the pleasure only of the king, the statute did not express. The commission of January 1671, which in substance the statute ratifies," [I do not find, in the 'act concerning the Justice Court,' any specific reference to the commission of January 1671, or any mention of it: but from what Mr. Hume says, I conclude, that the provisions of that act, so far as they extend, are in conformity with the commission,] "was, however, to the persons there named, 'pro omnibus eorum vitæ diebus.' But it was otherwise with the next commission, that of the 19th of July, 1675, which was only to subsist "durante nostro bene placito:" and such also was the tenor of the three succeeding commissions; of the 18th November 1678, 20th April, 1685, and 18th July, 1687; which last, moreover, for reasons which sufficiently appear in history, indulged the judges with a dispensation as to the taking of the test oath, or any other but the oath de fidei. In pursuance, accordingly, of the prerogative thus claimed by his majesty, several judges were removed and restored at pleasure, in those jealous and arbitrary times. At the revolution, therefore, it was made an article of the claim of right, "that the changing of the nature of the Judges gifts ad vitam aut culpam into commissions durante bene placito, is contrary to law." In consequence, no such discretion is reserved in the next commission, that of the 27th January, 1690, which is the last of those general commissions."

prepare yourselves for this question, if you had thought you could do any good in it.

L. C. J. Would the course of the court be otherwise to-morrow than it is to day? We have taken all the care we can to be satisfied in this matter, and we will take care that the lords the bishops shall have all justice done them, nay they shall have all the favour by my consent that can be shewn them, without doing wrong to my master the king; but truly I cannot depart from the course of the court in this matter, if the king's counsel press it.

Att. Gen. My lord, we must pray your judgment in it, and your direction, that they may plead.

L. C. J. Truly, I think they must plead to the information.

Att. Gen. Sir Samuel Astry, pray ask my lords whether they be Guilty or Not Guilty.

Then his Grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury stood up, and offered a Paper to the court.

L. Arch. of Canterbury. My lord, I tender here a short plea (a very short one) on behalf of myself and my brethren, the other defendants; and I humbly desire the court will admit of this plea.

L. C. J. If it please your grace, it should have been in parchment.

Sol. Gen. What is that my lord offers to the court?

L. C. J. We will see what it is presently, Mr. Solicitor.

Bish. of Peterb. I pray, my lord, that the Plea may be read.

Sol. Gen. But not received.

Att. Gen. No, we desire to know what it is first.

Sir R. Sawyer. Mr. Attorney, if they will plead, the court sure is obliged to receive it.

L. C. J. If it is a plea, your grace will stand by it.

L. Archbish. of Cant. We will all stand by it, my lord: it is subscribed by our counsel, and we pray it may be admitted by the court.

Serj. Pemberton. I hope the court will not deny to receive a special Plea, if we offer one.

L. C. J. Brother, let us hear what it is.

Sol. Gen. Read it if you please, but not receive it.

Clerk reads the Plea; which in English is thus:

‘THE BISHOPS’ PLEA.

‘And the aforesaid William archbishop of Canterbury, William bishop of St. Asaph, Francis bishop of Ely, John bishop of Chichester, Thomas bishop of Bath and Wells, Thomas bishop of Peterborough, and Jonathan bishop of Bristol, being present here in court in their own persons, pray oyer of the information aforesaid; and it is read to them, which being read and heard by them the said archbishops and bishops, the said archbishops and bishops say, that they are peers of this kingdom of England, and lords of parliament, and each of them is one of the ‘peers of this kingdom of England, and a lord of the parliament, and that they being (as before is manifest) peers of this kingdom of England, and lords of parliament, ought not to be compelled to answer instantly for the misdemeanour aforesaid, mentioned in the said information exhibited here against them in this court; but they ought to be required to appear by due process in law issuing out of this court here upon the information aforesaid, and upon their appearance to have a copy of the said information exhibited against them, and reasonable time to imparle thereupon, and to advise with counsel learned in the law, concerning their defence in that behalf, before they be compelled to answer the said information: whereupon, for that the said archbishop and bishops were imprisoned, and by writ of our lord the king, of Habeas Corpus, directed to the lieutenant of the Tower of London, are now brought here in custody, without any process upon the information aforesaid issued against them, and without having any copy of the said information, or any time given them to imparl, or be advised, they pray judgment, and the privilege of peers of this kingdom, in this case to be allowed them; and that they the said archbishop, and bishops, may not be compelled instantly to answer the information aforesaid, &c.

ROBERT SAWYER.

HEN. FINCH.

HEN. POLLEXFEN.’

Att. Gen. My lord, with your lordship's favour, this, in an ordinary person's case, would perhaps be thought not fair dealing, or that which (it being in the case of these reverend prelates) I shall not now name; to make all this debate and stir in a point of this nature; to take the judgment of the court after three or four hours arguing, and when the opinion of the court has been delivered, then to put in a plea to the jurisdiction of the court—

Sir R. Sawyer. It is no such plea.

Att. Gen. It is so in effect: but certainly it is such an irregularity, and such an unfair way of proceeding, as would not be endured in an ordinary case; and I hope you will give so little countenance to it, as to reject it, and make them plead according to the usual course and way of proceedings. Certainly a plea of this nature, after so long an argument, would be reckoned nothing but a trick.

Serj. Pemberton. We hope the court and you are not of one mind, Mr. Attorney, in this matter; we desire the court to receive the plea.

Att. Gen. With submission, the court is not bound to receive pleas that are put in purely for delay, as this is; for the judgment of the court has been already given in the very matter of this plea; and for rejecting a plea, it is done every day; if a man puts in a meer trifling dilatory plea, the court may reject it. Does this plea contain any thing in it, but what has been argued and debated pro and con, and settled by the court already? If they will put in any plea in chief they may, but such a plea as this, I hope shall not have so much countenance as to be received by the court.

Mr. Pollexfen. Do you demur to it? if you please, Mr. Attorney, we will join in demurrer with you.

Att. Gen. No, there will be no need of that.

Sol. Gen. Surely the court will never give so much countenance to it, as to receive it.

Mr. Finch. If you will please either to reply or demur, Mr. Solicitor, we are here to maintain the plea.

Sol. Gen. If you were here, you would say the same thing that we do. My lord, this plea is, that my lords the bishops are not bound to plead instantly; so that 'tis not a question, whether they ought to answer, or not to answer; but whether they ought to answer immediately. And what do they say more? They would have an imparlance, and time to consult with their counsel what they shall plead, which is all but one and the same thing in writing, which they have discoursed all this day. And what is the reason they give for this? They induce it thus: these, my lords the bishops, are peers of the realm, and so ought not to be compelled to plead immediately: this, if I mistake not, is the sum of their plea. Now pray, my lord, what sort of plea is this? It is not a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, though it do in a sort decline the justice of the court. Is it a plea in abatement? No, it is not; for it is only to gain time to plead. And do they now offer any thing more for themselves, than what was said by their counsel before? They write they are peers of the realm, and that such is the privilege of the peers, that they ought to have an imparlance, and time to plead, and that they ought not to answer presently. My lord, this matter that they write, was said by their counsel, and hath been long agitated in the court already: your lordship, and the court, have given your judgment, and we know your lordship and the court will not admit of tricks* to delay the king's causes. We all know that the term is a short term; and what I said in the beginning upon this matter, I say again, it is the interest, and for the honour of my lords the bishops (if they understand their own interest, and value their honour) to have this cause tried as soon as may be; but this trifling and tricking† is only for delay and must disparage their cause: for what issue can be taken by the king

* In sir William Williams's MS. the word 'tricks' is obliterated, and the phrase 'such trivial delays' is substituted.

† In sir William Williams's MS. the words 'and tricking' are obliterated, and the preceding phrase 'it is the interest and for the honour of my lords the bishops, if they understand their own interest and value their honour' is altered so as to stand thus: 'it is the interest, and for the honour of my lords the bishops, and of value to their honour.'

upon this plea thus offered? Certainly none. And if we should demur, what will be the end of that, but only to gain time to slip over the term? If there were any thing worth consideration in this plea, and that had not been already debated and settled, then it might concern us to give some answer to it; but we have spent three hours, by my watch*, in the dispute, and the matter having been over-ruled already, it is time to have an end of it. Sure the court will never be so treated by these persons that are of counsel for my lords the bishops, for it cannot be thought that this kind of delay proceeds from my lords the bishops themselves; and whether the court will be so served, we submit it to your lordship. Certainly you will not receive such a plea as this, especially it being in paper, you will never countenance such a practice, so far as to give these lords time to trifle with the court.† If any such thing as a plea be tendered to the court, it ought to be in parchment; and if they would have an imparlance, there ought to have been an entry of a 'petit licentiam interloquendi' upon the roll. The entry of this writing and to advise upon it will be a blemish to your roll, for this in effect is no more than a prayer of an imparlance, which when grantable, ought to be entered of course, together with such prayer upon the roll, and you take it of course; but if it be not of course, it cannot come in by way of plea, it must be by suggestion upon the roll, and a 'Conceditur' entered. If this be admitted as a precedent, every man hereafter that comes in upon an information, will take advantage of it, and plead such a plea as this is, and thereby gain time. If you grant an imparlance in this case upon this plea, you must grant an imparlance in every case. Certainly the law is not to be altered; the method of proceeding ought to be the same in every case. And I hope you will not make a particular rule in the case of my lords the bishops, without a special reason for it.

Serj. Pemberton. We put in this plea, my lord, and are ready to abide by it; and we say that, according to the course of the court, it ought to be received.

Att. Gen. No, but good Mr. Serjeant, 'tis in the discretion of the court whether they will receive it or not; for the matter has been in debate already, and has received a determination; the court has overruled them in this very point already, and there is no more in this plea than was in the argument before, and therefore it ought to be rejected as a frivolous plea.

Sol. Gen. Here is a plea offered in writing, and in paper; the court sees what it is, and I hope you will give no countenance to it.

* In sir William Williams's MS. the phrase 'by my watch' is obliterated, and the word 'already' substituted.

† In sir William Williams's MS. this is altered thus 'to give time to consider of this paper.'

Mr. Pollexfen. I do hope, my lord, you will not judge this a frivolous plea; I think our case is such, that you will not do that: if you think fit you may over-rule it, but I hope you will not refuse it.

Sol. Gen. The court will certainly reject a frivolous plea, and they may do it, as is usually done by the courts in cases of pleas apparently frivolous as this is.

Mr. Pollexfen. But, Mr. Solicitor, I hope the court will consider of it, whether it be a frivolous plea or not. It is true, there has been a debate about the course of the court, and there has been an examination of the clerk of the office, and the court has gone upon his certificate; but yet still perhaps it may remain in doubt, and it being a question of such a consequence as this, it may very well deserve the court's consideration. There never was a judicial settlement of it that I know of yet; nor do I know any way of having it satisfactorily settled, but by the judgment of the court entered upon record. Here we offer a plea that contains the matter in debate, and this plea will appear upon record; and if upon consideration of the plea your lordship shall think fit to over-rule it, and be of opinion against the plea, then will you, by your resolution, in a judicial way, settle the question that has hitherto been in controversy.

L. C. J. Mr. Pollexfen, I would ask you, whether the counsel have dealt ingenuously with the court or no in this matter, after four hours debate, and the opinion of the court delivered, to come and sum up all the arguments in such a plea as this, and so put us upon debating it over again?

Mr. Pollexfen. My lord, certainly this has been done before, without offence. After we had moved for a thing which was denied upon motion, it is no such great disrespect to the court, with submission, to put the same matter into a plea, for the judicial opinion of the court.

Sir R. Sawyer. That, without all question, has been done a great many times.

Sol. Gen. How many times have you been accused of playing tricks, sir Robert Sawyer?

Sir R. Sawyer. Not so many as you, Mr. Solicitor.

Sol. Gen. I don't ask it, as if I questioned it; for I assure you, I don't doubt it of your part at all.

L. C. J. Pray, gentlemen, don't fall out with one another at the bar: we have had time enough spent already.

Mr. Pollexfen. Truly, my lord, I would not trick with the court in any case, nor on the other side would I be wanting to advise, and do for my client what I am able, and lawfully may. We have laboured all we could to get time for my lords the bishops to imparle to this information; and we have been the more earnest in it, because it concerns us, who attend this bar, to take what care we can that the course of the court may be observed; but as for this matter, we suppose this practice of the court is not in law a good practice. Now what way in the world has any man to bring this so in question, as to have a judicial resolution of the court about it, but by such a plea? We take it, that it is usual and legal for us to have an imparlance, and a man would imparle, but the court upon motion refused to give him an imparlance. Is it not, think you, very fit for the party to have this judicially entered upon record? where all this matter will appear, and the party may be relieved by Writ of Error, if the judgment of the court should be wrong; but truly I cannot see how the court can refuse the plea; for if so be a plea be pleaded, they have their liberty to answer it on the other side by a replication, or else to demur, and the judgment of the court may be had upon it one way or other; but the court will never go about to hinder any man from pleading where he may plead by law. Here is a plea put in, and the court sure will take no notice what is the matter of the plea, till the other party have either replied or demurred. The same thing may happen in any other plea that is pleaded, and the party will be without remedy upon a Writ of Error, because the plea being rejected, there does nothing appear upon record. Truly for the court to reject and refuse the plea, would be as hard as the refusing the imparlance, and we know no way we have to help ourselves.

Sol. Gen. You might have entered your suggestion for an imparlance upon the roll, and then it would have appeared upon record, and if the court had unjustly denied it you, you would have had the benefit of that suggestion elsewhere. Truly, my lord, I think if any thing be tricking, this is, for it is plainly ill pleading.

Mr. Finch. Then pray demur to it.

Sol. Gen. No, Sir, 'tis fencing with the court, and that the court won't endure. It is only to delay; and if we should demur, then there must be time for arguing; and what is the question after all, but whether you would be of the same opinion to-morrow, that you are to-day?

Sir R. Sawyer. I would put Mr. Solicitor in mind of Fitz-Harris's Case,* which he knows very well: he put in a plea, and we for the king desired it might not be received; but the court gave him time to put it into form, and I was fain to join in demurrer presently, and so may these gentlemen do if they please.

Sol. Gen. Yes, sir Robert Sawyer, I do know the case of Fitz-Harris very well; I was assigned of counsel by the court for him; we were four of us, and there was a plea put in, but no such plea as this. There was an indictment of high-treason against him, in which case it is agreed on all hands, that the party must answer presently; but because he suggested here at the bar, and says he, I have matter to plead to the jurisdiction of the court, and shewed what it was. I was impeached before the lords in parliament for High-treason, for the same matter of which I am here accused. The court did give him time to put this into form, and we were assigned his counsel to draw it up for him, and accordingly we did put that matter into a plea, that he was here indicted for one and the same high-treason for which he was impeached in parliament, and that that impeachment was still depending, and so we rested in the judgment of the court, whether we should be put to answer it here. This was a plea that carried something of weight in it, and not such a trifling plea as this is. It is true, sir Robert Sawyer, who was then attorney-general, did press the court to over-rule it immediately; but it being a matter of some importance, the court would not do that, but had it argued solemnly by counsel on both sides, and at last there was the opinion of three judges against one, that the plea was no good plea. But what is that to such a trifling plea as this?

Att. Gen. Pray, my lord, favour me a few words about that case of Mr. Fitzharris. It is true, there was a plea put in, and it is true also, that that which brought that plea to be argued, was the demurrer that was put in by sir Robert Sawyer, who was so zealous and hasty in the matter, that because the court did not presently over-rule the plea, as he desired, he immediately demurred, before the rest of the king's counsel could offer at any thing about it; and thereupon it was put to the judgment of the court, and no doubt must be argued, and spoke to on both sides; but where pleas are really in abuse of the court, the court never gives any countenance to them: nay, truly I have known another course taken; I am unwilling to mention a case that happened much about that time too in this court; because of that regard I have to my lords the bishops, but sir Robert Sawyer remembers it very well, I am sure: it was the case of one Whitaker, who for a thing like this, putting in a trifling plea, not only had his plea rejected, but something else was ordered. I could shew the precedent, but that I am more tender than to press it in this case, because there the court ordered an attachment to go against him; but I will put these gentlemen in mind of another case, and that is the case of a peer too: it is the case of my lord Delamere, which they cannot but remember, it being in the highest case, a case of treason.* When my lord Delamere was arraigned, and to be tried for High Treason, he put in a plea before my lord chancellor, who was then high steward, and sir Robert Sawyer, who was then attorney-general, prayed the lord steward, and the peers, to reject it, and the court did reject it, (as we hope the court will do this,) and would never so far delay justice as to admit of a plea that carried no colour in it, and there was no demurrer put into the plea, but it was absolutely refused. My lord, in this case we have had the judgment of the court already, and therefore we must now desire that this plea may be rejected.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we have now gone out of the way far enough already: it is time for us to return, and bring the case into its due methods. We pray your lordship to reject this plea.

Sir R. Sawyer. My lord, we are in your judgment, whether you will receive this plea or not.

L. C. J. You shall have my judgment presently; but my brothers are to speak first.

Just. Allybone. Mr. Pollexfen makes it a question, whether this plea may be rejected, or whether it ought to be received, and the court give their judgment upon it.

Just. Powell. Truly I do not know whether the court can reject this as a frivolous plea.

L. C. J. Surely we may, and frequently do.

Att. Gen. You do it every day, it is a frequent motion: if a frivolous plea be put in, before it be entered upon record, as a plea, the court may refuse it, if they see cause.

Just. Allybone. Truly if it may be, this appears to me a frivolous plea.

Just. Powell. I do not know how the court can reject any plea that the party will put in, if he will stand by it, as they say they will here; and I cannot think this a frivolous plea, it concerning the privilege of peers, and lords of parliament.

Just. Allybone. Brother Powell, I would be as tender of the privileges of parliament, and speak with as much respect of the privileges of the peerage as any body else; but for the matter of the plea, truly it appears to me, that the peers are named in it only for fashion sake, and it is frivolous.

Just. Powell. The matter of the plea, except only their being said to be peers and lords of parliament, was spoke to before, but it was only obiter and by way of motion; but now it may come before us for our judicial determination.

Just. Allybone. Pray let the plea be read again. [Which was done.] This plea is no more but that which has been denied already upon solemn debate; and if it be in the power of the court to reject any plea, surely we ought to reject this. Indeed I know not what power we have to reject a plea; but if we have power, this ought to be rejected.

Just. Powell. I declare my opinion; I am for receiving the plea, and considering of it.

Just. Holloway. I think as this case is, this plea ought not to be received, but rejected, because it is no more than what has been denied already. I am not ashamed to say, that I should be very glad and ready to do all things that are consistent with my duty, to shew respect to my lords the bishops, some of whom are my particular friends; but I am upon my oath, and must go according to the course of law.

L. C. J. We have asked, and informed ourselves from the bar, whether we may or can reject a plea; and truly what they have said, hath satisfied me that we may, if the plea be frivolous; and this being a plea that contains no more than what has been over-ruled already, after hearing what could be said on both sides, the court is not bound to receive the plea, but may reject it, and my lords the bishops must plead over.

Att. Gen. We pray they may plead in chief.

Clerk. My lord archbishop of Canterbury, is your grace guilty of the matter charged upon you in this information, or not guilty?

Archbishop of Cant. Not guilty.

Clerk. My lord bishop of St. Asaph, is your lordship guilty of the matter charged upon you in this information, or not guilty?

Bishop of St. Asaph. Not guilty.

Clerk. My lord bishop of Ely, is your lordship guilty of the matter charged upon you in this information, or not guilty?

Bishop of Ely. Not guilty.

Clerk. My lord bishop of Chichester, is your lordship guilty of the matter charged upon you in this information, or not guilty?

Bishop of Chichester. Not guilty.

Clerk. My lord bishop of Bath and Wells, is your lordship guilty of the matter charged upon you in this information, or not guilty?

Bishop of Bath and Wells. Not guilty.

Clerk. My lord bishop of Peterborough, is your lordship guilty of the matter charged upon you in this information, or not guilty?

Bishop of Peterborough. Not guilty.

Clerk. My lord bishop of Bristol, is your lordship guilty of the matter charged upon you in this information, or not guilty?

Bishop of Bristol. Not guilty.

Att. Gen. My lord, I pray the clerk may join issue on the behalf of the king, so that we may come to trial; and we would have these gentlemen take notice, that we intend to try this cause on this day fortnight; and we pray liberty of the court, that we may try it at bar.

L. C. J. Are you not too hasty in that motion, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. My lord, we should indeed make it the motion of another day; but we do now tell them this ex abundanti, because my lords the bishops are now here, and will, I suppose, take notice, that we do intend to move it another day.

Sol. Gen. We now give them notice, that we intend to move.

Sir R. Sawyer. For that you need not trouble yourselves; we are very desirous it should be tried at bar, and that as soon as you please.

Att. Gen. Well then, you take notice it will be tried this day fortnight.

L. C. J. Well, what shall we do with my lords the bishops?

Att. Gen. They areailable, no question of it, my lord, if they please.

L. C. J. Then, my lords, we are ready to bail you, if you please.

Sir R. Sawyer. We desire your lordship would be pleased to take their own recognizance.

L. C. J. What say you, Mr. Attorney? I think that may do well enough.

Att. Gen. My lord, with all my heart; we will do it.

L. C. J. In what penalty shall we take it?

Att. Gen. One thousand pound I think, my lord, his grace, and five hundred pounds a-piece the rest.

Sir R. Sawyer. What necessity is there for so much?

Att. Gen. Look you, sir Robert Sawyer, to shew you that we do insist upon nothing that shall look like hardship, what my lords have been pleased to offer concerning taking their own recognizance, we agree to, and what sums the court pleases.

Sol. Gen. It is all one to us; we leave it wholly to the court.

Sir R. Sawyer. Only I have one thing more to beg of your lordship, on the behalf of my lords the bishops, that you will please to order, that in the return of the jury there may be forty-eight returned.

Att. Gen. I tell you what we will do; sir Samuel Astry shall have the Freeholders Book, if you please, and shall return twenty-four.

Sir R. Sawyer. Eight and forty has been always the course, when the jury is returned by sir Samuel Astry.

Sol. Gen. My lord, I pray the officer may return the jury, according as is usual in cases of this nature.

Att. Gen. Do you admit of a trial at bar, gentlemen?

Sir R. Sawyer. Yes, and try it when you will.

L. C. J. They say it shall be this day fortnight, and let there be a jury according to the usual course.

Sir R. Sawyer. We pray it may be in the presence of the Attorneys and Solicitors on both sides.

L. C. J. What is the usual course, sir Samuel Astry? Do you use to return twenty-four, or forty-eight, and then strike out twelve a-piece, which I perceive they desire for the defendants?

Sir S. Astry. My lord, the course is both ways, and then it may be as your lordship and the court will please to order it.

L. C. J. Then take forty eight, that is the fairest.*

Att. Gen. We agree to it; we desire nothing but a fair jury.

Sir R. Sawyer. Nor we neither; try it when you will.

L. C. J. Take a recognizance of his grace my lord of Canterbury in 200*l.* and the rest of my lords in 100*l.* a-piece.

Att. Gen. What your lordship pleases for that, we submit to it.

Clerk. My lord of Canterbury, your grace acknowledges to owe unto our sovereign lord the king the sum of 200*l.* upon condition that your grace shall appear in this court on this day fortnight, and so from day to day, till you shall be discharged by the court, and not to depart without leave of the court. Is your grace contented?

* See the Case of the King v. Horne, A. D. 1776, in this Collection.

Archb. of Canterbury. I do acknowledge it.

Clerk. " T. POWYS.

" W. WILLIAMS."

To this Information the Defendants have pleaded not guilty, and for their trial have put themselves upon their country, and his majesty's attorney general likewise, which country you are. Your charge is to enquire whether the defendants, or any of them, are guilty of the matter contained in this information that hath been read unto you, or not guilty. If you find them, or any of them guilty, you are to say so; and if you find them, or any of them, not guilty, you are to say so, and hear your evidence. Crier, make proclamation.

Crier. O yes! If any one will give evidence on behalf of our sovereign lord the king, against the defendants, of the matters whereof they are impeached, let them come forth, and they shall be heard.

Mr. Wright. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, this is an information exhibited by his majesty's Attorney General against the most reverend my lord archbishop of Canterbury, and six other honourable and noble bishops in the information mentioned: and the information sets forth, that the king, out of his clemency and benign intention towards his subjects of this kingdom, did put forth his royal Declaration, bearing date the 4th day of April, in the third year of his reign, entitled, 'His majesty's gracious Declaration to all his loving subjects for liberty of conscience;' and that afterwards, the 27th of April, in the 4th year of his reign, he published another Declaration, both which have been read to you; and for the further manifestation and notification of his grace in the said declaration, bearing date the 27th of April last, his majesty did order, that the said declaration should be read on the 20th and 27th of May in the cities of London and Westminster, and ten miles about; and on the 3rd and 10th of June throughout the whole kingdom: and that the right reverend the bishops should send the said Declaration to be distributed throughout their respective dioceses, to be read accordingly. But that the said archbishop and bishops the 18th of May, in the said fourth year of his said majesty's reign, having conspired and consulted among themselves to diminish the king's power and prerogative, did falsely, unlawfully, maliciously, and scandalously make, compose, and write a false, scandalous, malicious and seditious libel, under pretence of a petition; which libel they did publish in the presence of the said king; the contents of which libel you have likewise heard read. To this they have pleaded not guilty: you, gentlemen, are judges of the fact; if we prove this fact, you are to find them guilty.

Att. Gen. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, you have heard this information read by the clerk, and it has been likewise opened to you at the bar; but before we go to our evidence, perhaps it may not be amiss for us, that are of counsel for the king, now in the beginning of this cause, to settle the question right before you, as well to tell you what my lords the bishops are not prosecuted for, as what they are. First, I am to tell you, and I believe you cannot yourselves but observe, that my lords are not prosecuted as bishops, nor much less are they prosecuted for any point or matter of religion, but they are prosecuted as subjects of this kingdom, and only for a temporal crime, as those that have injured and affronted the king to his very face; for it is said to be done in his own presence. In the next place, they are not prosecuted for any nonfeasance, or not doing or omitting to do any thing, but as they are actors, for censuring of his majesty and his government, and for giving their opinion in matters wholly relating to law and government: and I cannot omit here to take notice, that there is not any one thing that the law is more jealous of, or does more carefully provide for the prevention and punishment of, than all accusations and arraignments of the government. No man is allowed to accuse even the most inferior magistrate of any misbehaviour in his office, unless it be in a legal course, though the fact is true. No man may say of a justice of peace to his face, that he is unjust in his office. No man may tell a judge, either by word or petition, you have given an unjust, or an ill judgment, and I will not obey it; it is against the rules and law of the kingdom, or the like. No man may say of the great men of the nation, much less of the great officers of the kingdom, that they do act unreasonably or unjustly, or the like; least of all may any man say any such thing of the king; for these matters tend to possess the people, that the government is ill administered; and the consequence of that is, to set them upon desiring a reformation; and what that tends to, and will end in, we have all had a sad and too dear bought experience: the last age will abundantly satisfy us, whither such a thing does tend. Men are to take their proper remedies for redress of any grievances they lie under, and the law has provided sufficiently for that. These things are so very well known to all men of the law, and indeed to all the people of England of any understanding, that I need not, nor will not, stand any longer upon it, but come to the matter that is now before you, gentlemen, to be tried. The fact that we have laid we must prove, rather to keep the formality of a trial, than to pretend to inform you, or tell you what you do not know: it is publicly notorious to the whole world; but because we must go on in the regular methods of law, we shall prove the facts in the order they are laid in the information. First, we take notice, that his majesty, of his great clemency and goodness to his people, and out of his desire that all his subjects might live easily under him, (of which I think never prince gave greater or more plain evidence of his intentions that way) the 4th of April, 1687, he did issue forth his royal declaration for liberty of conscience. This matter, without all question, was welcome to all his people that stood in need of it; and those that did not could not but say, the thing in the nature of it was very just and gracious; but presently it must be surmised, that the king was not in earnest, and would not, nor could not, make good his promise: but to take away all surmises, his majesty was pleased by his declaration of the 27th of April last, not only to repeat his former declaration, but likewise to renew his former promises to his people, and to assure them that he still was, and yet is, of the same opinion that he had at first declared himself to be of; nay, we further shew you, that to the end that this thing might be known to all his people, even to the meanest men, who, it may be, were not willing or able to buy the declaration, and that the king himself might be under higher obligations, if it were possible, than his own word, he was desirous it should be repeated in the churches, and read in that sacred place, that all his people might hear what he had promised, and given his own sacred word for; and he himself might be under the solemn tie and obligation to keep his word, by remembering that his promises had, by his own command, been published in the time of divine service, in the house of God; and thereupon was the order of council made, that has been likewise read to you, which does direct, that it should be read in all the churches and chapels in the kingdom; and you have heard, and we shall prove, what a return his majesty has had for this grace and kindness of his: you'll find, when they come to read that which they call a petition, all their thanks his majesty had for his favour and goodness to his people, 'tis only hard words, and a heavy accusation, such as a private person would be little able to bear. I will not aggravate the matter, but only say thus much, that his majesty, who was always a prince of as great clemency as ever this kingdom had, and who was represented for all that as a prince of the greatest cruelty, before his accession to the crown, by his enemies, is now accused by his friends for this effect of his mercy. My lord, and gentlemen of the jury, his majesty resented this ill usage so far, that he has ordered, and thought fit to have a public vindication of his honour in this matter, by this trial; and we shall go on to our proofs, and we do not doubt but you will do his majesty (as you do all other persons) right.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we will go on to prove the parts of this information; and we will proceed according to the method which Mr. Attorney has opened, and which is pursuant to the order of the facts laid in the information. Give us the first Declaration under the Great Seal; the Declaration of the 4th of April, 1687.

[The Declaration was delivered into the Court.]

Sol. Gen. Read the date of it first.

Clerk reads. 'Given at our Court at White-hall, the 4th day of April, 1687, and in the third year of our reign.'

Sol. Gen. Read the title of it, Sir.

Clerk. It is intituled, 'His Majesty's gra‘ cious Declaration to all his loving subjects for ‘ liberty of conscience.’

Sir R. Sawyer. Is it under seal? Is the Great Seal to it?

Sol. Gen. Give it down to sir Robert Sawyer, that he may see it; for I would have every thing as clear as possible. Sir Robert Sawyer, will you have it read?

Sir R. Sawyer. No, we would save as much of the time of the court as may be.

Sol. Gen. Then pray put in the second Declaration of the 27th of April last.

Clerk reads. ‘ Given at our court at Whitehall, the 27th day of April, 1688, in the 4th year of our reign; and it is entitled, his Majesty’s gracious declaration.’

Sir R. Sawyer. Is that under the great seal too?—Clerk. Yes, it is.

Sol. Gen. Deliver that down likewise that they may see it.

Sir R. Sawyer. We are satisfied, you need not read it.

Sol. Gen. Then where is the order of council for the reading of it?

Att. Gen. Swear sir John Nicholas. There he is. [Sir J. Nicholas sworn.]

L. C. J. Come, Mr. Attorney, what do you ask sir John Nicholas?

Sol. Gen. Hand the order to sir John Nicholas. Is that the order of council, sir John?

Sir J. Nicholas. The book, Sir, is not in my custody. There is the Register that keeps it, he has it here to produce.

Sol. Gen. Swear Mr. Gantlett. [Mr. Gantlett sworn.] Is that the council-book?

Mr. Gantlett. Yes, this is the council-book.

Sol. Gen. Then turn to the order of the 4th of May, the king’s order of council for the reading the Declaration.

Mr. Gantlett. There it is, sir. [The book delivered into court.]

Sol. Gen. Read it, I pray.

Clerk reads. ‘ At the court of Whitehall, the 4th of May, 1688,’ and so reads the Order of council.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we have one thing that is mentioned in the information, that this Declaration was printed; if that be denied, we will call Henry Hills, his majesty’s Printer, because we would prove all our information as it is laid.

L. C. J. You must do so, Mr. Solicitor; you must prove the whole Declaration.

Sol. Gen. Crier, call Henry Hills. [He was called, but did not presently appear.] Call Mr. Bridgman. Though these declarations prove themselves, we have them here printed. But swear Mr. Bridgman. [Mr. Bridgman sworn.] Shew Mr. Bridgman the two Declarations.

L. C. J. What do you ask him?

Sol. Gen. We ask you, Sir, if the two Declarations were printed?

Mr. Bridgman. What Declarations do you mean, Mr. Solicitor?

Sol. Gen. You know what Declarations I mean well enough; but we’ll ask you particularly. You know the Declaration that was made the 4th of April, in the third year of the king. Was it printed?

Mr. Bridgman. Yes, it was printed by the king’s order.

Sol. Gen. Was that of the 27th of April in the 4th year of the king, printed?

Mr. Bridgman. Yes, they were both printed by the king’s order.

Att. Gen. Then the next thing in course is the bishops’ Paper.

Sir R. Sawyer. Mr. Bridgman, pray let me ask you one question; did you ever compare the print with that under seal?

Mr. Bridgman. I did not compare them, sir Robert Sawyer.

Sol. Gen. He does swear they were printed by the king’s order.

Sir R. Sawyer. Good Mr. Solicitor, give me leave to ask him a question. Can you swear then that they are the same?

Mr. Bridgman. I was not asked that question, sir.

Sol. Gen. Come then, Mr. Bridgman, I’ll ask you. Do you believe they are the same?

Sir R. Sawyer. Is that an answer to my question?

Sol. Gen. We must ask him questions as well as you, sir Robert. What say you, do you believe it to be the same?

L. C. J. You hear Mr. Solicitor’s question, answer it, Mr. Bridgman.

Mr. Bridgman. Yes, my lord, I do believe it.

L. C. J. Well, that’s enough.

Att. Gen. If there were occasion, we have them here compared, and they are the same.

Sir R. Sawyer. With submission, my lord, in all these cases, if they will prove any fact that is laid in an information, they must prove it by those that know it of their own knowledge. Do you know it to be the same?

Sol. Gen. That’s very well, Sir.

Sir R. Sawyer. Ay, so it is, Mr. Solicitor. It is a wonderful thing, my lord, that we cannot be permitted to ask a question. Do you know it to be the same, Mr. Bridgman, I ask you again?

Mr. Bridgman. I have not compared them, I tell you, sir Robert Sawyer.

Sir R. Sawyer. Then that is no proof.

L. C. J. Would you have a man swear above his belief? He tells you he believes it is the same.

Sir R. Sawyer. Is that proof of an information?

L. C. J. Well, you’ll have your time to make your objections by and by.

Att. Gen. Then swear sir John Nicholas.

Sir J. Nicholas. I am sworn already.

Att. Gen. I see you have a paper in your hand, sir John Nicholas; pray who had you that paper from?

Sir J. Nicholas. I will give you an account of it as well as I can.

Mr. Pollexfen. Before they go to another thing, my lord, we think they have failed in their proof of their information, about the printing this Declaration.

Att. Gen. Where is Mr. Hills?

Just. Allybone. They have laid that it was printed by the king's order; and it is such a matter, Mr. Solicitor, as you may clear if you will, sure.

Sol. Gen. There is Mr. Hills; now I see him.

L. C. J. I was going to give order, that you should send to the printing-house for him.

Just. Allybone. They may put this matter out of doubt too, if they will, on the other side; for I see they have a copy in print, and there's the original; they may compare them if they please.

Sol. Gen. I am very glad to hear such a strong objection.

Sir R. Sawyer. We would clear the way for you, Mr. Solicitor.

Sol. Gen. No, you put straws in our way; we shall be able enough to clear it without your help. Swear Mr. Hills, and young Mr. Graham here. [Hills and Graham sworn.]

Sol. Gen. Mr. Graham, did you compare any of these printed declarations with the original?

Graham. Yes, I did compare some of them, and did make amendments as I went along.

Sol. Gen. Shew one that you have compared with the original.

Att. Gen. Hills is here himself, we'll ask him. Are you sworn, Sir?

Crier. He is sworn.

Att. Gen. Pray, were the king's Declarations for Liberty of Conscience printed, both of them?

Hills. Ay, an't please you, Sir.

Att. Gen. You printed them, I think?

Hills. Yes, I did print them.

Sir R. Sawyer. Mr. Hills, you say they were printed: upon your oath, after they were printed, did you examine them with the original under seal?

Hills. They were examined before they were printed.

Sir R. Sawyer. Did you examine them?

Hills. I did not; here's one that did.

Sol. Gen. Who is that?

Hills. It is Mr. Williams here.

Sol. Gen. Swear him. [Williams sworn.] Do you hear, Williams? Do you know that the king's Declarations for Liberty of Conscience, two of them, one of the 4th of April, and the other of the 27th of April, were printed?

Williams. Yes, my lord.

Sol. Gen. Did you examine them after they were printed, by the copy they were printed from?—Williams. I did.

Sol. Gen. Where had you the copy? Who had you it from?

Williams. I had it from Mr. Hills.

Sir R. Sawyer. Mr. Williams, did you examine them with the original under the great seal?—Williams. The first Declaration I did.

Sir R. Sawyer. The second Declaration is the main.

Williams. The second was composed by the first.

Sir R. Sawyer. Why, is there no more in the second Declaration than there was in the first?—Williams. Yes, there is, Sir.

Sir R. Sawyer. Did you examine that with the original under the great seal?

Williams. No, I did not.

Sol. Gen. Can any one tell who did examine it under the great seal?

Mr. Finch. Pray, what did you examine it by, Mr. Williams?

Williams. By a copy that I received from Mr. Hills.

Att. Gen. Then we will go on; and we desire sir John Nicholas to give an account where he had that paper that he has in his hand?

Mr. Finch. My lord, it does not appear that the copy that was printed is the true copy of the Declaration.

Att. Gen. He says he had it from Mr. Hills.

Mr. Finch. Pray, Mr. Hills, what did you examine that copy by which you gave to Mr. Williams?

Hills. I had the copy from Mr. Bridgman.

Mr. Finch. Did you examine it with the original under the great seal?

Hills. I did not examine it; I had it from Mr. Bridgman.

Mr. Finch. What, was it under seal?

Mr. Bridgman. It was the original signed by the king.

Mr. Finch. But I ask you, was it under seal?

Mr. Bridgman. Not under the great seal it was not, it was the very Declaration the king signed.

Sir R. Sawyer. But it ought to be compared with the original, or it is no good proof that it is the same.

Sol. Gen. Sir Robert Sawyer, you understand collation better, sure; you should be ashamed of such weak objections as this.

Williams. We never bring our proof to the great seal.

Sir R. Sawyer. But if you will have it proof at law, you must have it compared with the original.

Sol. Gen. Do you think there is any great stress to be laid upon that? We only say it was printed.

Sir R. Sawyer. But you have made it part of your information, and therefore you must prove it.

L. C. J. I think there's proof enough of that; there needs no such nicety.

Mr. Pollexfen. Well, my lord, we must submit, let them go on, we won't stand upon this.

Att. Gen. Then pray let me go on. Where had you that paper, sir John Nicholas?

Sir J. Nicholas. I had this paper from the king's hand.

L. C. J. Put it in.

Sol. Gen. Who had you it from, do you say?

Sir J. Nicholas. From the king.

Sol. Gen. About what time had you it from the king, Sir?

Sir J. Nicholas. I had it twice from the king.

Sol. Gen. When was the first time, Sir?

Sir J. Nicholas. The first time was in the council, the 8th of this month.

Sol. Gen. What became of it afterwards?

Sir J. Nicholas. The king had it from me the 12th, and the 13th I had it from the king again.

Sol. Gen. Pray, deliver it this way into the court: we will now go on, and prove the bishops hands to it. This is the Paper upon which we bring this Information: gentlemen, it is all the hand-writing of my lord archbishop, and signed by him and the rest of the bishops.

Att. Gen. I suppose my lords the Bishops will not put us to prove it, they will own their hands.

L. C. J. Yes, Mr. Attorney, their counsel will put you to prove it; I perceive your best way is to ask nothing of them.

Att. Gen. My lord, we will desire nothing of them. We will go on to our proofs. Call sir Thomas Exton, sir Richard Raynes, Mr. Brooks, Mr. Recorder, and Mr. William Middleton. [Sir Thomas Exton appeared, and was sworn.]

L. C. J. What do you ask sir T. Exton?

Att. Gen. Pray convey that paper to sir Thomas Exton.

Sol. Gen. Shew that paper to sir Thomas Exton. Sir Thomas, I would ask you one question: Do you know the hand-writing of my lord archbishop of Canterbury?

Sir T. Exton. I'll give your lordship what account I can.

Sol. Gen. Pray, Sir, answer my question; do you know his hand-writing?

Sir T. Exton. I never saw him write five times in my life.

Sol. Gen. But I ask you, upon your oath, do you believe that to be his hand-writing?

Sir T. Exton. I do believe this may be of his hand-writing.

Sol. Gen. Do you believe all the body of it to be of his hand-writing, or only part of it?

Sir T. Exton. I must believe it to be so, for I have seen some of his hand-writing, and this is very like it.

Sol. Gen. What say you to the name? Do you believe it to be his hand-writing?

Sir T. Exton. Yes, yes, I do.

Sol. Gen. Do you know any of the rest of the names that are upon that paper?

Sir T. Exton. No, I do not.

L. C. J. Do you for the defendants ask sir Thomas Exton any question?

Sir R. Sawyer. No, my lord.

Att. Gen. Then call sir Richard Raynes.

Sir T. Exton. My lord, sir Richard Raynes has been sick this month, and has not been at the Commons.

Sol. Gen. We have no need of him. Call Mr. Brooks. [Mr. Brooks sworn.]

Att. Gen. Pray shew Mr. Brooks that paper.

Sol. Gen. Mr. Brooks, I ask you this question, do you know my lord archbishop's hand-writing?—Mr. Brooks. Yes, my lord.

Att. Gen. Pray look upon that paper; do you take that to be my lord archbishop's hand?

Brooks. Yes, my lord, I do believe it to be my lord archbishop's hand.

Att. Gen. What say you to the whole body of the paper?

Brooks. I do believe it to be his hand.

Att. Gen. What do you say to his name there?

Brooks. I do believe this name is his hand-writing.

Sol. Gen. Call Mr. William Middleton.

Att. Gen. Pray, Mr. Brooks, don't go away, but look upon the names of the bishop of St. Asaph, and my lord of Ely.

Sol. Gen. Do you know my lord bishop of St. Asaph's hand-writing?

Brooks. I have seen my lord archbishop of Canterbury, and the bishop of St. Asaph's hand-writing, and I do believe this is his hand.

Sol. Gen. Look you upon the name of my lord Ely; do you know his hand-writing?

Brooks. My lord, I am not so well acquainted with my lord of Ely's writing.

Sol. Gen. But have you seen his writing?

Brooks. Yes, I have.

Sol. Gen. Is that his writing, do you think?

Brooks. It is like it.

Sol. Gen. Do you believe it to be his hand?

Brooks. Truly I do believe it.

Sir George Treby. Did you ever see him write?—Brooks. No, sir.

Sol. Gen. But he has seen his writing.

Sir G. Treby. How do you know that it was his hand-writing that you saw?

Brooks. Because he owned it.

L. C. J. How do you know it, do you say?

Brooks. I know it, I say, because I have seen a letter that he writ to another person, which he afterwards owned.

L. C. J. What did he own, Mr. Brooks?

Brooks. That he wrote a letter to another person, which I saw.

Sir G. Treby. To whom, Sir?

Sir R. Sawyer. Have you the letter here, Sir?

Brooks. No, Sir, the letter was writ to my lord bishop of Oxford.

Sir G. Treby. Can you tell what was in that letter?

Att. Gen. What is that to this question? You ask him how he knows his hand-writing; and, says he, I did not see him write, but I have seen a letter of his to the lord bishop of Oxford.

L. C. J. And he does say, my lord of Ely owned it to be his hand that is there.

Sol. Gen. No, my lord, that's a mistake, he owned a letter that he had writ to the bishop of Oxford to be his hand-writing, and by comparison of this with that, says he, I take this to be his hand-writing.

Brooks. That is my meaning, my lord.

Sol. Gen. Pray, speak out, and tell us what are the reasons that make you say you believe this to be the bishop of Ely's writing.

Brooks. Because it resembles a letter that I have by me of his writing to the bishop of Oxford.

Sol. Gen. And you say he owned that letter to be his?

Brooks. My lord bishop of Oxford did answer it, and I waited upon the bishop of Ely with the answer, and he did own it.

Sir G. Treby. How did he own it, Sir?

Brooks. I had some communication with my lord of Ely, about the substance of that letter, and therefore I apprehended he owned it.

Just. Powell. That's a strange inference, Mr. Solicitor, to prove a man's hand.

Att. Gen. We have more evidence; but let this go as far as it can.

Serj. Pemberton. Certainly, my lord, you will never suffer such a witness as this?

L. C. J. Brother Pemberton, I suppose they can prove it otherwise, or else this is not evidence.

Just. Powell. So they had need, for it is a strange inference of Mr. Solicitor, that this is a proof of my lord of Ely's hand-writing.

Just. Holl. The bishop of Oxon was dead before any of this matter came in agitation.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we will bring other proofs. Call Mr. Chetwood and Mr. Smith.

[Mr. Chetwood and Mr. Smith sworn.]

Sol. Gen. Mr. Chetwood, we would know of you if you know my lord bishop of Ely's hand-writing?

Chetwood. I never saw him write.

Sol. Gen. That's not an answer to my question: do you know his hand-writing?

Chetwood. I do not certainly know it.

Sol. Gen. Have you seen any of it?

Chetwood. I have seen my lord of Ely's writing, that has been said to be his.

L. C. J. But surely you had better take a witness that has seen him write.

Just. Powell. I think it is hardly possible for a man to prove his hand, that has not seen him write.

L. C. J. I think it is better proof indeed, to bring some that has seen him write.

Chetwood. My lord, it is a long time since I saw my lord of Ely's writing.

L. C. J. Pray bring some other proof, if you have it.

Bishop of Peterborough. My lord, we are here as criminals before your lordship, and we are prosecuted with great zeal: I beg your lordship that you will not be of counsel against us, to direct them what evidence they shall give.

L. C. J. My lord of Peterborough, I hope I have not behaved myself any otherwise hitherto than as becomes me: I was saying this (and I think I said it for your lordship's advantage,) that this was not sufficient proof; and I think, if your lordship observed what I said, it was for you, and not against you.

Bishop of Peterborough. It was to direct them against us, how they should give evidence.

Serj. Pemberton. Pray, my lord of Peterborough, sit down, you'll have no wrong done you.

VOL. XII.

Sir R. Sawyer. We that are of counsel will take care of that; and pray, my lord, will you please to pass it by?

L. C. J. We are not used to be so served, and I will not be used so.

Sol. Gen. If your lordship pleases to pass that by; for what your lordship said was in favour of my lords the bishops; but I see they do not take it so.

Att. Gen. Pray, Mr. Chetwood, do you look upon the name of my lord of Ely; do you believe that to be his hand-writing?

Chetwood. I do believe it is.

Sir R. Sawyer. That's very well, when he says he never saw him write.

Just. Powell. What is the reason of that belief of his I would fain know?

Chetwood. I have formerly seen his hand, I think it was his; but I never saw my lord of Ely write his hand.

Sir R. Sawyer. Then the question is, whether this be evidence?

Mr. Finch. How do you know that that which you saw formerly was my lord of Ely's hand?

Chetwood. I have no such certainty as positively to swear that that was his hand.

Sol. Gen. We will go on to other proofs, and if we want better evidence at the end, we will argue with them.

Chetwood. I am not certain that what I saw was my lord of Ely's hand-writing, because I never saw him write.

Sol. Gen. You do very well to shew your good affection.

Att. Gen. Mr. Smith, I would ask you this question, do you know my lord of Ely's hand-writing?

Mr. Smith. I have seen it often.

Att. Gen. Look upon the name of my lord of Ely in that paper; do you believe it to be my lord's hand-writing or no?

Smith. I did not see him write it, Sir; I cannot tell whether it is or no.

L. C. J. Did you ever see his name?

Smith. Yes, but it was a great while ago, and here are but seven letters, and I cannot judge by that: I was better acquainted with his hand-writing heretofore.

Sol. Gen. Pray, Sir, answer me; do you believe it to be his writing, or do you not?

Smith. I believe it may; for I did not see him write it.

Sol. Gen. But my question is, do you believe it, or do you not?

Smith. I say I was better acquainted with it heretofore than I am now.

Sol. Gen. But pray answer my question; do you believe that to be my lord of Ely's hand-writing, or do you not?

Smith. I believe it may, Sir.

Sir R. Sawyer. Why do you believe it?

Smith. I have no other reason to believe it, but because I have seen something like it.

Just. Powell. How long ago is it since you saw him write?

Smith. I have not seen him write, so as to take notice of it, for some years, I could better judge of it when he writ his name Turner, than now it is Ely, because there was more letters to judge by. [Mr. Middleton sworn.]

U

L. C. J. Here's Mr. Middleton; what do you call him for?

Sol. Gen. To prove many of their hands.

Att. Gen. Pray shew him that paper.

Sol. Gen. First, Mr. Middleton, do you know my lord archbishop's hand-writing?

Middleton. I have seen his grace's hand-writing.

Sol. Gen. Do you believe it to be his?

Middleton. It is very like it.

Sol. Gen. But do you believe it, or do you not?—Middleton. I do believe it.

Sol. Gen. Do you know my lord bishop of St. Asaph's hand-writing?

Middleton. I never saw it as I know of.

Sol. Gen. What do you say to my lord of Ely? His name is next.

Middleton. It is like his lordship's hand.

Sol. Gen. Do you believe it, or do you not?

Middleton. It is like it, that's all that I can say.

Sol. Gen. Cannot you tell whether you believe it, or not believe it?

Middleton. I do believe it is his hand.

Sol. Gen. Did you ever see him write? For I would clear this matter beyond exception.

Middleton. I have seen his lordship write, but I never stood by him so near as to see him make his letters.

Sol. Gen. Is that his hand-writing?

Middleton. It is like it, I believe it is his.

Sol. Gen. You did not guide his hand, I believe. Do you know my lord of Chichester's hand-writing?

Middleton. Sir, I am acquainted with none of their hands, but with my lord of Canterbury's, and my lord of Ely's.

Sol. Gen. Do you know my lord of Peterborough's hand-writing?

Middleton. I had my lord of Peterborough's writing two years ago for some money, but I cannot say this is his.

Sol. Gen. Do you believe it to be his?

Middleton. I never took notice of it so much as to say, I believe it to be like it; I never saw it but once.

Sol. Gen. Do you know any other of the names there? What say you to the bishop of Bristol's name?

Middleton. I saw once my lord of Bristol's hand-writing.

Sol. Gen. What say you to that writing there?

Middleton. It is like it.

Sol. Gen. Do you believe it to be his, or no?

Middleton. Truly, that I cannot say, for I never saw it but once.

L. C. J. You never saw him write, did you?

Middleton. No, my lord, I never did.

Sol. Gen. Then we will call sir Thomas Pinfold, and Mr. Clavel. Sir Thomas Pinfold is there, swear him. [Sir Thomas Pinfold sworn.]

Sol. Gen. Sir Thomas Pinfold, do you know my lord bishop of Peterborough's hand-writing?

Sir T. Pinfold. Truly, not very well; I never saw but one letter from him in my life: shew me his hand, and I will tell you—[Which was done.]

Sol. Gen. Well, Sir, what say you to it?

Sir T. Pinfold. Then upon my oath, I say, I cannot well tell upon my own knowledge that it is his hand.

Sol. Gen. I ask you, do you believe it to be his hand?

Sir T. Pinfold. Sir, upon the oath that I have taken I will answer you, that upon this account, that I have heard there was a Paper delivered by my lords the bishops to the king, and this paper that you offer me, I suppose to be the same; upon that score I do believe it, but upon any other score I cannot tell what to say.

Sol. Gen. I ask you upon your oath, Sir, do you believe it is his hand-writing or no?

Sir T. Pinfold. Sir, I have answered you already, that upon my own knowledge I cannot say it is his hand-writing; but because I have heard of such a Paper, I do believe it may be his.

L. C. J. Did you ever see my lord bishop write?

Sir T. Pinfold. I have been in his chamber several times when he has been writing, but I had more manners than to look upon what he writ.

L. C. J. Did you never see him write his name?

Sir T. Pinfold. I do not know that I ever saw him write his name, but I have seen him writing, I say, and so my lord bishop may have seen me writing, but I believe he does not know my hand.

Sol. Gen. You have seen him write, you say?

Sir T. Pinfold. I tell you, Mr. Solicitor, I have been in his chamber when he has been writing, but I had more manners than to look over him.

Just. Powell. Then you did never see any of that writing

Sir T. Pinfold. I cannot say, I did, my lord.

Att. Gen. Pray did you never see any of his writing but that letter you speak of?

Sir T. Pinfold. No, not that I remember.

Just. Powell. Mr. Solicitor, you must call other witnesses, for this does not prove any thing.

Att. Gen. We will go on. Swear Mr. Clavel. [Mr. Clavel sworn.]

Sol. Gen. Do you know my lord bishop of Peterborough's hand-writing, or no?

Mr. Clavel. I have seen it many times.

Att. Gen. Do you know it when you see it?

Clavel. I believe I do, Sir.

Sol. Gen. Pray look upon that Paper, and upon your oath tell us, do you believe that name to be his writing or no?

Clavel. I do believe it is, my lord.

Att. Gen. Pray look upon the rest of the hands there, do you know any of the other names?—Clavel. No, I do not.

Att. Gen. Have you ever seen any of their writing?

Clavel. It is probable I may have seen some, but do not now remember it.

Sol. Gen. I think you are a bookseller, Mr. Clavel?—Clavel. Yes, I am so, Sir.

Sol. Gen. I suppose you have had some dealings with them in the way of your trade. Did you never see any of their writing?

Clavel. I have seen the names of some of them, but is so long since that I cannot remember.

L. C. J. Did you ever see my lord of Peterborough write?

Clavel. I cannot tell whether I ever saw him write his name or not; but I have had several letters from my lord of Peterborough.

Sol. Gen. Is that his hand-writing?

Clavel. I cannot say it is, I believe it is.

Sol. Gen. You have had letters from him you say?

Clavel. Yes, and it seems to be like his hand.

Mr. Pollexfen. But you never saw him write his hand, you say?

Clavel. I cannot say I ever did.

Sol. Gen. These letters that you have received from my lord of Peterborough, did he own them? Do you think they were counterfeit, or of his own hand-writing?

Clavel. I suppose he has owned them, Sir.

Just. Powell. But you must answer directly, Sir, did he own them?

Sol. Gen. What did those letters concern? Were they about books, or what?

Clavel. They were sometimes about one business, sometimes about another.

Sol. Gen. Was the subject matter of any of these letters about money, and was it paid you? Did you receive, or did you give any account of it?—

Clavel. They were about several businesses.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Clavel, you must give us as particular account as you can.

Sol. Gen. Pray, Sir, upon those letters were the things done that those letters required?—Clavel. Yes, they were.

Sol. Gen. Did you do your part?

Clavel. Yes, I did.

Sol. Gen. Now, I would ask you, do you believe that name of my lord bishop of Peterborough to be the hand-writing of my lord bishop?—Clavel. I believe it is.

Just. Powell. Do you know that those letters that you say you received from my lord, were of my lord's own hand-writing? Do you swear that?

Clavel. My lord, I cannot swear that.

Mr. Finch. Do you know whether the letters that you received, as you say, were written by my lord himself, or by his secretary?

Clavel. I have received letters from him, and his secretary too.

Sir George Treby. But were you present with him when he writ any letters with his own hand?

Sol. Gen. You do not mean a letter to yourself sure, sir George?

Sir George Treby. No, Sir, I say any letters.

Clavel. I have been present with my lord often, but I cannot say I have seen my lord write.

L. C. J. He has here told you, he has had several letters of my lord's own hand, and from his secretary too.

Just. Powell. He has said it, but you see he says he never saw him write.

Sol. Gen. We have given evidence against my lord archbishop, lord bishop of Ely, St. Asaph, Peterborough, and Bristol.

Just. Powell. Certainly, Mr. Solicitor, you mistake. But go on.

Sol. Gen. We have given evidence I say against them, Sir, but whether it be sufficient evidence, we shall argue by and bye. Call Mr. Hooper and Mr. Chetwood again. [Mr. Chetwood appeared.]

Sol. Gen. Do you know the hand-writing of my lord bishop of Bath and Wells?

Chetwood. I have seen it twice or thrice, but it is a considerable time since I did see it.

Sol. Gen. Do you believe that is his hand-writing?

Chetwood. I never saw him write his name in my life.

Sol. Gen. Pray look upon the name, and tell us what you believe of it.

Chetwood. I believe it may, but I do not certainly know it to be his hand; I rather believe it is my lord bishop of Bath and Wells his hand, than I believe that other to be my lord of Peterborough's.

Sir George Treby. Do you believe that to be my lord of Peterborough's hand, or no?

Chetwood. I say, I rather believe that this is the bishop of Bath and Wells his writing, than that which is above it or below it, to be their writing; but truly I do not distinctly know my lord bishop of Bath and Wells his hand.—Sol. Gen. Call Mr. Hooper.

L. C. J. You are very lame in this matter.

Sol. Gen. The witnesses are unwilling, and we must find out the truth as well as we can. [Mr. Hooper did not appear.]

Sol. Gen. Call Mr. James and Mr. Powell. [Mr. James appeared and was sworn.]

Sol. Gen. Do you know my lord bishop of Bristol's writing, Mr. James?

James. Yes, I believe I do, but I am not so certain, because my lord writes several times several hands.

Sol. Gen. Shew him the paper: is that my lord of Bristol's hand?

James. I cannot say it is or no.

Sol. Gen. What do you believe?

James. It looks like his hand, and that's all I can say.

Sol. Gen. But pray hearken, and answer to what I ask you; you are prepared for one question it may be, and I shall ask you another: upon your oath, do you believe it to be the hand-writing of my lord of Bristol?

James. Upon my oath, I can only say it looks like it, that's all.

L. C. J. Did you ever see him write?

James. Yes, my lord, I have seen his hand-writing several times, and it is like his hand-writing, that is all I can say.

Sol. Gen. Sir, remember you are upon your oath, and answer my question.

James. Upon my oath, I know no more than that, sir William Williams.

Sol. Gen. I ask you, sir, whether you believe it to be his hand or not?

James. My lord, it looks like his hand, and it may be his hand.

Att. Gen. But do you think and believe one way or other: what do you believe?

James. It may be his hand for what I know, and it may not.

Sol. Gen. It may be your hand.

James. No, Sir, it cannot be mine, I am sure.—Sol. Gen. What do you believe?

James. I believe it may be his hand, or it may not be his hand, that is all I can say.

L. C. J. Come, Sir, you must answer fairly. Do you believe it to be his hand, or do you not.—James. Yes, I do believe it.

Att. Gen. You are very hard to believe, methinks.—James. No, I am not.

Sol. Gen. You do very well now, Mr. James; when you do well, we'll commend you.

Att. Gen. Call Mr. Nathaniel Powell. [Mr. Powell was sworn.]

Sol. Gen. Pray, Sir, let's know what's your name?

Powell. My name is Nathaniel Powell.

Sol. Gen. Pray do you know the hand-writing of my lord bishop of Chichester?

Powell. I have not seen the paper, Sir.

Sol. Gen. Do you know his hand-writing.

Powell. Yes, I believe I do.

Sol. Gen. Look upon that name of his.

Powell. I did not see my lord write that.

Sol. Gen. Who says you did? You were not asked that question; how you answer! Pray, Sir, remember your oath, and answer the question asked you, seriously; do you believe it to be his writing or no?

Powell. I believe it is like my lord's hand-writing, but I never did see him write it.

Sol. Gen. No man says you did.

Powell. Therefore I cannot swear positively it is his hand.

Sol. Gen. We do not ask that neither.

Powell. I cannot tell whether it be his hand or no.

L. C. J. Sir, you must answer the question directly and seriously: do you believe it, or do you not believe it?

Powell. I cannot tell what to believe in the case.

Sol. Gen. Then I ask you another question, upon your oath, do you believe it is not his hand?—Powell. I cannot say that neither.

Sol. Gen. Once again, I ask you, upon your oath, do you believe it to be his hand? I ask you plainly, and let mankind judge of your manner of swearing.

Powell. I tell you, Sir, I cannot tell what to believe.

Sol. Gen. My lord, if these things be endured, there will be an end of all testimony, if witnesses do not answer fairly to the questions that are asked them.

Just. Powell. Truly to me, for a man to swear his belief in such a matter, is an extraordinary thing.

Sol. Gen. He is obliged to answer questions when they are fairly put to him; and in proving of hands this is the usual question, and few can answer otherwise than as they believe.

Mr. Pollexfen. I think that is a hard question, not to be answered.

Sol. Gen. Make your exceptions to the evidence if you please.

L. C. J. First he says, he knows his hand; then he says, he has seen him write; and then he says, he did not see him write this; but he shuffles, he won't answer whether he believes it or not.

Mr. Pollexfen. The question is, Whether belief in any case be evidence?

Sol. Gen. If they have a mind to a bill of exceptions upon that point, let them seal their bill, and we'll argue it with them when they will; in the mean time we'll go on, and that which we now pray, my lord, is, that this paper may be read.

Att. Gen. We have given sufficient evidence sure to have it read, therefore we desire it may be read.

Serj. Levinz. My lord, before this paper be read, we hope you will let us be heard to it: we think that what they desire (to have this Paper read) ought not to be: for what is all the proof that they have given of this paper? They have a proof by comparison of hands, which in a criminal case ought not to be received: and besides, my lord, what is that comparison of hands that they have offered? Some persons come here and say, they cannot tell whether it be their hands, they believe it may or may not, for aught they know; how shall we convict any man upon such a testimony as this? Can we have our remedy against him for perjury, for saying, he believes it to be our hand? Therefore here is not any evidence to charge us. For first, It is only a comparison of hands; and secondly, that comparison is proved in such an uncertain manner: some of them tell you, they do not know what to believe; another tells you, I believe it is rather such a lord's hand, than the others are such a lord's hand; I believe 'tis rather his hand than that above it, or that below it. What sort of proof is all this? Therefore we pray it may not be read, till they prove it better.

Serj. Pemberton. Pray, my lord, spare me a word or two in this matter for evidence sake: there is a great deal of reason we should take exceptions to the evidence that has been given:

for truly, I think I never heard such a sort of evidence given before. It is a case of as great concernment as ever was in Westminster-Hall; and for them to come to prove hands only by those that saw letters, but never saw the persons write, this, I hope, will not amount to so much as a comparison of hands. Your lordship knows, that in every petty cause, where it depends upon the comparison of hands, they use to bring some of the party's hand-writing which may be sworn to, to be the party's own hand, and then it is to be compared in court with what is endeavoured to be proved, and upon comparing them together in court, the jury may look upon it, and see if it be right; and never was there any such a thing as this admitted in any poor petty cause, that is but of the value of forty shillings. And therefore as to this evidence, first, We say comparison of hands ought not to be given at all in the cases of criminals; and I believe it was never heard of that it should. In the next place, if it be admitted to be evidence, yet it is not such an evidence, as that by comparison of hands the jury can take notice of it; for in such manner of proofs by comparison of hands, the usage is that the witness is first asked, concerning the writing he produces, Did you see this writ by the defendant, whose hand they would prove? If he answers, Yes, I did, then should the jury upon comparison of what the witness swears to, with the paper that is to be proved, judge whether those hands be so like as to induce them to believe that the same person writ both; and not that the witness should say, I had a letter from such a person, and that is like the hand of that letter, therefore I believe it to be his hand: my lord, I hope this shall never be admitted for evidence in this court.

L. C. J. I do take it, that the witness himself is judge of the comparison; for if he does know the party's hand, and a paper be offered him to prove the party's hand, he is to compare it in his own mind.

Serj. Pemberton. It never was admitted to be so, that I know of, my lord, or ever read of.

Sol. Gen. You may remember several cases about that, particularly Mr. Algernon Sidney's Case.* The principal evidence against him to prove him guilty of treason, was by comparison of hands and believing evidence.

Mr. Pollexfen. Pray, my lord, hear me a little as to that: it is a point of very great moment, whether in the case of a misdemeanor, either in an indictment or information, it be good evidence to offer comparison of hands;† and that this court did adjudge quite contrary upon an indictment of forgery against my lady Carr, appears in Syderfin's Reports: they went to prove her letters written by her to Cox; the court rejected it, and gave their judgment here, that it was no evidence; and that for this reason, because of the evil consequences of it: for, said they, it is an easy matter for any man's hand to be counterfeited; that they sure will agree, for frequent daily experience shews how easily that may be done: is it not easy then to cut any man down in the world, by proving it like his hand? And proving that likeness by comparing it with something that he hath formerly seen? This strikes mighty deep; the honestest man in the world, and the most innocent may be destroyed, and yet no fault to be found in the jury or in the judges; if the law were so, it would be an unreasonable law. Next, my lord, for the case of Sidney, that was a case of treason. Now in the case of treason there is always other evidence brought; and this evidence comes in but as a collateral evidence, to strengthen the other; but in this case it is the single evidence, for aught that appears, for there is nothing more, for aught I can see, in the case, but whether this were their hands, and proved only by what another believes: now shall any be condemned by another's belief without proof? Surely, my lord, that was never evidence yet to convict any one; so that their proof fails in both points; for first, it ought to be considered, whether a comparison of hands be evidence in a case of misdemeanor? And next, if it be evidence, whether you will take it, that the belief of a man that brings nothing to compare with it, or never saw the party write, but has received letters, and says, this is like it, and therefore he believes it to be his hand, be good evidence as a comparison of hands.

Serj. Pemberton. My lord, they are pleased to mention—

Sol. Gen. Mr. Serjeant, you have been heard already, and you are not to reply upon us; or if you would we must be heard first.

Serj. Pemberton. I would only speak to that case of Sidney: My lord, that case differs from this toto calo, the writing was found in his possession, in his study; there was the proof that nailed him.

Sol. Gen. You shall see how we'll apply it by and bye.

Att. Gen. Pray, my lord, favour me a word in this matter: that there is stronger and weaker evidence, no man doubts; but that which these gentlemen say, that in this case there is no evidence, must needs be a mistake. If they mean that it is not so strong an evidence as is possible to be given, I agree with them, it is not: for if we had brought three or four men that had seen them write this very paper, and put their names to it, that had been a stronger evidence than this that we have given; but whether we do not give such a sort of evidence as may induce the jury to believe that this is their paper, and their hands to it, we submit. They say, this is such a method as never was taken; but I admire that that should be said by men of their experience and knowledge in the law; for is there any thing more usual, or any other course taken for the proof of hands, than for a witness to say, He knows the hand of the party very well, for he has often seen his hand-writing, or received letters from him?

* See this Case, vol. 9, p. 817.

And then you shew him the thing that you would prove to be his hand, and he says, I do believe this to be his hand, for this reason, because I have had other things of his writing; certainly, in the experience of any man that has practised, this is an evidence that is given every day, and allowed for evidence. For the case of Mr. Sidney, which your lordship has heard mentioned, it is certainly very apposite to this purpose; it is insisted upon and pretended, that that was evidence, because it was found in his study: but without all doubt, that would not be the reason: for may not a book of another man's writing be found in my study? And he insisted upon it in his own defence: but the answer was, that it should be left as the question, whether the jury would believe it upon the evidence that was given, of its being his own hand-writing: and so in this case, though it be not so strong evidence as if we had brought those that had seen them write it; yet evidence it is, and whether it be sufficient to satisfy the jury, may be a question, but no question it is good evidence in law.

Sol. Gen. It is a wonderful thing, they say, that such evidence should be offered: but truly, my lord, it is a much stranger thing to hear Mr. Serjeant Pemberton say, it was never done before; and then to make that remark to your lordship upon the case of Mr. Sidney, which I'll put to your lordship and the court as a case, and let him contradict me if he can; and then you shall see how far it goes. Mr. Sidney was indicted for high treason; and the high treason insisted upon at his trial in this court was, a writing that was supposed to be his, it being found in his study: the question was, Whether it was his hand-writing or not, there was no positive proof that it was his hand-writing; there was no person produc'd that prov'd it to be his hand-writing; for there was no person that swore he saw him write it; there was nothing proved but the similitude of hands, to make the jury believe it his hand-writing. Ay, but, says Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, it was found in his study. Will Mr. Serjeant Pemberton be content, that all the libels that are found in his study, shall, for that reason, be adjudged to be his libels, to be his hand-writing, and him to be a libeller for them? I think he would make a severe declamation against that sort of evidence, and he would have very good reason for it: certainly, that which is evidence in one man's case, will be evidence in another's. God forbid there should be any such distinction in law; and therefore I conclude, that this is good evidence, unless a lighter evidence will pass in this court to make a man guilty of treason than of misdemeanor.

Serj. Pemberton. The court went upon this, that it was found in his study, and compared with letters and bills of exchange produced in court, which were sworn to be of his hand-writing.*

* According to the Report of Sidney's Trial in this Collection, Shepherd swore that he was

Sol. Gen. My lord, I was by all the time; for I was ordered to attend him in the Tower; for one of his counsels attended too at his trial but was not heard; and therefore I can tell what passed. My lord, they proved no more as to that paper, but by comparison of hands; they had no other proof in that case, but by comparing the hand-writing; and that was insisted upon to be a very fallible thing: that which they would have us do in this case to compare paper with paper, it is true, would make the proof somewhat stronger, if we could, in such a case as this, be able to produce such evidence.* But I appeal to your lordship, and shall leave it to the jury, to consider which is better evidence; these men that have been produced, that have been conversant with my lords the bishops, and acquainted with their hand-writing, and who (as your lordship sees) are no willing men to give evidence against my lords the defendants, they avoid it as much as they can; yet they swear all the writing to be the hand-writing of my lord archbishop of Canterbury, as they believe; which is as far as any man can swear that did not see him write. One says, the whole body of the paper is my lord of Canterbury's hand, and he knows it very well; so that we are not giving evidence upon a single name, but upon the whole paper that contains many lines; and this is as much as can be proved by any one that did not see the thing written. Then, my lord, for the rest of my lords the bishops, the evidence is not so strong against every one of them, as it is against my lord archbishop; but it is strong enough, I suppose, to induce the jury to find this writing to be signed as we allege by my lords the bishops; and pray, my lord, what was the objection in Mr. Sidney's case, but what has been mentioned here? That any man's hand might be counterfeited. I remember in that case, Mr. Wharton,† a person of honour then in the court, upon perusal of the writing, charged to be Mr. Sidney's hand-writing, undertook to the court, that he would imitate the hand-writing produced, so that he that was to swear it was Mr. Sidney's, should not know which was the real, and which the counterfeit; which certainly was a stronger case than this; and I see some of the learned gentlemen now standing at the bar, who pressed acquainted with colonel Sidney's hand; that he became acquainted with his hand by seeing him write the indorsement upon several bills of exchange, and that he believed all the sheets produced to be Sidney's hand. See vol. 9, p. 854.

* In sir W. W.'s MS. the words 'it is true' 'would make the proof somewhat stronger if' 'we could in such a case as this be able to' 'produce such evidence,' are obliterated, and these following are substituted, 'and so prove' 'this paper by another writing of my lords the' 'bishops it is true would perhaps help the evidence, but it is not necessary.'

that evidence by comparison of hands very hard against Mr. Sidney to prove him guilty, and Mr. Sidney lost his life upon that comparison of hands; though Mr. Wharton did testify how easy a matter it was to have a man's hand imitated or counterfeited, and that even in that writing then given in evidence, yet it was not then regarded by the court, and we all know Mr. Wharton was a man of value and quality; so that there is a precedent for Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, that never heard of this law before. They say the proving of the similitude of hands is no evidence, unless you prove the actual writing; what a condition then would England be in, when witnesses to the actual writing are dead? Is it not the most common practice that can be, to produce witnesses to prove such men are dead, whose names are set as witnesses to deeds; and they swear, they believe it to be the hand-writing of those witnesses? Can there be any better evidence in such a case, unless it be the confession of the party himself, whose deed it is? My lord, we are now only upon reading this paper. We have been heard, and they have been heard; now we pray the paper may be read.

Recorder. We pray it may be read.

Serj. Levinz. If your lordship please—

Sol. Gen. We are not to be replied upon, Mr. Serjeant.

L. C. J. You have spoke, brother Levinz, and you have spoke, brother Pemberton, and I would willingly hear you what you have to say; but we must not have vying and revying, for then we shall have no end.

Serj. Levinz. I would offer your lordship some new matter, which has not been touched upon yet, why it is not to be read.

L. C. J. What's that, brother?

Serj. Levinz. All the proof that has been given, whatsoever it amounts to, has been only of its being written, but no proof has been given of its being written in the county of Middlesex, where the information is laid, and the matter is local.

Sol. Gen. First read it, and then make your objection.

Recorder. My lord, as to the evidence that has been given, I would only put your lordship in mind of one case; and that was the case of sir Samuel Barnardiston;* and the great evidence there, was the proof of its being his hand-writing; and that being proved, was sufficient to convict him of a libel; for they could not believe sir Samuel Barnardiston was guilty of making libels, unless they were proved to be his hand-writing.

Sir R. Sawyer. He owned them to be his hand-writing.

L. C. J. If you do expect my opinion in it, whether this be good evidence, and whether this paper be proved or no, I am ready to give it.

Mr. Finch. My lord, I desire to be heard before the opinion of the court be given.

Sol. Gen. If there be not proof enough to induce the jury to believe this is their paper, yet sure there is enough to read it.

Sir R. Sawyer. My lord, we have not been heard to this yet.

Sol. Gen. Why, is this fit to be suffered?

L. C. J. Mr. Solicitor, I am always willing to hear Mr. Finch.

Sol. Gen. But I hope your lordship and the court, are not to be complimented into an unusual thing!

Serj. Pemberton. It is not a compliment, but right and justice.

Sol. Gen. Certainly it is right and justice, that there should be some limits put to men's speaking, that we may know when to have an end.

Sir R. Sawyer. Mr. Solicitor does mistake the right, my lord, for we desire to be heard to this point, as not having spoke to it yet.

Sol. Gen. Pray, Sir, let me make my objection to your being heard: for I believe you and I have been chid several times, for speaking over and over the same thing.

Sir R. Sawyer. This that we now offer, is not to the same point that we have spoken to already.

Sol. Gen. We are now speaking to the reading of the paper, and you have spoken to it already.

Sir R. Sawyer. If the court will please to hear us, we have that to offer against the reading of the paper, which has not been offered yet.

L. C. J. Sir Robert Sawyer, I take it, it is in the breast of the court to hear when they will, and as much as they will, and whom they will; for if three or four have been heard of a side to speak what they will, the court may very well depend upon the learning of those three or four, that they say what can be said upon the point, and that's enough; but if six or seven desire to be heard over and over to the same thing, certainly the court may stop at three or four, if they will.

Sir R. Sawyer. This is a new objection that none of us have been heard to yet.

Mr. Finch. My lord, that which I offer is not contrary to the rules of law, nor contrary to the practice of the court; nor was I going any way to invade that privilege which Mr. Solicitor claims of making objections, and not receiving an answer.

Sol. Gen. What a fine declamation you have now made! I never claimed any such right; but I oppose your being heard over and over to the same thing.

Att. Gen. Pray, my lord, let's come to some issue in this matter.

L. C. J. I will hear you; but I would not have you introduce it with a reflection upon the king's counsel.

Sol. Gen. My lord, if you impose that upon him, you stop his mouth; for some men cannot speak without reflection.

L. C. J. On the other side, pray, Mr. Solicitor, give us leave to hear fairly what they have to say; for I perceive he cannot offer to speak, but you presently stop his mouth.

* See this Case, vol. 9, p. 1335.

Mr. Finch. My lord, that which I was going to say, is another matter than any thing that has been yet offered: we say, that this paper ought not to be read; for that they are obliged by law to prove their information; and consequently, having laid a particular place where the thing was done in the information, they ought to prove that this was done in that place. The evidence that they have given, is of my lords the bishops writing this paper; and they have laid it to be done in Middlesex. And this, with submission to your lordship, is local; and they must prove it to be written in Middlesex, where they have laid it, or else they fail in their proof. This is another objection, which as yet hath not been spoken to: that if there be a proof of their hand-writing, yet there is no proof where that hand was written; and therefore they are not yet got so far, as to have it read against my lords.

Att. Gen. For that point, my lord, we say, this would have been as properly said after the paper had been read, when they come to make objections against our proof, by way of defence: and, with submission, it had been more proper then, than it is now: for what are we now doing? My lord, we are proving that such a paper was subscribed by my lords the bishops; and sir John Nicholas gives you an account, that he had it from his majesty at the council; and that certainly is in the county of Middlesex; and it will concern you to prove that it was written elsewhere.

Serj. Pemberton. That's very well, Mr. Attorney; sure you do not think as you speak!

Att. Gen. Here is a paper composed and written by you, that sir John Nicholas says he had from his majesty: how he came by it, I suppose you will tell us by and bye. This is your hand writing, that I think we have proved sufficiently; this is found in the county of Middlesex, and you come and tell us, that we must prove that it was written in the county of Middlesex; and it is taken to be written where it was found, unless you prove the contrary.

Serj. Pemberton. That's pretty doctrine indeed, and very new.

Sol. Gen. My lord, here's an objection made too timely: we are now upon the reading of this paper; and the question is, whether it shall be read, or not be read? Surely we have given evidence enough to induce the court to read it; and it is another question that will come time enough afterwards, where it was written?

L. C. J. Truly, I do not think it was proper for you to stand upon the place where it was written as yet.

Serj. Levinz. When we are upon an information of a fact in Middlesex, will you hear them give evidence of a fact in Yorkshire?

Sol. Gen. We are not to be driven by these gentlemen: we are to be directed by the court.

L. C. J. I think truly it is yet too early to make this objection, Serj. Pemberton. Surely, my lord, this is our time to oppose the reading of it, as not proved.

Just. Powell. Mr. Solicitor, I think you have not sufficiently proved this paper to be subscribed by my lords the bishops.

Sol. Gen. Not to read it, Sir?

Just. Powell. No, not to read it; it is too slender a proof for such a case. I grant you in civil actions a slender proof is sufficient to make out a man's hand, by a letter to a tradesman, or a correspondent, or the like; but in criminal causes, such as this, if such a proof be allowed, where is the safety of your life, or any man's life here?

Sol. Gen. We tell you a case where it was allowed; and that is Mr. Sidney's case; a case of treason, and printed by authority: We tell you nothing but what was done the other day.

L. C. J. I tell you what I say to it; I think truly there is proof enough to have it read, and I am not ashamed, nor afraid to say it; for I know I speak with the law. Say what you will of criminal cases, and the danger of people's lives, there were more danger to the government, if such proof were not allowed to be good.

Just. Powell. I think there is no danger to the government at all, in requiring good proof against offenders.

L. C. J. Here's my lord archbishop and the bishop of St. Asaph, and my lord of Ely, their hands are proved: it is proved to be my lord archbishop's writing by Mr. Brooks, and he proves my lord of Ely's hand by comparison, and so my lord of St. Asaph's. Now, brother Pemberton, there's an answer to your objection, it being proved that it is all my lord archbishop's hand. Then they come and say, We'll prove the hands of the others by comparison; and for that they bring you witnesses that say, they have received letters from them, and seen their hand-writing several times; and comparing what they have seen with this very paper, says the witness, I do believe it to be his hand. Can there be a greater evidence, or a fuller?

Serj. Pemberton. Admit it be a full evidence against my lord archbishop, what's that to the rest? There's no evidence against them.

Just. Allynbone. Brother Pemberton, as to the objection you make of comparing of hands, it is an objection indeed, I do agree; but then consider the inconvenience which you and Mr. Pollexfen do so much insist upon: if a man should be accused by comparison of hands, where is he? He is in a lamentable case; for his hand may be so counterfeited, that he himself may not be able to distinguish it. But then you do not consider where you are on the other side: That may be an objection in matters of fact, that will have very little weight, if compared and set altogether: for on the other side, where shall the government be, if I will make libels, and traduce the government with prudence and discretion, and all the secrecy imaginable? I'll write my libel by myself, prove it as you can ; that's a fatal blot to the government ; and therefore the case is not the same, nor is your doctrine to pass for current here, because every case depends upon its own fact. If I take upon me to swear I know your hand, the inducements are to myself, how I came to know it, so as to swear it. Knowledge depends on circumstances : I swear that I know you, but yet I may be under a mistake ; for I can have my knowledge of you no other way but from the visibility of you, and another man may be so like you, that there is a possibility of my being mistaken ; but certainly that is evidence, good evidence. Now here are several gentlemen that swear as to my lord archbishop's hand-writing : I do agree, as to some of the others, that the evidence is not so strong ; for that man said, that he did believe it was rather such a lord's hand, than that which went before, or that which came after, it is of no weight at all, and so some of the others ; but it is positively proved against my lord archbishop and one or two more ; so that that's enough to induce the reading of this writing.

Just. Holloway. Good my lord, let me give my opinion.

L. C. J. Ay, with all my heart, brother.

Just. Holloway. My lord, I think as this case is, there ought to be a more strong proof ; for certainly the proof ought to be stronger and more certain in criminal matters, than in civil matters : in civil matters we do go upon slight proof, such as the comparison of hands, for proving a deed, or a witness's name, and a very small proof will induce us to read it ; but in criminal matters we ought to be more strict, and require positive and substantial proof, that is fitting for us to have in such a case ; and without better proof, I think it ought not to be read.

L. C. J. You must go on to some other proof, Mr. Solicitor ; for the court is divided in their opinions about this proof.*

* As to this proof by comparison of hands, see in Vol. 9, the Case of Algernon Sidney as already referred to.

In a late case (Eagleton and Coventry ver. Kingston) lord chancellor Eldon treated of this subject with great clearness and instruction as follows :

“ When I first came into the profession, the rule as to hand-writing in Westminster-hall in all the courts was this : You called a witness, and asked, whether he had ever seen the party write. If he said he had, whether more or less frequently, if ever, that was enough to introduce the subsequent question, whether he believed the paper to be his hand-writing. If he answered, that he believed it to be so, that was evidence to go to the jury. If he refused to answer to his belief, he was pressed, perhaps too much, to form a belief ; but if he would not go the length of belief, his evidence went for nothing. Or you might ask a witness, who had not seen him write for a length of

VOL. XII.

Sol. Gen. Then, my lord, we will come to the confessions of my lords the bishops ; and I hope that will be believed by all mankind.

Att. Gen. Truly, my lord, we did forbear time, if you could not get a witness of a subsequent date. You might call one, who had not seen him write for twenty years ; and if he said, he believed, it was the writing of the person, that evidence might go to the jury ; but to be affected by all the rest of the evidence, as it is the nature of all evidence to be more or less convincing.

“ In Horne Tooke's Case, at the Old Bailey, [see it in this Collection, A. D. 1793], his hand was proved only by Woodfall, who had not seen him write for a great length of time. But that went only to the character of the evidence.

“ This rule was laid down with so much clearness, that till very lately I never heard of evidence in Westminster-hall of comparison of hand-writing by those, who had never seen the party write ; though such evidence had been frequently received in the Ecclesiastical Courts. The whole of this is very well put together in the King v. Cator, [4 Espinasse's Nisi Prius Cases, 117] ; the whole doctrine being contained in the arguments of counsel and the opinion of the judge. An Inspector of Franks at the Post-office was called ; who had acquired a habit of determining, whether any thing was written according to the natural manner of writing ; and accordingly permitting or not permitting the frank to pass. These persons were called to prove the signature to a bill of exchange upon their skill in hand-writing, merely upon the comparison of hands of a person they had never seen write. That evidence was admitted by lord Kenyon in one case. It was first introduced by Mr. Justice Buller. Looking back to Sidney's Case, and a great variety of others, it was held by the common law, that comparison of hands is not evidence. There is a case in point now, [Brookbard v. Woodley, Peake's Nisi Prius Case, 20], under the great name of Mr. Justice Yates, in which it was rejected, as inadmissible. Distinguishing the cases of terriers and old writings, &c. there is a principle here, that may account for the difference of practice in the Ecclesiastical Courts and the Courts of Common Law. Suppose, some of the jury cannot read ; how can they judge of the similitude ? In addition to that authority, in Macfarlane v. Thoytes [Peake's Nisi Prius Cases, p. 20. See also my Note of the Case of Macfarlane v. Thoyts, vol. 9, p. 864, of this Collection], it was held no evidence whatsoever.

“ In Cator's Case, without going through more, it was argued very much ; and it was held by baron Hotham, that it could not be evidence ; and there was another Case [Cary v. Pitt, 37 Geo. 3. Peake's Law of Evidence] before lord Kenyon, in which also it was refused. [As to this, the Reporter observes, ‘ A principal defect of this species of proof is, that evidence, and would not have proceeded this way, if we had had fair play on the other side.

Sir R. Sawyer. Mr. Attorney, give us leave to defend our clients all the ways we can: I think we do nothing but what is fair: the court you see is divided, therefore we did not without reason insist upon it.

L. C. J. You must go on as you can, for they will put you upon it.

Att. Gen. Swear Mr. Blathwayt. [Mr. Blathwayt sworn.]

Sol. Gen. Pray hand the writing to him. [The writing shewn to him.]

‘that it gives no positive evidence of the fact, ‘that the party can write; which is, perhaps, ‘the proper object of the question, whether the ‘witness has seen him write. As to that fact, ‘the answer has the true character of evidence: ‘as the foundation of a familiarity with the ‘manner of writing sufficient to enable him to ‘speak to his belief, it can scarcely have effect, ‘without farther enquiry not merely as to the ‘point of time, which is very material, but ‘also upon the frequency and degree of his ‘observation, involving many important circumstances. If the ground of opinion was ‘investigated, it would probably in most instances appear to be drawn rather from correspondence than from actual observation of ‘the art of writing.’]

“These later cases appear to have brought back the law to the state, in which it stood 25 years ago. I doubt the authority of the Case of Garrels v. Alexander, [4 Esp. Nisi Prius, Case 37]; where, if a man will not take upon him to say, he believes it to be the writing of the person, but says, he thinks it like, lord Kenyon is made to say, that is evidence. I doubt that. Formerly that would not have been deemed evidence. The evidence of hand-writing being of this nature, it is evidence in itself, the credit of which must be affected by and depend much upon the circumstances, as they come out in the course of the case. A man may come into court with the firmest belief as to the hand-writing; and in the course of the cause he may be convinced conscientiously, that his belief was founded in error. You cannot therefore avoid having regard to circumstances; and it is not necessary, that there should be evidence both on the part of the plaintiff and the defendant; for if the evidence for the plaintiff does not satisfy the jury, they are at liberty to say, in their conscientious opinion it is a mistake. No contradictory evidence therefore is necessary upon the part of the defendant, if the other evidence leads the jury to disbelieve it. A singular circumstance applicable to this point, happened to me: A deed was tried in Westminster-hall, stated to have been executed under circumstances, throwing a good deal of blot upon the persons who had obtained it. The Solicitor, who was a very respectable man, said, he felt satisfaction, that there were respectable witnesses. One was the town-clerk of Newcastle; and I

Sol. Gen. Have you seen that writing formerly, Sir?—Blathwayt. Yes, Sir.

Sol. Gen. What did you hear my lord archbishop say about that paper?

Att. Gen. And the rest of my lords the bishops?

Sol. Gen. First, we'll ask, as to my lord archbishop; did he own it to be his hand-writing?

Blathwayt. My lord, I believe this to be the paper that my lord archbishop did own to be subscribed by him.

Sol. Gen. When was it owned by him?

was the other. I could undertake to a certainty, that the signature was not mine; having never attested a deed in my life. He looked back to my pleadings; and was sure it was my signature; and, if I had been dead, would have sworn to it conscientiously. Suppose I had been out of the kingdom, and had come into Westminster-hall during the trial, and had positively sworn that I never attested a deed in my life, would it not have been competent to the jury or witness to say, that it was a mistake? That instance proves, that testimony of hand-writing must be open to the consideration of circumstances at common law.

“It cannot be doubted that it is so in the Ecclesiastical Courts, upon looking into the books.” See 8 Vesey, jun. 473.

1 Fountainhall's Decisions, 196.

“November 24, 1682. At Criminal Court; one Woodburn is pannelled for being at the rebellion at Bothwel-bridge: Alledged, he had taken the benefit of his majesty's Proclamation of Indemnity and Pardon to all who would subscribe the bond never again to rise in arms against his majesty, which he had debito tempore signed, and so was free. Answered, The subscription of his name at that bond, produced as taken by the earl of Caruath having power there, was not his, but there was a notary who had affixed the names of near one hundred persons to the said bond as if it had been their own subscriptions, and he had put this Woodburn's subscription with the rest; and by this pious fraud he had brought off and saved many of them; though he was not commissioned to sign for them. Woodburn offered to abide at the truth of the subscription as his. The king's advocate offered to improve it as false; so that here questio falsi became incidenter prejudicialis, and behoved to go before the crime of treason libelled principaliter. It seemed odd and new to offer to improve that as false which a man abode by as truly subscribed by him; yet a writ may be proven false against one quoad datum, where one claims benefit by it. There were pregnant presumptions against Woodburn, for his present subscription differed toto calo from that other; yet in a short time a man's hand-writing may alter much.”

See, too, Mackenzie's Criminals ('Probation by Writ') part 2, tit. 25, s. 3, as referred to in a Note, vol. 10, p. 764, of this Collection.

Blathwayt. On the council-day the 8th of this month.

Sol. Gen. Where was it owned? because we would obviate that objection of the county.

Blathwayt. It was at the council-table at Whitehall.

Sol. Gen. What say you to the bishop of St. Asaph? Did he own it?

Blathwayt. Yes, all my lords the bishops did own it.

Sol. Gen. Name them particularly. What say you of the bishop of Ely?

Blathwayt. In the same manner, my lord.

Sol. Gen. The bishop of Chichester?

Blathwayt. In the same manner.

Sol. Gen. The bishop of Bath and Wells?

Blathwayt. Yes, my lord.

Sol. Gen. The bishop of Peterborough?

Blathwayt. Yes, my lord.

Sol. Gen. And the bishop of Bristol?

Blathwayt. Yes, my lord.

Sol. Gen. So we have proved they all owned it.

Just. Holloway. Could not this have been done at first, and saved all this trouble?

Sir R. Sawyer. Have you done with Mr. Blathwayt, Mr. Attorney, that we may ask him some questions?

Att. Gen. Ask him what you will.

Serj. Pemberton. Pray, Mr. Blathwayt, upon what occasion did they own it? You are sworn to tell the whole truth: pray tell all your knowledge, and the whole confession that they made.

Blathwayt. My lord, I am called here by a Subpœna to answer on the behalf of the king; my lord, I am ready to do my duty, and I beg of your lordship that you would please to tell me what is my duty; for whatsoever I shall answer, I shall speak the truth in.

Serj. Pemberton. There is nothing desired, but that you would speak the truth.

Blathwayt. My lord, I am easily guided by your lordship what I ought to answer to.

L. C. J. What is it you ask him, brother Pemberton?

Serj. Pemberton. We desire Mr. Blathwayt to tell the whole discourse that passed at the council, when he says my lords the bishops owned this paper.

Sol. Gen. That's a very pretty thing indeed!

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Blathwayt, you must answer them what they ask you, unless it be an ensnaring question, and that the court will take care of.

Blathwayt. If your lordship please to ask me any question, I shall readily answer it.

L. C. J. You must answer them.

Serj. Pemberton. We ask you upon what occasion they came to own their hands? what discourse was made to them, and what they answered?

Blathwayt. My lord, I beg your lordship's directions.—L. C. J. Come, tell it, Sir.

Blathwayt. My lord, the occasion was this: this Paper was read in council, and I had the honour to read it before the king; and it having been read before his grace the archbishop, and my lords the bishops, they were asked, whether they did own that paper? And, my lord, they did own it.

Sir R. Sawyer. Mr. Blathwayt, was that the first time that my lords the bishops came in?

Blathwayt. Sir, I was not asked that question.

L. C. J. What would you have, sir Robert Sawyer?

Sir R. Sawyer. We would have an account what passed at the council?

L. C. J. Would you have all the discourse betwixt the council and my lords the bishops?

Serj. Pemberton. All that relates to their accusation, my lord, their whole confession, and what was said to them.

Att. Gen. Do you think, Mr. Serjeant, that when we call a witness, you are at liberty to examine him to every impertinent thing?

Sol. Gen. My lord, we desire they may only ask reasonable and proper questions.

Serj. Pemberton. Mr. Solicitor, he is sworn to answer, and tell the whole truth, and that's all we ask of him.

Sir R. Sawyer. Sir, I will ask you a plain question upon your oath; did not my lord archbishop, and the rest of my lords the bishops, at first refuse to own it, or to answer whether it were their hands or not?

Sol. Gen. That is not a fair question, sir Robert Sawyer; 'tis a leading question.*

Serj. Pemberton. Then I ask you in short, what did they refuse? I am sure that is a fair question; for God forbid that any should hinder the king's evidence from telling truth.

Sir R. Sawyer. And God forbid that half evidence should condemn any man.

L. C. J. God forbid the truth should be concealed any way.

Serj. Pemberton. Pray, Sir, when they were first asked, whether that was their hands or not, what answer did they give?

Blathwayt. Sir, I have begged the favour of my lords the judges to tell me what I am to answer, and what questions are proper for me to answer to?

L. C. J. You must answer any questions that are not ensnaring questions.

Sir R. Sawyer. Mr. Blathwayt, you are upon your oath to testify the truth.

Blathwayt. Sir, I am not acquainted with the methods of law; I desire my lords the judges would instruct me.

Just. Allybone. Answer to the question that they ask you.

L. C. J. We observe what they ask you; we'll take care that they ask you nothing but what they should.

Blathwayt. I desire the question may be repeated.

Serj. Pemberton. When they were first asked if it were their hands, what answer did they give the king?

Blathwayt. His grace the archbishop and

* See Peake's Law of Evidence, c. 3, s. 6.

my lords the bishops at first did not immediately answer whether the Paper were theirs or no.—Serj. Pemberton. What did they say?

Blathwayt. They said, they did humbly hope if they were put to answer, no advantage should be taken against them.

Serj. Pemberton. What did they say farther at that time concerning his majesty's pleasure?

Sol. Gen. That's a leading question, Mr. Serjeant Pemberton; you cannot leave your way of leading witnesses.

Serj. Pemberton. It is a very strange thing; if we ask a question that's general, that's excepted to: if we ask any question in particular, then they find fault with us, that it is a leading question; so that we can never ask a question that will please them. Pray, Mr. Blathwayt, what did they say concerning the king's pleasure, whether they would answer if the king commanded them?

Serj. Trinder. How can it be material what they said?

L. C. J. It is material that it should be asked, and that it should be answered.

Serj. Levinz. You are to tell the whole truth, Sir. Pray tell us what did my lords the bishops say about submitting to the king's pleasure.

Sol. Gen. What is that to the purpose?

Mr. Pollexfen. Mr. Solicitor, his oath is to tell the truth, and the whole truth, and therefore he must answer my question.

Serj. Pemberton. You are mighty loth, Mr. Solicitor, to let us hear the truth: I would not willingly lead him in any thing; and I cannot see that this is any leading question, unless his oath be against law, which says he is to tell the whole truth.

Att. Gen. My lord, I do beg your lordship's favour of a word in this thing. It is certain if they ask any thing that shall take off the evidence that was first given, that it is not true, I cannot oppose it; but if they ask questions only to enflame, and to possess people with foolish notions and strange conceits, that is not to the fact that we are now trying—

Sir R. Sawyer. 'Tis only to have the truth out that we do it.

Serj. Pemberton. There is no body here that will be enflamed, Mr. Attorney; I have asked a fair question, the court has ruled it so.

Blathwayt. I shall readily answer any question that the court thinks fit.

Serj. Pemberton. Sir, by the oath you have taken, you are to tell the whole truth.

L. C. J. Is he to tell you all that was done at the council-board that day?

Serj. Pemberton. No, my lord, only of what passed there about my lords the bishops confession; of the whole of that matter.

Blathwayt. There has been so much said between the asking of the question and this time, that I desire it may be repeated, that I may know what to answer to.

Serj. Pemberton. I ask you in short, Sir, what did my lords the bishops say at the time of their appearing in council concerning the king's pleasure, whether they should answer or not?

Blathwayt. The first time my lords the bishops came into the council, they were asked the question, whether they did own that paper? They did immediately answer, They humbly hoped, as they stood there as criminals, his majesty would not take the advantage against them; but however they would obey his majesty's command.

Sir R. Sawyer. Were they commanded to withdraw?

Blathwayt. Yes; thereupon they were commanded to withdraw, which they did.

Serj. Pemberton. When they came in again, what questions were asked them?

Blathwayt. They came in several times, more than twice, I have reason to remark this, that they did so: do you mean the second time, Sir?—Serj. Pemberton. Yes, Sir.

Blathwayt. The second time they seemed unwilling to own the paper.

Sir R. Sawyer. And what did they do the third time?

Serj. Pemberton. But first let us know what more was done the second time.

Sir George Treby. How was that unwillingness of theirs overcome?

Serj. Pemberton. When they expressed their unwillingness, what did they say farther?

Blathwayt. If I remember right, they said as they did the first time, they humbly hoped his majesty would not take advantage against them.

Serj. Pemberton. Then what did they say the third time?

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray were they asked whether they published it?

Blathwayt. As to the publishing it, it was laid before them, and I think they were asked the question, whether they published it?

Sir R. Sawyer. And what answer did they make?

Blathwayt. I remember his grace, and my lords the bishops, did not own they had published it, but they denied it.

Sir G. Treby. After they discovered their unwillingness the second time, what followed next?

Blathwayt. They did withdraw after the second attendance.

Serj. Levinz. But what was said to them? Was that all that was said to them the second time?

Blathwayt. I have said two things already, that they were unwilling to answer, and that they denied the publishing.

L. C. J. This is a strange usage of a witness, to put him to tell every thing that was said.

Serj. Pemberton. I would ask you this question, Sir, When they came in the second time, whether they did desire to know if it were his majesty's command that they should own it?

L. C. J. That I must not permit you to ask, brother; that is to lead the witness.

Serj. Pemberton. My lord, he will not answer general questions; I have asked him all along general questions, and I cannot get an answer from him to them.

Blathwayt. I am ready to answer any questions that the court thinks I should answer; I am not backward to answer according to my duty.

L. C. J. Let one of you ask a question at a time, and not chop in one upon another.

Sol. Gen. In all the trials that ever I have been in, in all the cases of criminals, the king's witnesses used to be treated with respect, and not to be fallen upon in this manner.

L. C. J. He shall be sure to have all respect paid him.

Sol. Gen. He is in office under the king.

Serj. Pemberton. I do not think that Mr. Blathwayt does believe I would shew him any disrespect more than he would shew me.

Att. Gen. I beg one word, my lord.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, what do you say?

Att. Gen. My lord, I say I do oppose the asking of this question, not but that every man has a right to cross-examine a witness, but if they ask such a question, let them tell us what use they would make of it.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney-General, for that matter—

Serj. Pemberton. My lord, if you please, I'll give Mr. Attorney an answer.

L. C. J. Brother Pemberton, I was speaking to Mr. Attorney, and pray hear me; I will not ask you what use you'll make of the question you ask; but do you ask fair and regular questions, and I'll take care you shall have an answer to them.

Serj. Pemberton. I will deal plainly with the court, and tell you what use we intend to make of our question. If they answered under a promise from his majesty, that it should not be given in evidence against them, I hope they shall not take advantage of it.

Sol. Gen. I say that is a very unmannerly question; but however it shall be answered.

Serj. Pemberton. Why so, Mr. Solicitor?

Sol. Gen. My lord, it is to put something upon the king, which I dare hardly name.

L. C. J. We do not know what answer will be made to it yet, but it does look like an odd kind of question.

Sol. Gen. If men will be so pressing, I, for the king, desire the question may be entered.

Sir R. Sawyer. What do you mean, Mr. Solicitor?

Sol. Gen. I know very well what I mean, Sir; I desire the question may be recorded in court.

Serj. Pemberton. Record what you will; I am not afraid of you, Mr. Solicitor.

Sol. Gen. Are you afraid of the law?

Serj. Pemberton. No, nor of you neither.

L. C. J. Pray, be quiet, gentlemen.

Att. Gen. Pray, Mr. Blathwayt, answer, whether there was any promise made to my lords the bishops from the king?

Blathwayt. My lord, I take the question to be, whether the king was pleased to make my lords the bishops any promise of not taking advantage of what answer they made?

Att. Gen. That is the question.

Blathwayt. As that question is stated, there was no such made.

L. C. J. Look you, he tells you there was no such promise made. There is an answer to your question, brother.

Serj. Levinz. We made no such question; but the question I would ask is this:—

Sol. Gen. For the satisfaction of the court, repeat what you said just now, Mr. Blathwayt.

Blathwayt. I take the question to be, whether the king made any promise to my lords the bishops, that no advantage should be taken of what they said? And I said, the king made no such promise.

Serj. Pemberton. We did not ask you the question, but we only told you what use we would have made of another question.

Mr. Polluxfen. Mr. Blathwayt, I see you can very well distinguish what questions are to be answered. I ask you in short upon your oath, when they were first called in, what was said to them, and what was answered by them?

L. C. J. Here has been a great deal of wrangling, but this is a fair question, and may reduce us to order again. Tell us over again from the beginning, what passed when my noble lords the bishops came in the first, second, and third time, when they were examined about this paper?

Blathwayt. My lord, I shall comply with your lordship's directions. I apprehend I am to answer together concerning the first, second, and third comings of my lords the bishops into the council. The first time, as I said before, the lords the bishops were unwilling to own the paper, and did say, they humbly hoped his majesty would not take advantage against them, but that they were ready to obey his command. The second time they were called in they did repeat it again, that they hoped his majesty would not take advantage against them: after that there was mention made of the paper being published, I remember my lords the bishops said they had not published it.

Sir R. Sawyer. Is that all?

Sol. Gen. You have no mind to hear all, I think.

L. C. J. How do you expect to be answered your questions, if you interrupt them? Go on, Mr. Blathwayt.

Blathwayt. Sir, I said last, that they having prayed the king that no advantage might be taken against them for what they should say, there was mention made of the paper its being published, and my lords the bishops did say they had not published it; and his grace my lord archbishop said it was written with his own hand, and that he had not made use of his clerk.

Sir R. Sawyer. Is that all you can remember that passed at that time?

Blathwayt. This is the substance of what I remember.

L. C. J. Was this the third time?

Blathwayt. No, that was the second time, my lord.

Mr. Pollexfen. If there be not some order in this evidence, my lord, we shall not be able to observe any thing upon it.—Pray what was done afterwards?

Blathwayt. My lord, chancellor, upon their coming in, did require them to answer, whether they did own that paper or not? My lords the bishops did own the paper.

Mr. Pollexfen. Do you remember in what words or expressions, as near as you can, they did own it?

Sol. Gen. Is that a practice to be endured?

Mr. Finch. Why? He may apprehend and take that to be an owning of it, which was not.

Sol. Gen. Has not he sworn the manner of it, and almost the very words?

Serj. Levinz. We desire nothing of him but that he will tell us what words they said when they owned it.

Blathwayt. It was the third time that they came in, that they owned it.

Serj. Pemberton. Why? What did they say?

Blathwayt. My lord chancellor required them to answer, whether they owned the paper or no.

Serj. Pemberton. What did they say then?

Blathwayt. As near as I can remember, his grace and the lords the bishops did own the paper.

Serj. Pemberton. What words did they own it in? Tell the manner of it.

Sol. Gen. What's this to the purpose?

Mr. Finch. Mr. Blathwayt, did you take notes of what passed there?

Blathwayt. I answer, Sir, I did not take notes, for I attended the king at his elbow, and did not take notes. Mr. Finch, you know the manner of the council in such cases very well.

Att. Gen. Then we ask you for the king, because they shall not enflame people by such an expression, in what words did they own it, if you can remember?

Blathwayt. Sir, I have declared my memory as well as I can; when the other clerks come to be examined, if they can tell any more, let them.

Sol. Gen. But we will have no discourse to enflame the world: did the king promise or declare that no advantage should be taken of their confession?

L. C. J. I would ask him that question, What was the manner that my lord chancellor expressed himself in to them, when they came in the third time?

Blathwayt. As soon as my lord chancellor had required them to declare whether they owned that paper; [Holding it forth to the court,] as well as I remember, his grace took the paper in his hand, and it was handed over, or shewed to my lords the bishops, and they owned and declared so, just as if they should lay it before the court, just so. I do not recollect myself of all the circumstances that passed; I only can tell you the substance.

Sol. Gen. He does not remember what they said particularly.

Att. Gen. Mr. Solicitor, I know well enough what they mean by the question; I know they would fain possess the world with a belief that there was such a promise made them, and yet they are prosecuted notwithstanding that promise: therefore I do ask you, Mr. Blathwayt, and for the king's honour I must ask it: did the king make any promise or declaration, that no advantage should be taken, or use made of it?

Blathwayt. The king did not make any promise or declaration that no advantage should be taken or use made of it.

Sol. Gen. He only put them upon it, whether they did own it or not?

Att. Gen. I ask you upon your oath, did my lord archbishop own it to be his hand-writing?

Blathwayt. Yes, he did, and said he writ it with his own hand, and would not let his clerk write it.

Att. Gen. Did he own the whole to be his hand writing, or not?

Blathwayt. Yes, he did.

Att. Gen. Did every one of the bishops own their names subscribed to it?

Blathwayt. Yes.

Sol. Gen. Then, my lord, we pray now that it may be read.

L. C. J. I suppose now they will be content it should be read.

Mr. Finch. If your lordship please to favour me one word, I think it cannot yet be read; and my objection is this.

L. C. J. I thought you had made all your objections before, as to the reading of it.

Mr. Finch. Pray, my lord, spare us. Here are two parts of this information; the one is for consulting and conspiring to diminish the king's royal prerogative, and for that end they did make and write a seditious Libel; the other part is, that they did publish this seditious libel. We are hitherto upon the first part, the making and writing of it. Both parts are local; until they have proved the making and writing of it to have been in Middlesex, it is not evidence upon this information.

Sol. Gen. We have proved it written and published in Middlesex.

Serj. Pemberton. The contrivance and writing of a libel is in itself penal, and they may be punished for it, if they be found guilty. Now if they could give an undeniable evidence concerning the publishing of it, that is nothing to this point; but if they should not give such evidence, or any evidence at all of the publication, yet if it be proved that it was written and contrived by them, they would be guilty for so much, if it be a libel; and this we say is local, as well as all the rest: and therefore we insist upon it, that the writing and contriving must as well be proved to be in Middlesex, as the publication, for all is local.

L. C. J. There is no publishing yet proved.

Serj. Levinz. It is true, my lord, here is nothing of a publication yet, with your lordship's favour; for their answer to his majesty in council was, that they did not publish it: all that is said yet is, that they owned the paper to be their hands. My lord, does the owning of that, own that it was written in the county of Middlesex? or that it was contrived or made there? No surely, upon this evidence the place is clearly at large. My lord, this might have been done in the county of Surry, or Somerset, or any other county: the information is, that they did consult and contrive to diminish the king's prerogative at Westminster in the county of Middlesex, and there they did write, and cause to be written, this libel, and there they did publish it. Suppose it should be granted that it is proved that this is the archbishop's hand-writing, and these are their names to it, is there any one evidence that any thing of this was done in Middlesex? And, my lord, that is the thing they are to prove.

Mr. Sommers.* If your lordship please, all matters of crime are so local, that if it be not proved to be done in the county where it is laid, the party accused is as innocent as if he never had done the thing; and, with submission, it is the very point of the information, that it be proved they are guilty of the fact in the place where it is laid to be done.

L. C. J. This is the same thing over and over again; but I am content to hear you, Mr. Sommers, at any time: I have told you my opinion about reading of the Paper already, if you'll have it again you may.

Mr. Pollexfen. Pray, good my lord, spare us before it be read.

Just. Holloway. Mr. Pollexfen, you have not yet had the directions of the court for the reading of it.

Att. Gen. My lord, when this paper is read, which we pray it may be, we will answer their objections, but at present we say they are out of time.

Mr. Pollexfen. Good Lord, what a strange thing is this! We object against the reading of it, and you'll answer us after it is read.

Sol. Gen. Certainly, my lord, we have done enough to prove that this is a paper owned by them in the county of Middlesex, and we pray it may be read.

L. C. J. Truly I am of the same mind I was before, that it is too soon to make the objection, and that the Paper ought to be read.

Sol. Gen. We submit to your rule.

Mr. Pollexfen. If it be the will of the court, I have nothing to say.

* "I have heard one of the bishops declare, that objection was made among themselves against Mr. Sommers, as too young and obscure a man: but old Pollexfen insisted upon him, and would not be himself retained without the other: representing him as the man who would take most pains, and go deepest into all that depended on Precedents and Records."

3 Kenn. Compl. Hist. 513, note, c. 2d. Edn.

Just. Powell. My lord, the contrivance and publication are both matters of fact, and upon issue joined, the jurors are judges of the fact, as it is laid in the information; but how can they be judges of a matter of fact done in another county? And it must be presumed, in favour of innocence, not to be done in this county, but in another, except they prove it.

Att. Gen. We are not yet ripe for arguing that point.

Sol. Gen. We are speaking only to the court now for the reading of this paper, and the jury are not judges of that, whether the paper ought to be read or no; that is merely a matter of law, and under the direction of the court; and therefore I pray, since it is now in your lordship's judgment, whether that Paper should be read, that you would please to order it to be read.

L. C. J. I can only give you my own opinion, let my brothers give theirs.

Just. Holloway. There is nobody against the reading of it, my lord. I suppose my brother Powell is not against it's being read.

Just. Powell. But they say the king's counsel must make it out first, that the writing of it, and the conspiring about it, was in the county of Middlesex, or there can be no judgment, so much as to read it.

Mr. Pollexfen. My lord, if the objection be saved to us, we shall not so much oppose the reading it, only we would not be surprized in point of time.

Just. Powell. Nay, if they consent to the reading, we have no reason to hinder it.

L. C. J. Brother, I believe they know well enough what they have to say for their clients; let the paper be read.

Clerk reads. 'The humble Petition of William Archbishop of Canterbury'—

Sir R. Sawyer. Read the whole Petition; I pray, my lord, that the whole may be read. Read the top first, Sir, to whom it was directed.

L. C. J. Read the whole.—Clerk reads.

'To the KING's most excellent Majesty.

'The humble Petition of William Archbishop of Canterbury, and of divers of the suffragan Bishops of that Province, now present with him, in behalf of themselves and others of their absent brethren, and of the Clergy of their respective Dioceses,

'Humbly sheweth; That the great aver-
'ness they find in themselves to the distributing 'and publishing in all their churches your 'majesty's late Declaration for Liberty of 'Conscience, proceedeth neither from any 'want of duty and obedience to your majesty
'(our holy mother, the Church of England,
'being both in her principles and in her con'stant practice unquestionably loyal; and 'having, to her great honour, been more than 'once publicly acknowledged to be so by your 'gracious majesty), nor yet from any want of
'due tenderness to Dissenters, in relation to ‘whom they are willing to come to such a temper as shall be thought fit, when the matter shall be considered and settled in parliament and convocation; but amongst many other considerations, from this especially, because that Declaration is founded upon such a Dispensing power as hath been often declared illegal in parliament, and particularly in the years 1662, and 1672, and in the beginning of your majesty’s reign; and is a matter of so great moment and consequence to the whole nation, both in church and state, that your Petitioners cannot in prudence, honour or conscience, so far make themselves parties to it, as the distribution of it all over the nation, and the solemn publication of it once and again, even in God’s house, and in the time of his divine service, must amount to, in common and reasonable construction.

‘Your Petitioners therefore most humbly and earnestly beseech your majesty, that you will be graciously pleased not to insist upon their distributing and reading your majesty’s said Declaration:—And your Petitioners (as in duty bound) shall ever pray, &c.’*

Att. Gen. My lord, we shall leave our evidence here, and hear what they can object to it.

Mr. Finch. Have you no farther evidence, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. We leave it here for the present.

Sol. Gen. The gentlemen of the jury desire to see the petition.

L. C. J. Shew it them.

[The Petition was shewn to the Jury.]

Mr. Finch. But will you give no further evidence, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. I tell you, we’ll leave it here, till we see what you say to it.

Mr. Finch. There is nothing that we should say any thing to.

Att. Gen. Make your advantage of it; if it be nothing, we can have nothing.

L. C. J. What say you for the defendants, gentlemen?

Mr. Finch. My lord, in short, we say, that hitherto they have totally failed; for they have not proved any fact done by us in Middlesex, nor have they proved any Publication at all.

Sir R. Sawyer. They have given no evidence of any thing.

L. C. J. Pray gentlemen, speak one at once, and then we shall understand the better what we hear.

Sir R. Sawyer. My lord, we say they have given no evidence of the conspiring, writing, or publishing in Middlesex: nay, as to the publication, there is none at all proved.

Mr. Finch. Here is no proof of any publication, nor of the writing or making in Middlesex; so that there is no proof at all against my lords the bishops.

L. C. J. You heard what Mr. Blathwayt said; they owned it in Middlesex.

Mr. Finch. That is not a publication sure, or any evidence where it was done.

Serj. Levinz. Suppose, my lord, that I own in Middlesex, that I robbed a man in Yorkshire, will that make me guilty in Middlesex?

Att. Gen. But if you had stole a horse in Yorkshire, and had that horse in Middlesex, and owned it, I doubt it would go hard with you in Middlesex.

Sol. Gen. Mr. Serjeant thinks he has put a very home comparison; but we shall shew how little significant it is by and bye.

Serj. Levinz. My lord, in the first place, we insist upon it, here is no proof in this case at all, as to the doing of any fact at all in the county of Middlesex: In the next place, this information and petition do not agree; for they have brought an information, and set forth, that my lords the bishops, under pretence of a petition, did make a libel, and they have set forth no petition at all; all the petitionary part is omitted. If I will take part of a man’s words, and not the whole, and make a libel of that part, certainly that is very disingenuous and injurious: for that part that I omit may alter the sense of the whole. They here ought to set forth the petition, with the direction to the king, and the prayer at the end, whereby it will appear what the whole is, and what was desired by their petition. But, my lord, to make this matter a little more clear, whatsoever they say of its being my lord archbishop’s hand, we shall prove that if it were so, it could not be done in Middlesex; for we shall prove that my lord of Canterbury hath not been in Middlesex for three or four months before.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray let the information be read, then you will see the variance.

Att. Gen. There is not the latter part, we acknowledge, in the information.

Sol. Gen. There may be, and is, a sic continetur, and there is no objection in that at all.

L. C. J. It is sic continetur, and that’s—

Sir R. Sawyer. The truth of it is, this information hath made a very deformed thing of it, has left neither head nor tail; they stile it a petition, but it is without any direction to any body, and without any prayer for any thing; and without those two it cannot be told what it is.

Just. Allynbone. Sir Robert Sawyer, if I mistake not, it is said only under pretence of a Petition.

Sir R. Sawyer. There may be more in the Paper than the Information; and if all were in, one part might explain another.

Sol. Gen. So there may be more; and I wonder to hear that objection from sir Robert Sawyer, who has exhibited so many informations for libels upon sentences, parts and pieces taken out of books without connection or reference to the other parts of books and prints.

Recorder. All that we alledge in the information is contained in the paper, and that's enough for our purpose; we are not bound to recite the whole.

L. C. J. Indeed I think it is no material objection at all.

Serj. Pemberton. Truly I think it is very material in this case: here's a Petition that is preferred to his majesty; take the whole petition together, and, say they, it is a reasonable petition; chop off the direction and the prayer, and then here's nothing but the body of a petition, without beginning or ending; or if a man will say any thing concerning the king, and do it by way of petition to himself, that will alter the case mightily from a paper spread about, that should contain only the body of the petition, and nothing else.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray read that part of the information.

Mr. Pollexfen. If so be there be an information, and that information charges a man with a pretended Petition, and the evidence comes and proves a Petition both top and bottom, that is not the petition in the information: for that lacking the proper parts of a petition, is called a pretended Petition, but that which is proved, is proved a real one.

Serj. Baldock. My lord, there is nothing in this objection, as this record hath it.

Att. Gen. Pray, my lord, give us leave to state it on our side, as they have done on theirs, and it will be the better understood upon the reading: I hope it is not come to that pass that they would have it. Sure these gentlemen have not forgot altogether the practice that has been so frequent in this court: if there be an information for a libel, is there any thing more frequent, than only to recite the material part? Sure they may say, in such a libel is contained so and so, without setting forth the whole book.

Sol. Gen. How many trials have we had here, wherein there has been only a clause taken out of a book? as particularly in the information against Mr. Baxter* and Mr. Johnson's book†, and all by virtue of a sic continetur.

Mr. Finch. That comes not up to our objection here.

Just. Powell. Let us hear the record read, and then we can judge of it.

Sir R. Sawyer. We pray, Sir, the information may be read.

Att. Gen. We are here upon all occasions chopped in upon, and I do not know how they come to take this liberty; I am sure other people had it not in former times, when these gentlemen stood where we do: as soon as ever we offer to speak, presently there are two or three upon us.

L. C. J. Let me hear them, Mr. Attorney, make their objection, and let the record be read, and that will answer that objection.

Att. Gen. My lord, as for that other thing, they come and tell us, we have set forth a petition; we say no such thing; in the information we say, you composed a certain libel pretensu Petitionis, in which are contained such and such things; and now I pray let it be read.

Sol. Gen. Pray, my lord, hear me a little first. I take the information as we have laid it, and I believe there are twenty such precedents that I could instance of late days practice; so was the information against Mr. Baxter; so was the information against Mr. Johnson; so was the information against Dr. Eades; and so was the information against sir Samuel Barnardiston and many more. They are all in this form, by a sic continetur; so that as for that matter, we are well enough. But here's another thing, say they, you do not set out the petition; we call it a libel, and it is not the name we rely on, says the information, there is such a libel; and calls it so. If it be not a libel, then my lords the bishops are very innocent, and will be found so; and whether it be so or no, is now in judgment before your lordship, and in trial before the jury; but if it be as the information says, then it is not the speaking of ill things in the body of a petition, and then giving it the good title of a petition, and concluding it with a good prayer. 'Tis not, I say, any of these that will sweeten this crime, or will alter or alleviate it; if there be that which is seditious and libellous in the body of the writing, call the paper what you will, and smoothing it with a specious preamble, or conclusion, that will make it any thing less a libel; these things are plain and manifest. There is such a thing done, says the information, pretensu petitionis, this was done: do you call it what you will. The information calls these things a libel upon the king and the government: we have proved our case, we have proved there was such a paper under their hands; we have proved it was owned in Middlesex, and then we are in your judgment, whether this be not evidence sufficient to convict the defendants?

L. C. J. But they do make an objection about the writing and contriving of it, that it is not proved to be in Middlesex.

Serj. Trinder. My lord, our information does not go with a continued clause, that they framed a libel, 'ut sequitur in hæc verba,' but we only say, they made a libel 'pretensu petitionis;' and then we say, 'In quo quidem libello continetur' so and so; we do not tie ourselves up to a particular recital of all that's in the paper.

L. C. J. Read the record.

Clerk. Reads.

‘Ipsi iidem Willielmus Archiepiscopus Cantuariensis (and the rest) dicto decimo octavo die Maii, Anno Regni Dicti Domini Regis nunc quarto supradicto, vi et armis, &c. apud Westmonasterium prædictum in Comitatu Middlesexiæ prædicto illicite malitiose seditiose et scandalose quoddam falsum fictum perniciosum et seditiosum libellum in scriptis de eodem Domino Rege et Regali Declaratione et ordine prædictis pretensu Petitionis fabricaverunt composuerunt et scripserunt et fabricari componi et scribi causaverunt, et eundem falsum fictum malitiosum perniciosum et seditiosum Libellum per ipsos prædictos Willielmum Archiepiscopum Cantuariensem (and the rest) manibus suis propriis respective subscriptum die anno et loco ultimo mentionatis in præsentia dicti Domini Regis nunc vi et armis, &c. publicaverunt et publicari causarunt; in quo quidem falso ficto malitioso pernicioso et seditioso Libello continetur.’ The humble Petition of, &c.

Serj. Levinz. It is quite another thing; that which is produced, from that which is in the information, by this leaving out a part; for here is the prayer omitted, and the direction.

Sol. Gen. Then, my lord, I think there is nothing in the case, but this mighty objection of the county; and, says Mr. Serjeant Levinz, if my countryman confesses in this county, that he stole a horse in Yorkshire, you shall not try him in Middlesex, but in Yorkshire, because, by his own confession, the fact is in another county.

Serj. Levinz. I did not put the case so.

Sol. Gen. But take the fact of the case as it is here: my lords the bishops in Middlesex own this paper; my lord archbishop owns it to be his writing, and the rest of my lords the bishops in Middlesex own their hands: and do not say it was written or signed in any other county. If they had done as Mr. Serjeant’s Yorkshire man did, and said, we own we did this, but it was in the county of York, then it would have been like the case that these gentlemen put; but here we are in a plain case of another nature: my lord archbishop comes here in Middlesex, and owns that he writ the paper, and the other bishops own they signed it, without mentioning where this was done. Now it does lie certainly in their knowledge where this was done, and they should have declared it then; but they have owned it to be their paper, and the signing and writing of it, which is enough for us, to turn the proof this was done by them in another county [upon them] who are actors in it, and best know where it was done.

Mr. Finch. I own this to be my paper, therefore I writ it in the county of Middlesex: is that a consequence? I am very glad they are no better at their inferences.

Sol. Gen. They have owned the thing in Middlesex, that we insist upon, and they have not owned it with any such qualification that it was done out of the county of Middlesex. If they had said so, or that it was done in another county, then you must have taken it to be as they said it; then if they do not distinguish the place of the fact, your lordship can only take it to be where they owned it; it will be supposed to be done in that place till they disprove it; for when they owned the fact, it will be supposed, if they do not say or prove where it was done, that it was done where they owned it, because the king can’t tell where it was done; but the evidence comes out of their own mouths, they may give satisfaction where it was done, for they know it; and till that be done, all reasonable supposition is against them, that it was done in the place where they owned it; and this is a case wherein they speak of their own fact. If I publish the writing of another person which is libellous, I am to answer only for the publishing and not for the writing, which is not my own fact; but if these lords publish a libel that they make themselves, it is in their own knowledge, and in their own power to tell where it was done, because the making and publishing is their own act. If my lords had published a paper that was contrived by some of their counsel, it had been some excuse for them, and they must only have answered that publication in the place where it was done; but they are here for writing this they have owned in this county, and therefore it lies upon them to prove it was done elsewhere. There is another objection, my lord, made, that here is no evidence of a publication. My lord, I take it to be a publication in itself for a man to write a libel, to set his name to it and part with it, and it comes into the hands of the king, who is libelled by it, is not this a publication of the libel, and to be supposed by the writer unless the contrary appear? Will saying, I did not publish it, excuse him, when the fact is proved? for can there be a greater evidence of publication in itself than this, when some of the men have written it, others set their hands to it, and all owned their names? What makes the fact in this case? If a deed be denied to be factum of such a one, what is the proof of it, but proving the hand and seal of the party without proof of the delivery of the deed, yet hand and seal without delivery doth not make a sufficient deed? Their owning the paper, and setting their hands is a publication in itself in reasonable construction and understanding, and therefore they cannot make any such objection. My lord, if there were occasion, we have authorities to this purpose, and we will give them scope enough if they will argue this matter; and if they have any evidence, we desire to hear what they can say to it.

Att. Gen. As for this matter of fact, my lord, if I take it right, they do not controvert the publishing, but, say they, pray make it out where it was written or composed. I confess, this would be a business worth the while, for all persons that act in this manner, and are concerned in making of libels, to understand for their advantage. No man doubts in the matter of treason, but it is local; then put the case, a man is found in Middlesex with a treasonable paper in his pocket; I do not make a comparison, as if this was such a paper, I hope I am not so understood; but I only put it as a case, and that the law is so, is beyond all controversy; then the man is indicted here in Middlesex, for framing and composing such a treasonable libel, and he comes to be tried, and, says he, pray prove where I made and composed it; for though you found it in my pocket in the county of Middlesex, yet I might do it in the county of York; and, upon my word, this had been a very good defence for Mr. Sidney, who was indicted, convicted, and attainted, for making a treasonable paper which was found in his study; might not he have put the same objection? Might not Mr. Sidney have said (it was great pity he did not understand it) pray prove where I did it, for I did it elsewhere than in this county—

Sol. Gen. He did say it, I remember.

Att. Gen. Truly, my lord, I would not hear any answer given to this, for it would make the king in a very woful case: here is a paper that is found in the county of Middlesex, and this is there owned by you to be written and subscribed by you; pray do you prove it, that it was written elsewhere.

Serj. Pemberton. My lord, we will do it, we will be governed by Mr. Attorney for once.

Serj. Levinz. We will prove that my lord archbishop was not in Middlesex in seven months before; and truly I think Mr. Attorney's case of a paper found about a man, or in his custody, will not come up to our case; for was this paper found about us? Surely that is not pretended.

Serj. Pemberton. Your lordship sees by the very frame of the petition, that this petition, which they call a libel, was made after the king's order concerning reading this declaration. Now we shall prove that my lord archbishop, whose hand-writing they prove this to be, was not out from Lambeth-house in two months before, nor till he was before the council.

Sir R. Sawyer. Which was long after that time when it was made.

Serj. Pemberton. So that this cannot be written in the county of Middlesex.

Call F. Nicholls. [Mr. Nicholls was sworn.]

Sir R. Sawyer. Do you remember the 18th of May last?—Mr. Nicholls. Yes, Sir.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray how was it with my lord archbishop of Canterbury at that time; and before that, did he go abroad?

Mr. Nicholls. My lord, I am very sure that my lord his grace of Canterbury, whom I have served in his bed-chamber these seven years, never stirred out of the gate of Lambeth-house since Michaelmas last.

Sir R. Sawyer. Till when, Mr. Nicholls?

Nicholls. Not till the time he was summoned before the council.

Serj. Pemberton. Now I hope we have given them a full proof that it could not be in Middlesex.

Call Thomas Smith. [Mr. Smith was not examined.]

Mr. Finch. Truly, my lord, I think what we have proved, or what proof we further offer of my lord of Canterbury's not being in Middlesex for so long a time, is ex abundanti, and we need it not; for with humble submission in point of law, it is incumbent upon them that are to prove the charge in the information, to prove where it was done; because the locality of it is part of the thing, they ought to prove it. In its nature it is local, there is a place assigned in the information, and unless they prove it was done in the place that they have laid, they have not proved the charge in the information. Now, my lord, they have not made proof of that, and for proof of publication, I think they have offered none to your lordship; they never did call it so yet, and truly I never did hear or know that the owning of their hands at the council-table was a publication of a libel: it is owning the writing, but it is not an owning where the writing was made; but where it was written, and where it was made is of necessity to be proved. Before the charge upon a record, in a court of justice, can be said to be made out, it is a local charge, and in justice, the locality must be proved, or the information fails. My lord, they have offered no proof to it, and they have not yet gone to the second part of the information; for as to the publication of it, there is not a tittle of proof offered, but only the owning of their hands upon their examination at the council, and no man did ever think that the answering a question and owning a paper at the council-table, upon a question put by the king himself, was a publication of a libel.

Serj. Baldock. Pray, my lord, hear me a word to that: though the thing be never so local yet there must be some place where a thing that was done, was done. Then if nothing else appears but what was done in Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, unless they shew the contrary, that must be the very place where it was done.

Sol. Gen. Here is a great deal of prevarication in this matter, and I would observe to your lordship how they do use the court ill in it: pray, my lord, what is it we are upon? We are proving that these seven lords, the bishops, signed this paper; and I think we have proved it sufficiently out of their own mouths: but, say they, it was not signed in the county of Middlesex, but in the county of Surrey. All this is but imagination, and they would have the court to imagine it too: For how do they prove it? They would have your lordship and the jury believe, that it was signed elsewhere, because my lord archbishop has not been out of his house in some months before: It is all but inference, and argument, and imagination. But still, gentlemen, do you answer what I objected to you? Does it not lie in their power to shew where it was signed? Here are six more, besides the archbishop, where was it signed by them? Here are six of the bishops that signed it besides my lord archbishop, it does not appear where they signed it; but they confess at Whitehall, in Middlesex, that they did set their hands and sign it, and do not say in what place.

Serj. Levinz. Ay, they did so, and what then?

Sol. Gen. Ay, and ay too; if they did so, the presumption and common intendment upon such evidence is, that it was done in the place where it was owned; and the rather for that reason that I offered before, that it lies in their knowledge; and therefore it is incumbent upon them to prove, that it was not in the county of Middlesex, else the presumption is against them: so that this objection I take rather to be an invention of the counsel than the truth of the fact, because they that can make this out, do it not. And as to what they say of my lord archbishop, that he has not been out of his doors in Lambeth for so long a time, who can prove such a thing? Certainly my lord was able to come abroad for any thing that appears; he has been here twice, and he was able to come and came to the council-board: but when all is done, my lord archbishop is certainly able to put this matter out of doubt; for he may easily prove it, if the fact was done in Surrey; and that will satisfy the court and every person that hears this cause, that it was signed by him at Lambeth, in Surrey, if he designs to deal sincerely with your lordship and the court, and the jury; but certainly it is not to be proved by a circumstance, such a fallible one as this is, but he ought to give your lordship and the jury satisfaction about this fact: he ought to say, it is true, I did sign it, but it was at Lambeth house; that indeed would be a down-right stroke to this cause: but to go upon a supposition, that because my lord archbishop was not out of his house for so long together, therefore they are all not guilty, is a very hard and foreign inference. My lord, there's another matter that they insist upon; and that is about the publication; that is as plain as any thing can be, that here is a full proof of a publication; for if the paper be libellous, wherever that paper is, that is a publishing; wherever a paper travels, how far soever it goes, it is a publication of it by these persons that signed it. I believe nobody thinks that this should fly into the king's hand, but somebody brought it to him; and certainly, my lord, if your opinion shall be, that this paper is libellous, then wherever it is, it is a publishing, which is an offence; wherever it is found, it is a publication; for there is the mistake of these gentlemen, they fancy, that unless there was a public delivery of this paper abroad, nothing can be a publication; but I rely upon it, they setting their names to it, made it their paper; and wherever it was afterwards found, that did follow the paper wherever it went, and was a publication of it, was in their power, it being their own contrivance; it was made and framed by themselves, and nobody will believe, when it was in their own hands that they put to it, that any body else could have any power over it:

For aught appears no body else was at work about it, and when there were so many learned prelates that had such a paper, no one can believe they would let it go out of their hands, without their own consent or privity, and it could not reasonably go out of their hands but by their consent, privity or direction. Is not this an evidence of the publishing? Do they give your lordships any evidence that they had stifled this paper, or secreted, [secured] it, or kept it in the dark or endeavoured to stifle it? If they had so done, they had said something; but will any body believe all this was done in vain by my lords the seven bishops? Can any body assign a reason why so solemn a thing as this should be done to no end and purpose? Why a paper should be framed that rails at* the king's two declarations? Why a paper that gives reasons why they could not read it in their churches, and signed with such solemnity by all these lords and learned prelates; we submit this to your judgment in point of law; and the law is plain, that if this paper be libellous, and it is found in the county of Middlesex, this is a publication of that libel in the county of Middlesex, prima facie. I shall mention to your lordship that case of Williams, which is reported in the second part of Roll's Reports,† fol. 88. Mr. Finch made use of it in the case of Mr. Sidney; it was the great case then relied upon for their purpose, and that guided and governed that case (as I apprehend) from the verdict and judgment that was given in it. This case was in judgment 17 Jacobi.‡

* In sir William Williams's MS. the words 'rails at' are obliterated and 'argues against' substituted.

‡ The remainder of this Argument, after many obliterations and interlineations, stands thus in sir W. Williams's MS. copy:

"It seems Williams was a barrister of the Middle Temple, and being a high Romish Catholic he was expelled the House, and being so expelled and a sort of zealot, he wrote two books, the one called Balaam's Ass, the other Speculum Regale, and there he makes use of the prophecy of Daniel where the prophet speaks of time and times, &c. he makes application of it to the present time by a parallel of the then present times to the time described by the prophet, and concludes according to his own particular fancy, that the world was near its end, and he said those ill days were come mentioned in that prophecy, and because of the impurity of prince, priest and people, and other things that happened, they were the worst of days, and therefore the last. When he had writ this book in this rapture, he pretends he did not write these books as proceeding from any malicious or disloyal heart against the king, but it proceeded from his affection to him to astonish him, whereby he might avoid the mischiefs which were like to happen to him, for he concluded most of his prophecies with

It seems Williams was a barrister of the Inner Temple, and it seems, being an high catholic for opinion and judgment, he was expelled the House; and he being so expelled (being a sort of a Virtuoso) wrote a book called Balaam's Ass; and therein he makes use of the prophet Daniel, and he makes application of it according to his own particular fancy. He writes there that this world was near at an end; and he said, those ill days were come that that prophecy spoke of; and because of the impurity of prince, and priest, and people, and other things that happened, those were the worst of days, and therefore the last; and that certainly we had the worst prince that ever was in the world: when he wrote this book, what does he do? He was a little more close than my lords the bishops, and pins it up, or seals it up, and it was brought to the king; and what is this more than the case before your lordship? They indeed say, I do this by way of advice to the king; so said he, I do this by way of advice to the king, for God forbid that any of this should happen to the king; and so what he does, was by way of advice, and he prayed God to avert it from him. Here was as good a prayer as there is in this paper, and there was a good design; he made use of the prophet Daniel, and applied his words. Well, what was done upon it? This was never published; for the question was before the court, whether this sealing of it up, and not delivering it to any other body, were a publication? The court

God avert or God save the king; he was a little more close than my lords the bishops in the manner of conveying these books to the king, by sealing them up in a box and conveying them to the king, and what is this more than the case before your lordship as to the manner of publishing. They indeed say we do this by way of advice to the king, so doth Williams with his God forbid that any of this prophecy should happen to the king, and prayed God would avert it from him. Here was as good a prayer, as there is in this paper, and there was a good design he made use of the prophecy of the prophet Daniel and applied his words; this was never published by him but conveyed secretly sealed in a box to the king: the question was before the court, whether this writing and sealing of it up without delivering it to any other person, then thus secretly conveyed to the king, was publication? The court was of opinion that the very writing of it was a publication by construction of law, they did not regard the delivery of it to the prince, but it was proved he writ it and that made it treason, and so resolved in that case, and that opinion prevailed in Mr. Sidney's case. My lord, we have cases in my lord Hobart of such publication received in criminal matters, sir Baptist Hicks's Case, and my lady Hatton's Case, there was an abusive letter sealed up and secretly delivered to the party abused without any other publication, this sentenced to be a libel and sufficiently published, and so punished."

was of opinion, that the very writing of it was a publication; they did not value the delivery of it to the prince, but it was proved he writ it, and that made it treason. My lord, we have cases enough in my lord Hobart for this matter; sir Baptist Hicks's Case, and my lady Hatton's Case; there was only a letter sealed up and delivered to the party.

L. C. J. You need not trouble yourself about that, Mr. Solicitor.

Sol. Gen. If the case then be thus, I take it, it will turn upon this fact; they have given your lordship no proof where this paper was signed by them: Here are seven persons that had a hand in it, and here is only one person whom they have insisted upon to be infirm, and kept his house for a great while together. We say the publishing follows the libel wherever it goes; the libel is in the county of Middlesex, they have confessed it in the county of Middlesex, and they did not distinguish when it was done. Then if they will not distinguish upon the evidence, no man ought to distinguish, but ought to presume it was done in that place where they owned it, and the law doth so presume.

Att. Gen. I did not apprehend we were got so far, that they opposed us in the publication.

Sir R. Sawyer. Yes, we did, for you have given no evidence of it.

Att. Gen. Surely, my lord, for that we have given a sufficient evidence, and they have given some proof of it, as to my lord archbishop; that because he had not been from Lambeth, therefore he did not publish, nor could cause it to be published; for your lordship sees by this information, they are not only to answer the Publicavit, but also the Publicari causavit; for do you doubt, gentlemen of the law, in this case, that if I compose a libel in Surrey, for example, and send a person over into Middlesex, I am not guilty of the publishing?

Sir R. Sawyer. That is not your case, Mr. Attorney.

Mr. Finch. That were clear if it were so, but it is not so.

Att. Gen. My lord archbishop's case signifies nothing, if we shew it was published in Middlesex, and you give no evidence to the contrary but it might be there; and I am sure as to the rest of my lords the bishops, there is no evidence at all given. Here is a petition that we say is a libel; they, it may be, will make that a question: This is delivered to the king's own hand in the county of Middlesex, and there are as many cases as any one man can name, that this amounts to a publication by the party; for if I send a letter by the post sealed, that nobody can see but the party himself, and he that writ it, it is adjudged over and over again it is a libel.

Just. Powell. That you need not labour, Mr. Attorney, for that's the case of Williams of Essex; but how do you apply it to the case now before us?

Att. Gen. That's an answer to their objection as to the publication.

Just. Powell. But what say you to the first part? You have not proved that it was written in Middlesex.

Att. Gen. There is the case of Barrow and Lewellin in Hobart, and likewise the case of sir Baptist Hicks, which is reported both in Hobart and in Popham; and in Popham, towards the end of the case, there is a remarkable passage. Says that case, if it should not be punishable at the suit of the king, there would be no remedy; for the party cannot bring an action, because he can be no witness for himself, and it is only known betwixt them two; but a witness for the king he may be, to prove his own receipt of the letter, and the party's hand.

Just. Powell. You need not labour that point, I'll tell you, Mr. Attorney; for the law is very clear in that point, I think, if you bring it home to your case.

Att. Gen. Then here's the case in short, my lord; that my lords the bishops have caused to be made and written this petition, they are made parties to it by setting their names, and this is a continued act: whatsoever is written there is my lord archbishop's writing, wherever it goes, as I'll put a case that's very well known. If I take away goods from a man in the county of Cumberland, and I am found with them in the county of Middlesex, it is a continued act, and makes all but one felony, and I shall be tried here in Middlesex for it. If a man write a thing in one county, and it is sent and dispersed in another county, that still continues to be his fact, though it may be the first part was not in the same county with the other: but suppose all this while that part should not affect my lord of Canterbury, the causing it to be published does.

Just. Powell. Do you think, Mr. Attorney, that writing in one county is such a continued act, that he may be said to write it in another county?

Att. Gen. Sir, I take it, where there is a complicated crime of writing and publishing a libel; and the beginning of it is in one county, and the carrying it on is in another, that is a continued act, and may be tried in either county.

L. C. J. It is all one act of libelling, as they say.

Just. Holloway. In cases of felony it is so; taking in one county, and being found with the goods in another, it is felony in either county.

Just. Powell. But in that case they are two felonies; for it is robbery in the one county, and but bare felony in the other.

Sol. Gen. Suppose that my lords the bishops signed this paper in another county, and my lord archbishop consents to have it sent into Middlesex, is not this a causing it to be published in another county?

Just. Powell. Yes, it may be, if you prove his consent.

Sol. Gen. Then suppose further, which will very well consist with my lord archbishop's evidence of his not being out of Lambeth in so long a time the rest of the bishops might sign it in Middlesex, or it may be in Lambeth; and then they carry it from Lambeth by my lord archbishop's consent over hither into this county: is not this a causing it to be published in this county? The delivery with his consent certainly is a proof or an evidence of this, for our information goes two ways; for making, contriving, writing, and publishing, that's one way; and then for causing it to be made, contrived and published, that's the other way. And if I prove that he caused it to be published, he may be found guilty as to that part, and not guilty as to the other: for the information is not so entire, but that the king has his choice. If my lord archbishop had not signed it, or written it, but had caused it to be published, he may be found guilty of so much and not guilty of the rest. But if he be guilty of any one of these things, it is enough to have a verdict for so much; though he be guilty of none of the other things laid in the information, yet if he be guilty of causing this paper to be published, that ought to be found for the king, and I conceive his consenting that the rest of the bishops should publish or present this to the king in Middlesex is an evidence that will be enough to maintain this information. Then, my lord, is there any evidence brought against what we have proved, that he did not consent or dissent to this?

Just. Powell. But where was this consent of his given, Mr. Solicitor?

Sol. Gen. Pray, good Sir, give me your favour, I think I am in a plain case that this consent was in the place where he wrote and signed this paper, and delivered the paper to be presented.

Serj. Pemberton. So you are truly.

Sol. Gen. Why, good Sir, you ought to make out the locality, if you'll take advantage of it. The presumption, in common and reasonable understanding, is with us.

Serj. Pemberton. That's very well, indeed! This is the first time I ever heard that doctrine.

Sol. Gen. I cannot help that, but certainly the law is plain: we have proved the fact of writing and signing was done by my lords the bishops, and they do not go about to prove that it was done elsewhere than in Middlesex, where we have laid it; for if they did, then the truth would more manifestly appear, their witnesses being cross-examined by us; and then the truth of the matter would appear to the satisfaction of mankind. The archbishop might be at Lambeth, and yet guilty of causing this paper to be published in Middlesex, by his concurrence with what was done in Middlesex by the other lords the bishops: and I say, my lord, this is natural, upon the evidence that has been given, to be supposed, and ought to be believed; because when they were interrogated at the council-board, and confessed the paper to be theirs, they made no such explanation of their confession, as to any place that they signed it at out of Middlesex, of which they can take any advantage in their defence. Here has been no person produced that proves any thing to be done out of Middlesex; so that still if they be guilty of the fact proved, they must be guilty in Middlesex, for aught yet appearing.

Serj. Baldock. And it does not appear, in this case, but that my lord archbishop might write the same thing in Middlesex, though he was at Lambeth so long as the witness speaks of.

Just. Powell. How do you make out that, brother?

Serj. Baldock. He might do it when he came over to the council.

Sir R. Sawyer. He must do it after it was presented.

Serj. Baldock. Might he not be so long here on this side the water, as to make such a short thing as this, before it was delivered? Half of a quarter of an hour would have done it.

L. C. J. That's a thing not to be presumed, brother, especially since he is proved not to have been in Middlesex so long together.

Sir R. Sawyer. Mr. Serjeant is mightily mistaken, for it is not pretended, that it was delivered at the time when the archbishop, and my lords the bishops, were before the council.

Recorder. (Sir Bartholomew Shower.) Either the making and contriving, or the publishing of this libel will do upon this information; for they shall be taken to be one continued complicated act, and then the party may be tried in either of the counties, as the king will; as in the case of treason, it has been over and over again adjudged, that if a man does one act of treason in one county, and afterwards goes into another county, and does another act of treason, the jury of either of the counties may enquire of the fact done in the other. If they then should take those two as several acts, they were several offences, and they may be found guilty of the one and acquitted of the other; but if they are taken as one continued act, they are but one offence, and the jury of either county may try it. If then, in this case, the jury of this county may take notice of the publication which was here, as certainly they may, if they will agree, as the law certainly is, that the writing of a letter will be a sufficient publication, if the matter be libellous. And there are multitudes of precedents for that; and that the bare setting of a man's hand has been adjudged to be a publication: then give me leave, my lord, to bring it to a similar case: suppose a man write a scandalous letter from London, to a judge or magistrate in Exeter, and sends it by the post, and the letter is received from the post at Exeter, and there opened; would any man make a question whether the gentleman that sent the letter may not be indicted and prosecuted for a libel at Exeter, where the libel was received?

Just. Powell. There's no question of that, Mr. Recorder; that comes not home to the fact in our case: undoubtedly in the case that you put, the law is as you said, but it is far different from this case.

L. C. J. There's nobody opposes the publication, but the framing of it, where it was made.

Recorder. Supposing then the party were at Exeter, and he were interrogated before the magistrate, whether it were his hand or no, and he should own it to be his hand, can any body doubt whether his owning that to be his hand, would be a sufficient evidence to prove a publication?

Just. Powell. But is that any evidence where it was written? Or if it be not proved that it was received at Exeter, would that be a proof of a publication at Exeter?

L. C. J. They do not deny the publication.

Sir R. Sawyer. We do deny that there was any publication; and they have proved no place where it was made.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we are not for turning my lords the bishops out of the way of proof that is usual in such cases; let them take it if they will, that this was contrived and made in Surry. Can they publish it in Middlesex, without committing an offence; and is not that offence sufficiently charged in this information? that is it we stand upon: we are not for laying a greater load upon my lords the bishops than our proof will bear.

Sir R. Sawyer. We thank you for your compliment, Mr. Solicitor.

Sol. Gen. Is this a fair way, gentlemen, of interrupting us when we are speaking? Durst any one have served you so when you were in the king's service? We would do our duty for the king, and yet make it as easy as we can to my lords the bishops, and it may be easier than other men would have made it, in our places. But, my lord, let it be a doubtful case, that we cannot tell in which county this was made and contrived, if it were made and contrived in another county than Middlesex, yet when they brought it into Middlesex, there was a publication in Middlesex; and if my lord of Canterbury consented to it, he is also guilty in Middlesex for so much, for causing it to be published: how can any body ever get him off from that causing of it to be published? Here is a paper that must be supposed to be my lord archbishop's paper: now all the world must look upon it to be an imposture put upon my lords the bishops, or a real paper made by them. If it were an imposture and an affront put upon my lords the bishops, they ought to make it out for their own vindication, and to prove themselves innocent: if they do that, they do well, and they ought to have satisfaction made them by those that have so highly injured them; and the king cannot be better pleased, I am sure, than to find them so: but if men will look one way and act another, they must expect to be dealt with accordingly. Will any man that has heard this evidence, and sees that these gentlemen will not go the right way to work to prove their own innocence, believe them to be not guilty? 'Tis plain they contrived it and signed it; for can any one imagine that they set their hands to a paper that was not formed and contrived by themselves? Then let it go, that this was done in another county, and we cannot punish the writing of it in this county; yet still they are guilty of causing it to be published in this county, and for that we may punish them here: we will be content with having that found that we have proved, which certainly is an offence.

Sir R. Sawyer. We oppose that, Sir.

Sol. Gen. You oppose it! We know you'll oppose common sense; we don't speak to you, we speak to the court. We are content with what is plain, and do not desire to insist upon any strained construction: we say this is natural evidence for us; if this thing be a libel, as we conceive it is, then the causing it to be published is an offence. The publication, we say, was here in Middlesex, and of that there is clear evidence, because it was found and owned here in Middlesex by the defendants here, and came to the king's hand, to whom it was directed; and it could not come out of their hands who signed it, without their knowledge; it was their own child, the issue of their own brain, and it could not in reasonable speaking come to the king's hands out of their custody, without their consent. This, we say, is a clear evidence of a causing it to be published, let the rest go as it will, because we will take the easiest part of the case, and not go upon strains in a case of this nature and expectation.

Serj. Trinder. The greatest question is, I think, now come to the publishing—

L. C. J. The court is of opinion, that its coming to the king is a publishing.

Just. Powell. Ay, my lord, if it be proved to be done by them.

Serj. Pemberton. Before the court deliver their opinion, we desire to be heard.

L. C. J. Brother, you shall be heard in good time, but let them make an end on the other side, and when the king's counsel have done, we'll hear you.

Serj. Trinder. My lord, upon the question of publishing, it has been insisted upon, and the court seems to be very much of the same opinion, that the writing of it is a publishing: that it is without controversy, if the writing of it fell out to be in Middlesex, where the information is laid; but that they would not have to be so by argument, because the archbishop had kept in at Lambeth so long. But, suppose that it were so as they would have it, that is only as to the archbishop, he being the writer of it; but yet, notwithstanding that, the other six might subscribe it in Middlesex, taking it, that there is such a face in their argument as they would have it.

Sol. Gen. We will lay no greater load on the other six than we do upon my lord archbishop, and we say, they are all guilty of the publication in Middlesex.

Serj. Trinder. Pray, Sir, spare me. This paper was in the archbishop's custody and power, he taking of it himself; and regularly it could not have come out of his custody, in common supposition, but it must come with his consent. It was afterwards in the power of the other six, they had it to subscribe; whereas the subscription was non constat; they, it may be, can prove it themselves, but I will only deduce this argument; That if it after comes into Middlesex, it must be taken by presumption to be subscribed by them there, and published; it must be taken by presumption so to be.

L. C. J. No, brother, we ought not to do any thing by presumption here.

Just. Powell. No, no, by no means, we must not go upon presumptions but proofs.

L. C. J. I will not presume it to be made in Middlesex.

Serj. Trinder. But it is proved to be published in Middlesex.

Sir R. Sawyer. My lord, with submission, there is no evidence of the publication.

Att. Gen. That the court is to judge of.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray, good my lord, what instance of a publication have they given?

Sol. Gen. The court has heard the evidence, we leave it there.

Sir R. Sawyer. Was it their owning and acknowledging it was their hands, when the king asked them the question at the council-table? Surely the king's counsel won't pretend that was a publication, when it was done at the king's command! It was certainly the king that published it then, and not my lords the bishops.

Att. Gen. Well said.

Sir R. Sawyer. Don't you remember that, when Mr. Blathwayt said the king gave it to be read, and it was shewed to the bishops?

L. C. J. I remember what evidence Mr. Blathwayt gave of the passages at the council-board very well, and I know what Mr. Attorney did press about the king's promising to take no advantage.

Att. Gen. My lord, Mr. Attorney is on the other side, he did not press it.

L. C. J. Sir Robert Sawyer, I mean; I beg both your pardons, gentlemen, I think I have done injury to you both.

Sir R. Sawyer. My lord, we say there is no evidence at all, that ever this was sent to the king by the archbishop, or any of my lords the bishops: and as for the cases that they have put, they might have put five hundred cases, and all nothing to the purpose.

Sol. Gen. So they might, and done just as others had done before them.

Sir R. Sawyer. And so are these; for here is the question, We are in a case where the publication is that which makes it a crime: now I would have them, if they can, put me any such case, and then apply it to this. In Williams's case, the question is quite otherwise, and so in any case of treason it must be: wherever there is an overt-act proved, it is the treasonable intention, and the ill mind of the traitor, that is the crime; and the treason (the overt-act) is only to be the evidence of it. In that case of Williams, with submission, my lord, the publication was not at all necessary, but the very secretest act that could be done by him (if it were an act) is an evidence of the mind; and so the sending of the book to the king himself, though nobody else did see it, was an evidence of the crime of treason, yet it could not be called a publication. But in the other case of sir Baptist Hicks, which was in the Star-Chamber, about sending a letter of challenge, it was plainly resolved that it was no publication of the letter, and that was not the ground of the judgment given against him there, that it was the publication of a libel, but the very fact was a particular offence: for, said the court there, if you will send a letter to a private man, and that is a letter that will provoke him to break the peace, that is an offence punishable in the Star-Chamber; but that is not the reason which is alledged, because no action will lie for want of proof, but quite the contrary; because they may produce the porter or party that brought it, and prove it that it came from this man's hands; and I do not question but that in the King's-Bench at this day, if a man will write a letter privately, to provoke another man to fight, there will lie an information, but not for a libel; for there it will be necessary for to make an offence, that there may be a publication; for that is the very form of the crime, and upon that ground were all those judgments against libels in the Star-Chamber. My lord, I agree to write a letter to the king of another person, or to make a petition to the king concerning another person, as of my lord chancellor, or the judges, or the like, to complain to the king of them scandalously, with a provoking and reviling language, that is a publication; and so if I write a letter to one man of another; if there be scandal in a letter, that is a publication of a libel; and that is the difference that has been always taken, where it is essential to make it a libel, that there be a publication, such a publication must be proved; and the delivery of a letter to a man that concerns himself, is no publication; but in this case they have not so much as proved that it was delivered to the king.

Serj. Pemberton. My lord, with your lordship's leave, I take it, that they have given no manner of evidence of a publication; to say, the writing and subscribing of their names to a paper, is a publication of that paper, is such a doctrine truly as I never heard before. Supposing this paper had lain in my study, subscribed by me, but never went further; would this have been a publication? They never said any such thing. As to Algernon Sidney's case, there was no colour for it, that it should be a publication; but it was an overt-act of treason to compose such a book. They have proved by our confession here, that we have subscribed this paper; they would take it now, that therefore it must be presumed we sent this to the king, and so surmise us into an information for making and publishing a libel, which we sent to the king; but they do not prove it all. My lord, there are a thousand ways that it might come into Middlesex, and perhaps come to the king's hands too, without our knowledge of delivery; and sure you will not presume these noble persons, without evidence, to be guilty of such an offence as this is suggested to be? So that, my lord, and gentlemen of the jury, 'tis impossible for you to find this a publication in Middlesex; and for the other thing (the writing this paper) they that would make it an offence, must prove where it was done.

Serj. Levinz. My lord, the answer that I shall give to what has been said on the other side, is very short; the cases that have been cited are all law, but not one tittle to this purpose. In sir Baptist Hick's case, and Williams's case, it was proved they all sent them to the places whither they were directed; but is there a tittle of proof that these bishops sent it here? In all those cases they must send it either by a porter or a carrier, and they send it as their own act; and when it comes there, by their sending, that is sufficient proof of their act in the place whither it is sent: and for Sidney's case, there was treason in the very libel and book that he made; and he was not indicted for publishing, but for treason, in the place where it was found, because it was found in his possession: but was this ever in my lord archbishop's possession in Middlesex, or the rest of the bishops, and were they publishing of it? If it had, then it had been their act clearly: but that is the thing wherein they are defective, that they do not prove that my lords the bishops sent or brought it here; but upon the question asked them by the king, they acknowledged it to be their hands: so that, my lord, there is no proof of any fact done here, but an acknowledgment of a fact done, nobody knows where, upon the king's question here in Middlesex: is that any proof of this information?

Mr. Finch. Pray, my lord, spare me a word on the same side; let us see what the evidence is. The evidence is this, That the king brought the paper to the council-table, and the bishops owned their hands to it: this is the effect of the evidence, and all that is to prove the forming and making a libel in Middlesex, and the publication of that libel. And what is therefore inferred from thence? Why, having proved that the king brought the paper to the council-table, and the bishops owned their hands; therefore, first, the bishops made this libel in Middlesex. Secondly, they brought it to the council-table, and published it at the council-table, or else there is no proof at all: for here is nothing of evidence given of any fact, but because they acknowledged it, therefore they made it, therefore they gave it to the king in Middlesex: this were good evidence if they had had the help of a supposition to make it good; but they want that, nor must any such thing be admitted; but I think they are such gross, false consequences, that I doubt not you'll be of opinion, here's no proof of a publication in Middlesex, and then there is no proof at all against my lords the bishops.

Mr. Pollexfen. I must confess, I hear them say, two acts prove a publication in this case; the one is, the writing of the libel, and the subscribing. If so, then I think, upon the evidence that has been given, the court must needs be satisfied, that the writing of it was in Surrey: The next is their owning their hands: for there is no act done that appears or any evidence against them of any act done from the time of the writing, to the time that they were asked, is this your hand? Surely no man would ever think this to be a publication, where one is asked by authority, whether such a paper be his hand, and he acknowledges it in answer to that question! To turn this to be a crime, I think it can never be done, nor never was before. Then there is nothing in the case, that they can hold to for evidence, and proof against my lords the bishops, but the writing; and that is apparent to have been in Surrey, or otherwise they must hold that the answer to the king's question, This is my hand, is a publication. But truly, my lord, I think neither of these will do: but, my lord, to me this is a great evidence in itself against the proof of a publication, the care and wariness that has been used, that there should be nothing at all of this matter known, from the time that it was written, to the time that they came to be examined and summoned to appear as offenders. My lord, the nature of libels is to publish and proclaim scandal and defamation, or else it loses its end, and consequently its name. This as it stands upon their evidence, is a monstrous proof for my lords the bishops, against the king's counsel; for it seems 'tis a very private matter, so cautiously and warily carried, that there is not any evidence of the fact, but only the names of the persons that writ it, till they come to be examined by the greatest authority, Is this your hand? And then they own it so to be. How can this be taken to be a publication? And it will be a thing of wonderful consequence, if an answer to a question put by authority, should amount to a crime, as it would in this case: that would be, as if authority, that should be employed to do right, would be turned to do the greatest wrong; for it is the duty of all men to answer when examined by a lawful authority, and it would never be offered at, sure, in any other case. If a man comes before a magistrate, and confesses any thing, that indeed is evidence, but is not a crime; for there is a great deal of difference between evidence and the crime; but that this should be both an evidence and a crime too, is, I think, a very strange construction; and for the other part (the writing of it) I suppose the court is satisfied that it was in another county.

Sir George Treby. I desire your lordship to spare me a word, which I think has not been observed by the counsel that have spoke before. The question that remains, is, Whether my lords the bishops did publish this paper? This is a matter of fact that lies upon the prosecutors to prove. Now I think they are so far from being proved that the bishops did publish it, that, on the contrary, they have proved that their lordships did not publish it. The evidence they have offered for this matter is a confession. This confession is testified by Mr. Blathwayt, and he says the bishops were asked at the council whether they did subscribe and publish this paper, and that their answer was, that they did subscribe, but not publish it. Now a confession must be taken together, and must be admitted to be entirely true by them that produce it; they shall never be allowed to take out and use one piece, and wave the rest. Why then by this evidence of confession, taken as it ought, it appears that the bishops, though they did subscribe, did not publish the paper: so that, I say, the king's counsel have hereby plainly proved, that the bishops did not publish this paper, and yet this is the only evidence upon which they would infer that they did publish it.

Att. Gen. Look you, it does lie upon you, gentlemen, to prove it was done elsewhere than in Middlesex.

Mr. Finch. Sure Mr. Attorney is in jest!

Att. Gen. No, I am in good earnest; all the proof that we have given has been in Middlesex, and you can best tell whether you did it in Middlesex or no.

Mr. Finch. My lord, we have done as to this objection; for we say they have not proved their case.

L. C. J. Mr. Finch, you may observe (and I am sure you do observe as well as any body in all cases), but I say, you may observe that they are off of every thing but causing it to be published; now that does lie upon the king's counsel to prove, that my lords the bishops did cause it to be published; for their owning their hands does not amount to publication.

Serj. Pemberton. My lord, we are upon this point with them, whether here be any evidence of a publication at all?

Just. Powell. Pray let us clear this first; for if there be no publication, there can be no causing of it to be published.

Att. Gen. My lord, if you think fit, we shall go on, and reserve this point till afterwards.

Sol. Gen. They may make objections, if they think fit.

L. C. J. So they may, and they say if these objections are with us, we need go no farther.

Serj. Pemberton. But, my lord, if they be not with us, we have a reserve to give a farther answer to it, and to offer evidence against the evidence they have offered.

Sol. Gen. With all our hearts, give in evidence what you can.

Att. Gen. Then pray, my lord, let us go on to answer this objection.

L. C. J. Pray do, Mr. Attorney.

Att. Gen. My lord and gentlemen of the jury, I would first observe how far we have gone. That there was such a paper written is clear beyond all question, and written by my lord archbishop of Canterbury, and that it was signed by the rest of the bishops, but not in the county of Middlesex, and that this paper was published, is agreed on all hands.

Just. Hol. No, they do not agree to that.

Att. Gen. Do I say it was published by them? But there was such a paper published.

Serj. Pemberton. No, we say it was never published at all.

L. C. J. Pray, brother Pemberton, be quiet; if Mr. Attorney in opening does say any thing that he ought not to say, I will correct him, as I would do any body that does not open things right as they are proved; but pray don't you that are at the bar interrupt one another, it is unbecoming men of your profession to be chopping in and snapping at one another.—Go on, Mr. Attorney.

Att. Gen. I say, that the paper is proved to be written and signed by my lords the bishops; that I take for granted; and that the paper so signed and written is now published to the world, is also evident; but the question is, Who it was done by, or who caused it to be done? We are reduced to that question. Now, first, it is agreed on all hands, that if I send a letter to a private man containing scandalous things in it, though there is no proof more, but that it was sent sealed, and received by the party; in that case it was a fault punishable in the Star-Chamber, as a crime: but now that this was received by the king, and written by them, there is no room for doubt; for you hear it was produced by the king at the council board, and they asked upon it, If it were their hands? That the king did receive it, there is no room for question, or that they did write it; but the question is, from whom the king had it? I am sure they must shew that somebody else did it; and unless they do shew that, I hope there is no manner of question but it came from them, and they did it; though no man living knew any thing of this matter, but whom they thought fit to communicate it to; yet still they putting the king upon the necessity of shewing this power, in order to his obtaining satisfaction for it, or else he must remain under the indignity without reparation, it ought to be put upon them to clear the fact; for if he does not produce it, then must the king put up the highest injury and affront that perhaps a man can give the king to his face, by delivering a libel into his own hands; and if he does produce it, then say they, That is not our publication. We prove it to be your writing and signing, and we prove it to come from the hand of the king against whom it was composed; for we say it is a libel against his majesty, his government and prerogative: if then all those cases that have been cited be law, then sure there never was a stronger case in the world than this; and I hope the law goes a little farther in the case of the king, than it does in the case of a private man. No man must think by policy to give private wounds to the government, and disparage the administration of it, and then, when he is called in question about it, says he, Pray prove that I published it, or else you shall not punish me for it. We prove you framed it, and writ it, and signed it, and we prove it came to the king's hand, of whom it was composed. Must we produce two witnesses of the delivery of it to the king? Surely there will be no need of any thing of that.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we have reduced it now to a very narrow question; for, as Mr. Attorney has said, my lord, there is no doubt but that my lords the bishops are the authors of this paper; there is no doubt but they signed it, and there is no doubt but that their signing of it, though it were at Lambeth, as they say, is a publishing of it: but, however, this is plain and manifest, that this paper was published; and that this was published in Middlesex, this is as plain too: now then there is nothing left but this question, whether my lords the bishops, who formed the paper, who wrote the paper, who signed the paper, were not the occasion or the cause of its publication, or privy or consenting to it in the county of Middlesex. My lord, I will reduce it to a very plain point; for we are upon a rational question, before a rational court, and a rational jury, whether these lords did all of them, in the county of Surry, consent to the publishing of this paper in Middlesex? For it is published in Middlesex (that we see); and if they are guilty of consenting to its being published in Middlesex, then they are guilty of that part of the information of causing it to be published in the county of Middlesex, now what do they say to it? Say they, it is agreed, that it is published in Middlesex, but it is not proved to be published by us.

L. C. J. No, they do not say so; they agree it was in Middlesex, but not published.

Just. Powell. Mr. Solicitor, they do agree it was in Middlesex, but not published to be sure, nor by them.

L. C. J. Mr. Solicitor, I'll tell you what they stand upon; they say you ought to prove it to be delivered to the king by the bishops, or somebody employed by them; for upon that went the resolution that was in Williams's case that he sent it to the king; but here is nobody that proves that it was delivered to the king in this case, so that how it came to the king non constat.

Sol. Gen. There will be the question between us, whether this be not a publication in Middlesex upon all that is said by us without repetition of things over and over.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray, Mr. Solicitor, prove your case before you argue it.

L. C. J. First settle what the case is, before you argue it.

Sol. Gen. My lord, I'll put you the case. Here does appear in Middlesex a paper that is a libel in itself, and this libel is proved to be written and formed by these persons; this libel coming into Middlesex, the question is, whether they are privy to it? I say in point of presumption it must come from them.

L. C. J. I cannot suppose it; I cannot presume any thing.

Sol. Gen. My lord, I speak of that which is a common presumption, a natural presumption, what we commonly call a violent presumption, which is a legal presumption, and has always been allowed for evidence.* Now whether there be not such a presumption, in our case, as to induce your lordship and the jury to believe that it cannot be otherwise; or at least to put the labour upon them, to shew how it came out of their studies, and how it came to the king's hands; for it is in their power to shew the truth of this matter, how it was; if they do not, the presumption will lie upon them. That the paper came to the king, that is plain enough; and its coming to the king's hands, is a plain proof of a publication in Middlesex; and who should bring it to the king, but these persons in whose power it was? There is no man undertakes to say, he lost it, then what else is to be believed, but that it came from them? I speak of common supposition and belief; they may very well shew it, if it were not so. All that we can say in it is, here is a paper in Middlesex, this you agreed was once your paper and in your power, pray shew what became of it, or how came it out of your hands or power, it lies upon you to clear this doubt.

Recorder. My lord, there is but this question in the case; the question is not, whether the owning it be a publication, but whether here be any evidence that they did deliver it to favour, I would ask my lord president a question the king, now if they did deliver it to the king, that will be agreed to me to be a publication.

Just. Holloway. No doubt of it, if you can prove it.

Recorder. Pray, Sir, spare me: That they did it, you have this evidence: first, that they were the authors of this paper by their own confession, that this was in the county of Middlesex, and that when they were asked concerning it, they owned it to be their handwriting. Now whether you can in the least question, after all this, their delivering of it to the king, or that it came to the king's hands without their knowledge or consent, is that which lies before your lordship for your judgment.

L. C. J. I will ask my brothers their opinion; but I must deal truly with you, I think it is not evidence against my lords the bishops.

Just. Holloway. Truly I think you have failed in your information; you have not proved any thing against my lords the bishops in the county of Middlesex, and therefore the jury must find them not guilty.

Att. Gen. I'll put you but one case, my lord: a man has an opportunity secretly to deliver a libel into the king's hands, when nobody is by, and so there can be no proof of the delivery.

Just. Powell. It is a dangerous thing, Mr.

Attorney, on the other side, to convict people of crimes without proof.

Att. Gen. But shall a man be permitted thus to affront the king, and there be no way to punish it?

L. C. J. Yes, there will sure, but it will be a very strange thing if we should go and presume that these lords did it, when there is no sort of evidence of it; it is that which I do assure you I cannot do: we must proceed according to evidence, and forms and methods of law; they may think what they will of me, but I always declare my mind according to my conscience.

Serj. Trinder. But as to that other point, whether their owning of it be a publication, has not been particularly spoke to.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, and Mr. Solicitor, if there were enough to raise doubt in the court, so as to leave it to the jury, I would sum up the evidence.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we know it is with the court, my lords the bishops insisted upon it, that it was a great while in their hands; but it seems as far as our evidence has gone hitherto, their confession went no farther than that it was their paper, and we must not extend their confession further than it was; but I think we shall offer a fair evidence that they did deliver it in the county of Middlesex.

L. C. J. Indeed, indeed, you ought to have gone to this, Mr. Solicitor, before the court gave their opinions.

Sol. Gen. Pray call Mr. Blathwayt again. [Mr. Blathwayt called.]

L. C. J. Mr. Solicitor, unless you are sure that Mr. Blathwayt is a witness to the publication, it is but spending the court's time to no purpose to call him.

Sol. Gen. We are sure of nothing, my lord; but we must make use of our witnesses, according to our instructions in our briefs. [Then Mr. Blathwayt appeared.]

Att. Gen. Mr. Blathwayt, you were sworn before?—Blathwayt. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. You were present when this Paper or Petition was delivered by the king, at the council-board?

Blathwayt. Yes, I was so, Sir.

Att. Gen. Do you remember any thing of the bishops acknowledging their delivery of it to the king?

Sol. Gen. Mr. Blathwayt, I would ask you, was there any mention in discourse with my lords the bishops, how that paper came into the king's hands? Was there any mention of what it was done for, upon the account of religion, or how?

Blathwayt. I don't remember any thing of that, Mr. Solicitor [at which there was a great laughter.]

L. C. J. Pray let us have no laughing, it is not decent; can't all this be done quietly without noise? Pray, Mr. Blathwayt, let me ask you, do you remember there was any discourse how that writing came into the king's hands?

Blathwayt. I received it from the king's

* See Lord C. J. De Gray's Argument in Dom. Proc.

hands, and I know it was presented to him by my lords the bishops.

L. C. J. How do you know it was presented to the king?

Blathwayt. I heard the king say so several times.

Sol. Gen. Pray mind my question, Sir: First, I ask you who produced the paper at the council-table?—Blathwayt. The king.

Sol. Gen. What said the bishops when that Paper was shewed them?

Blathwayt. Then, as I remember, they were asked, whether that was the Paper that they delivered to the king?

Sol. Gen. Then what said the bishops?

Blathwayt. They at first scrupled to answer, and they said it might be made use of to their prejudice if they owned it.

Att. Gen. Pray, Mr. Blathwayt, consider again; was that the question put to my lords the bishops, whether that was the Paper that was presented by them to the king?

Blathwayt. I do think, to the best of my remembrance, that my lord chancellor did ask them to that purpose, I cannot speak to the very words.

Sol. Gen. And upon this, what answer did they make?

Blathwayt. My lords the bishops scrupled to answer the first and second time, as I told you before, but they did own it was the Petition that they presented to the king, to the best of my remembrance.

Sol. Gen. Did my lord archbishop do or say any thing to own it?

Blathwayt. Yes, both my lord archbishop of Canterbury and the rest of the bishops did own all the same thing.

Sol. Gen. Was this done at Whitehall?

Blathwayt. Yes, at the council-table.

L. C. J. Pray recollect yourself, and consider what you say: did they own that that was the paper they delivered to the king?

Serj. Pemberton. Pray, my lord, give us leave to ask a question to clear this matter; was the question put to them, whether it was the paper that they delivered; or whether it were their hands that were to it?

Blathwayt. My lord, I do not exactly recollect the words.

L. C. J. But pray tell us, if you can, what the question was?

Blathwayt. My lord, I do not remember the very words; but I think if Mr. Serjeant Pemberton be pleased to repeat his question, I shall give him a satisfactory answer, as well as I can.

Serj. Pemberton. Sir, that which I ask you is this, whether the question that was put to my lords the bishops at that time was, Whether this was the paper that they delivered to the king, or whether those were their hands that were to it?

Blathwayt. My lord, I did always think that it was a plain case, that that was the paper that they delivered to the king; and my lords the bishops did never deny but that they gave it to the king, and I had it from the king's hands.

L. C. J. But we must know from you (if you can tell us) what the question was that was put to my lords the bishops; were they asked, Whether those were their hands that were to that paper? or was it, Whether they delivered that paper to the king?

Blathwayt. As to the first part, that they owned 'twas their hands, that I am sure of; but as to the other, I do not remember what the words were.

[At which there was a great shout.]

Att. Gen. Pray, Mr. Blathwayt, recollect yourself, you say the king produced it.

Blathwayt. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. Do you remember that the king asked them any question upon the producing of it?

Blathwayt. My lord chancellor asked them, if those were not their hands to the petition?

Sol. Gen. Was there any other matter in discourse, whether that was the paper that was delivered by them to the king?

Blathwayt. I cannot so positively say what were the words that my lord chancellor used.

Serj. Levinz. Pray do not twist a man so, Mr. Solicitor.

Sol. Gen. And you are not to untwist a man neither, Mr. Serjeant.

Att. Gen. Do you remember that the king said any thing of the paper being delivered to him?

Blathwayt. The king has said it several times; I believe I have heard him say it ten times at least.

Att. Gen. Did he say it at that time?

Blathwayt. I cannot positively say that he did, Sir.

Serj. Pemberton. He cannot answer it; why will you press it?

Blathwayt. My lord, here is the clerk of the council that was then in waiting, he took minutes, and perhaps can remember more than I.

Sol. Gen. Here they cry he cannot answer it, as if they could tell what he can answer better than himself. Pray, Mr. Bridgman, was there any question to this purpose, either from my lord chancellor, or from the king, whether that was the paper that was presented by my lords the bishops, or delivered to the king? For I see you are very nice as to words, and you do very well; but was there not a question to that purpose?

Bridgman. Sir, I do not remember; for I speak to the best of my remembrance in all this matter. I say, I do not remember that that question was asked in those very words, but I do remember something was said to that purpose, but by whom I cannot particularly say.

Sir R. Sawyer. To what purpose?

Sol. Gen. It is very strange that they won't let the witness speak, but are continually interrupting him.

Sir R. Sawyer. Mr. Solicitor, nobody interrupts him.

L. C. J. Why, do not I behave myself between you all as I ought to do? Pray, sir Robert Sawyer sit down, you cannot be contented when the man does you no harm.

Sol. Gen. Pray consider, did my lords the bishops say any thing, or was there any discourse concerning the paper, whether it was delivered to the king or no?

Bridgman. Mr. Solicitor, I have told you as near as I can what I do remember. I know not by whom it was said, but that question, or to that purpose, was asked, whether that was the petition they delivered? but I do not remember whether the question was directly asked, or answered; there was something about it, and several passages there were; but whether spoken by my lord chancellor, or who, I cannot remember.

Sol. Gen. You say there was that which sufficiently denoted a question to that purpose, and they said nothing against it.

Bridgman. No, there was no denial of it.

Sol. Gen. I see you do not remember the particular, nor do we desire it of you.

Bridgman. They did not deny it, nor confess it.

Sol. Gen. Then, in your apprehension, did they own that they delivered that paper to the king?

L. C. J. You must not ask that, Mr. Solicitor, it is not a fair question to ask him what he apprehended.

Sol. Gen. He said it before.

L. C. J. But his apprehensions are no evidence, and it is a sort of a leading question which we must not allow of.

Sol. Gen. Then if your lordship do not like it, I will not ask it; but I will ask him another question.

L. C. J. Ay, ten, if you will, so they be fair ones.

Sol. Gen. Was it upon the first or second time of their being examined?

Bridgman. I cannot tell, it was not the first time, all of it, I believe; for at the first time my lords the bishops made some scruple of answering or owning any thing; and whatsoever they owned, they said, they hoped it should not be made use of to their prejudice. I remember no reply that was made, nor any thing farther, only my lord chancellor said, they were not to capitulate with their prince; but they were required to answer the questions that were asked them.

Sol. Gen. What were those questions?

Bridgman. I have told you already, as well as I can remember.

Sol. Gen. But did you take it upon the main that they owned the delivery of that paper to the king?

Just. Powell. Mr. Solicitor, you have been told you are to ask no such questions.

Sir R. Sawyer. Nor never was there such wire-drawing of a witness in this world before.

L. C. J. Pray sit still, sir Robert Sawyer, you are not to teach us what we are to do; Mr. Solicitor must ask questions that are proper for him, and not such as these; but the court must correct him, and not you.

Sol. Gen. Mr. Bridgman is very cautious, and he is to be commended for it; but we would get the truth out of him if we could. Pray, Sir, if you can remember, recollect yourself, whether by any question to that purpose, it was believed that they did own the delivery of the paper to the king.

Bridgman. I told you, Mr. Solicitor, as to that at first, that I do not remember the very words of the question; but I believe there was nobody doubted that that was not the paper.

Sol. Gen. You speak well in your way; but these gentlemen are very unwilling you should tell your opinion.

L. C. J. His opinion is no evidence, therefore you must not ask any such questions, Mr. Solicitor.

Bridgman. As soon as the petition was delivered, within a few hours after I saw it, the king shewed it to several people, and he said, it was the petition the bishops had delivered; he took it into his own custody, and afterwards commanded me to write a copy of it, and there was no copy made of it but that one; but notwithstanding that, I do remember I did see a copy of the petition, within a day or two after it was presented about the town.

Sol. Gen. Pray how many days was this before the discourse in council upon their examination?

Bridgman. How many days was what, Sir?

Sol. Gen. When the king gave the paper to be copied?

Bridgman. It was upon the Sunday.

Sol. Gen. But you say, as you believe, it was in a few hours after the paper was delivered to the king that you did see it?

Just. Powell. But what makes him say, that this was delivered to the king, but only hearsay?

L. C. J. Pray, Mr. Solicitor, will you produce that which is evidence, and not spend our time in that which is not?

Sol. Gen. My lord, I would make no more of it than it is.

Serj. Levinz. It is a shameful thing to offer such things in a court of justice.

Serj. Pemberton. It is a practice that ought not to be endured.

L. C. J. Pray, brothers, be quiet, or I'll turn him loose upon you again, if you'll not be quiet: What is the matter? Cannot you let us alone? We shall do every body right. Come, to shorten this matter, I ask you but this one question, and that may satisfy any one that has common honesty about him: do you remember whether or no they were asked, if that was the petition that they delivered to the king?

Bridgman. My lord, I have answered that question as directly as I can; I do not positively remember that that was the question.

L. C. J. Mr. Solicitor-General, you must be satisfied when proper questions are fairly answered, and therefore, pray, be quiet.

Att. Gen. However, we pray we may ask the clerks of the council; it may be they may remember more—Sir John Nicholas, you were at the council-table that day my lords the bishops were examined about this paper?

Sir J. Nicholas. Yes, Sir, I was.

Att. Gen. Pray did you observe that the king produced the petition?

Sir J. Nicholas. No, indeed, I did not see it.

Att. Gen. Did you observe any thing that passed there in discourse?

Sol. Gen. Did you observe any questions that were asked the bishops, either by the king or by my lord chancellor?

Sir J. Nicholas. I think my lord chancellor did ask them, if that was their hands to the petition, and they owned it.

Sol. Gen. Do you remember whether they owned, that they delivered that paper to the king?

L. C. J. I'll ask you, sir John Nicholas, did my lord chancellor ask them this question, is this the petition you delivered to the king?

Sir J. Nicholas. I do not remember that. [Then there was a great shout.]

Sol. Gen. Here's wonderful great rejoicing that truth cannot prevail.

Serj. Pemberton. No, Mr. Solicitor, truth does prevail.

Sol. Gen. You are all very glad that truth is stifled, Mr. Serjeant.

Serj. Trinder. Pray, sir John Nicholas, let me ask you one question; was there any discourse about delivering that petition to the king?

Sir J. Nicholas. Indeed I do not remember it.

Sol. Gen. There's Mr. Pepys, we'll examine him. [Mr. Pepys sworn.]

L. C. J. Come, I'll ask the questions; were you at the council-board when my lords the bishops were committed?

Mr. Pepys. Yes, I was.

L. C. J. What were the questions that were asked, either by the king, or by my lord chancellor?

Mr. Pepys. My lord, I would remember as well as I could; the very words, and the very words of the question, were, I think, My lords, do you own this paper? I do not remember any thing was spoken about the delivering; but I believe it was understood by every body at the table, that that was the paper that they had delivered.

L. C. J. Well, have you done now? But to satisfy you, I'll ask this question; Was this question asked, My lords, was this the paper you delivered to the king?

Mr. Pepys. No, my lord.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, do you remember whether the king himself asked the question?

Mr. Pepys. You mean, I suppose, Mr. Attorney, that these were the words, or something that imported their delivering it to the king.—Att. Gen. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Pepys. Truly, I remember nothing of that.

Sol. Gen. Did you observe any discourse concerning their delivery of it to the king?

Mr. Pepys. Indeed, Mr. Solicitor, I do not.

Att. Gen. Swear Mr. Musgrave. [Mr. Musgrave sworn.]

L. C. J. You hear the question, Sir, what say you to it?

Mr. Musgrave. My lord, I will give as short an account of it as I can: The first time after his majesty had produced the petition, and it was read at the board, his grace the lord archbishop of Canterbury, and the other six reverend lords the bishops, were called in, and it was asked of them, if they owned that, or if it was their hands? My lord archbishop, in the name of the rest, did decline answering, upon the account that they were there as criminals and were not obliged to say any thing to their own prejudice, or that might hurt them hereafter; but if his majesty would command them, and if he would promise that no advantage should be made of whatsoever they confessed, then they would answer the question: his majesty made no answer to that, but only said he would do nothing but what was according to law; whereupon the bishops were ordered to withdraw, and being called in a second time, the petition was shewn to them, and they were asked if they did own it, or if it was their hands? And I think my lord archbishop did then say, we will rely upon your majesty, and some such general thing was said, and then they did all own that it was their hands: I cannot say the petition was read to them.

Just. Powell. Mr. Blathwayt, as I remember, said it was the third time.

Mr. Musgrave. It was the second time, to the best of my remembrance.

L. C. J. Pray, Sir, was there any question to this purpose; Is this the paper you delivered to the king?

Mr. Musgrave. I do not remember that ever any such direct question was asked.

Just. Allybone. But, as my brother Pemberton did very well before distinguish, there is a great deal of difference between the owning the subscription of a paper, and between the owning of that paper. Mr. Pepys did say that they did own the paper, and upon my word that will look very much like a publication.

Mr. Musgrave. I remember, my lord, there was at the same time a question asked, because several copies had gone about the town, whether they had published it? And my lord archbishop did say, he had been so cautious, that he had not admitted his own secretary, but writ it all himself; and the rest of the bishops did say, they did not publish it, nor ever gave any copies of it.

Att. Gen. My lord, I confess, now it is to be left to the jury upon this point, whether tho' there were not a positive witness that was by when the thing was done, yet upon this evidence the jury can find any otherwise than that the thing was done; truly, I think, we must leave it as a strong case for the king: I could have wished, indeed, for the satisfaction of every body, that the proof would have come up to that; but we must make it as strong for the king, upon the evidence given, as it will bear. Now, my lord, take all this whole matter together, here is a paper composed, framed, and written by seven learned men, and this must be written by such persons, sure for some purpose. It is directed as a petition to the king, and this petition did come to the hands of the king (for the king produces it in council) and my lord archbishop, and the rest of the bishops, owned their hands to it. Then the question is, my lord, whether or no there be any room for any body living to doubt in this case, that this was not delivered by my lords the bishops to the king, though it be not a conclusive evidence of a positive fact; yet unless they shew something on the other side, that may give way for a supposition to the contrary, that it came out of their hands by surprize, or that any body else delivered it to the king, without their knowledge or consent, here must needs be a very violent presumption that they did do it; and when nothing of that is said on their side, can any jury upon their consciences say, that it was not published by them? And it being found in Middlesex, though it might be written and composed in Surrey, yet surely we have given a convincing evidence, that either they published it, or caused it to be published in Middlesex. [Pray call Mr. Graham.]

Crier. He is gone out of the hall.

Sol. Gen. My lord, there is in law a presumption that is evidence, though there be no positive proof.

Sir R. Sawyer. But not in an information for a libel.

Sol. Gen. This is a mere question of fact; there is no such distinction in the law; for it is plain, if these lords, or any of them, did consent and agree to the publishing of this paper in Middlesex, they are guilty of this information; and whether they are guilty or not guilty, we do rely upon the circumstances proved, which are violent: First, that they were the men that contrived, and set their hands to it, and so were the authors of it, is undeniable; for they have owned it: men of their learning and parts never did any such thing in vain: and then that they were concerned in the publishing of it in Middlesex, we offer for proof that which was said by Mr. Bridgman and Mr. Blathwayt, who, though they do not come directly and expressly to the formal words of such a question, yet they tell you, especially Mr. Blathwayt, that they did apprehend it, and it was the collection of all their thoughts, and they took it for granted, as a thing that every body was satisfied in, that they did deliver that paper to the king. I must confess, and agree, there is no proof of the delivery of it by my lords the bishops to the king; but we know very well, that it is no wonder, when a paper is libellous, that men should use all the skill they can to publish it with impunity: and this is a thing that was done after some time of premeditation and serious consultation; for it was some days after the order for reading the declaration was published, that this was framed and delivered, and it concerned them to be wary (as it seems they have been); but take this altogether, my lord, the paper being found in the king's hands, it is in these persons power, and it lies upon them to make it out plain, what became of this paper, or how it came out of their hands, which once lay in their own hands and custody? They can give an account of it, they can give light unto it. If they do not, I shall submit to the jury, whether this is not sufficient evidence to convict them; especially when, being examined, they did not make that their excuse. They never said, this paper indeed we signed, but we did not intend to publish it, we intended to stifle it; that had been some excuse: but for them to say now, they did not present it to the king, I must submit to the jury, whether they will believe it or not upon this evidence, that my lords, the bishops, did present it, or cause it to be presented to the king; then they are guilty of so much of this matter charged in the information. And I leave it to them, and their consciences, what they will think upon the whole.

Recorder. My lord, if your lordship please—

L. C. J. What, again? Well, go on sir Bartholomew Shower, if we must have a speech—Recorder. Nay, my lord, I would not trespass upon your lordship.

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the Jury, here is an information against my lords the bishops: I think I need not trouble myself to open all of it, because I see you are men of understanding, men of great diligence, and have taken notes yourselves, some of you; therefore I shall say only something of the proof that is required in such a case, and of the manner of the proof that has been given in this case, and then tell you my opinion in point of law. Here is an information brought by Mr. Attorney General, on behalf of the king, against these reverend fathers of the church, the archbishop and the rest; and it is for publishing a seditious libel, under the pretence of a petition, in which are contained the words that are seen. Gentlemen, the information is long; it tells you, that the king, out of his gracious clemency to all his loving subjects, and for other considerations, had thought fit to publish a declaration of indulgence, that all his loving subjects might have liberty of conscience, upon the 4th of April, in the third year of his reign, and that this was set forth by the king; and that the king, of his farther grace, about the 27th of April then next following—

Mr. Finch. I humbly beg your lordship's favour.

L. C. J. What say you, Mr. Finch?

Mr. Finch. I ask your pardon for breaking in upon you when you are directing the jury. I know I should not do it, but I hope you will not be angry with me for it.

L. C. J. If I thought you did any service to your client, I should willingly hearken to you.

Mr. Finch. That which I humbly offer to your lordship, is only to remember your lordship where we were.

L. C. J. Go on, Sir.

Mr. Finch. I would only say this, my lord, the question is, whether this be evidence or no?

L. C. J. I am sorry, Mr. Finch, you have that opinion of me, as to think I should not leave it fairly to the jury.

Mr. Finch. I only speak it, my lord, because if it be evidence, we have other matters to offer in answer to that evidence, and in our own defence.

L. C. J. If you have more to offer, why did you conclude here, and let me begin to direct the jury? But since you say you have other matter to offer, we will hear it.

Serj. Pemberton. My lord, we submit to your lordship's direction.

L. C. J. No, no, you do not; you say you have further matter to offer.

Mr. Pollexfen. My lord, we shall rest it here.

L. C. J. No, no, I will hear Mr. Finch. Go on, my lords the bishops shall not say of me, I would not hear their counsel; I have been already told of being counsel against them, and they shall never say that I would not hear their counsel for them.

Serj. Levinz. My lord, we beseech your lordship, go on with your directions; for all that Mr. Finch said, was only that this was not sufficient evidence.

L. C. J. No, brother, he says you have a great deal more to offer, and I will not refuse to hear him. The court will think there was something more than ordinary, therefore I will hear him; such a learned man as he shall not be refused to be heard by me, I will assure you. Why don't you go on, Mr. Finch?

Mr. Finch. My lord, I beg your pardon for interrupting you; but all that I was going to say would have amounted to no more than this, that there being no evidence against us, we must of course be acquitted.

Just. Holl. My lord did intend to have said as much as that, I dare say.

L. C. J. Well, gentlemen of the jury, we have had interruption enough—

Sol. Gen. My lord, I must beg your pardon for interrupting you now; and I am very glad these gentlemen have given us this occasion, because we shall now be able to clear this point. There is a fatality in some causes, my lord, and so there is in this; we must beg your patience for a very little while, for we have notice that a person of a very great quality is coming,* that will make it appear, that my lords the bishops made their addresses to him, to be introduced that they might deliver the paper to the king.

L. C. J. Well—you see what comes of the interruption, gentlemen, now we must stay—

* "Such sort of witnesses were no doubt always at hand when wanted." Speech of Mr. Erskine in support of a motion for a new trial in the dean of St. Asaph's case, A. D. 1783, in this Collection.

[Then there was a pause for near half an hour.]

Att. Gen. Pray, my lord, put the case that a man writes a libel in one county, and it is found in another, is not he answerable, unless he can shew something that he may satisfy the jury how it came there?

Sol. Gen. Ought he not to give an account what became of it?

L. C. J. No: look you, Mr. Attorney, you must look to your information, and then you will find the case that you put does not come up to it: it is for writing, composing, and publishing, and causing to be published, and all this is laid in Middlesex: now you have proved none of all these things to be done in the county.

Att. Gen. They did in Middlesex confess it was theirs.

L. C. J. Ay, but the owning their hands is not a publication in Middlesex, and so I should have told the jury.

Mr. Finch. I beg your lordship's pardon for interrupting you.

Att. Gen. But, my lord, does it not put the proof upon them, to prove how it came out of their hands into the king's hands?

L. C. J. No, the proof lies on your part.

Mr. Pollexfen. Pray, my lord, give us your favour to dismiss us and the jury.

Sol. Gen. My lord, our witnesses will be here presently.

Att. Gen. Sure, my lord, the presumption is on our side.

Just. Powell. No, the presumption is against you; for my lord archbishop lived in Surrey, and it is proved was not out of Lambeth-house since Michaelmas, till he came before the council.

Serj. Pemberton. Pray, good my lord, we stand mightily uneasy here, and so do the jury, pray dismiss us.

L. C. J. I cannot help it, it is your own fault.—[Then there was another great pause.]

L. C. J. Sir Bartholomew Shower, now we have time to hear your speech, if you will.

Mr. Pollexfen. My lord, there is nobody come, nor I believe will come.

Sol. Gen. Yes, he will come presently; we have had a messenger from him. [Call Mr. Graham.]

Crier. He is gone, and said he would come presently.

Sol. Gen. My lord, he will bring our witnesses with him—[Then there was another pause.]

Serj. Pemberton. My lord, this is very unusual to stay thus for evidence.

L. C. J. It is so; but I am sure you ought not to have any favour—Mr. Solicitor, are you assured that you shall have this witness that you speak of?

Sol. Gen. Yes, my lord, he will be here presently.

L. C. J. We have staid a great while already, and therefore is fit that we should have some oath made that he is coming.

Sol. Gen. The crier tells you, that Mr. Graham did acquaint him, that he would return presently.

L. C. J. Give him the book.

Sol. Gen. Let your left-hand give your right-hand the oath. [The Crier sworn.]

L. C. J. By the oath that you have taken, did Mr. Graham tell you, there was any further witness coming in this case?

Crier. Yes, my lord, he did; he went out of the hall, and returned when your lordship was directing the jury, and he asked me what the court were upon; and I told him you were directing the jury, and then he said, my lord Sunderland was a coming, but he would go and prevent him; and afterwards he returned, and finding your lordship did not go on to direct the jury, he said, he would go again for my lord Sunderland, whom he had sent away, and he is now gone for him, and he said he would bring him with him presently.

L. C. J. Well then, we must stay till the evidence for the king comes, for now there is oath made that he is coming—[And after a considerable pause the Lord President came.]

Att. Gen. My lord, we must pray that my lord president may be sworn in this case, on behalf of the king. [The Lord President sworn.]

Att. Gen. My lord, with your lordship's favour, I would ask my lord president a question: your lordship remembers where we left this cause; we have brought it to this point, That this petition came to the king's hands: that it is a petition written by my lord archbishop and subscribed by the rest of my lords the bishops; but there is a difficulty made, whether this petition thus prepared and written was by them delivered to the king, and whether my lords the bishops were concerned in the doing of it, and were privy, or parties to the delivery? Now that which I would ask your lordship, my lord president, is, Whether they did make their application to your lordship to speak to the king?

Sol. Gen. Did they make their application to your lordship upon any account whatsoever?

Lord President. My lord, my lord bishop of St. Asaph, and my lord bishop of Chichester came to my office, and told me they came in the names of my lord archbishop of Canterbury, and four others of their brethren, and themselves, with a petition, which they desired to deliver to his majesty, and they did come to me to know which was the best way of doing it, and whether the king would give them leave to do it or not? They would have had me read their petition, but I refused it, and said, I thought it did not at all belong to me, but I would let the king know their desire, and bring them an answer immediately, what his pleasure was in it; which I did. I acquainted the king, and he commanded me to let my lords the bishops know, they might come when they pleased, and I went back and told them so; upon which they went and fetched the rest of the bishops, and when they came, immediately they went into the bed-chamber, and into another room, where the king was. This is that I know of the matter.

Sol. Gen. About what time was this, pray my lord?

Lord President. I believe there could not be much time between my coming from the king, and their fetching their brethren, and going in to the king.

Sol. Gen. They were with the king that day?—Lord President. Yes, they were.

Sol. Gen. Was this before they appeared in council?

Lord President. Yes, it was several days before.

Sol. Gen. Then I think now, my lord, the matter is very plain.

Just. Allynbone. Did they acquaint your lordship that their business was to deliver a petition to the king?

Lord President. Yes, they did.

Sol. Gen. And they would have had my lord read it, he says.

Att. Gen. And this was the same day that they did go in to the king?

Lord President. The very same day, and I think the same hour; for it could not be much longer.

L. C. J. Now it is upon you truly; it will be presumed to be the same, unless that you prove that you delivered another.—Pray, my lord, did you look into the petition?

Lord President. No, I refused it; I thought it did not concern me.

Just. Powell. Did you see them deliver it to the king, my lord?

Lord President. I was not in the room when it was delivered.

Just. Powell. They did open their petition to your lordship, did they?

Lord President. They offered me to read it, but I did refuse.

L. C. J. Will you ask my lord president any question, you that are for the defendants?

Sir R. Sawyer. No, my lord.

Sol. Gen. Then, my lord, we must beg one thing for the sake of the jury, if your lordship can turn yourself a little this way, and deliver the evidence you have given over again, that they may hear it.

Lord President. My lord, I will repeat as near as I can; I think I shall not vary the sense. The bishops of St. Asaph and Chichester came to my office, I do not know just the day when, but it was to let me know, that they came in the names of the archbishop, and four others of their brethren—Is it necessary I should name them?

L. C. J. Do it, my lord, if you can.

Lord President. They were the bishops of Ely, Bath and Wells, Bristol, and Peterborough; they came to let me know, in the name of the archbishop, those four, and themselves, that they had a petition to deliver to the king, if he would give them leave, and desired to know of me which was the best way to do it.

I told them I would know the king's pleasure, and bring them word again: they offered me their petition to read, but I did not think it fit for me to do it, and therefore I refused, and would not read it: but I went immediately to the king, and acquainted his majesty with it, and he commanded me to let them know they might come when they would, which I immediately did: they said they would go and speak with some of their brethren that were not far off: in the mean time I gave order that they should be admitted when they came, and they did in a little time return, and went first into the bed-chamber, and then into the room where the king was.

Sol. Gen. And this was before they came and appeared at the council?

Lord President. Yes, it was.

Mr. Pollexfen. Your lordship did not read any thing of the petition?

Lord Presid. No, Sir, I did not, I refused it.

Mr. Pollexfen. Nor does your lordship know what petition was delivered to the king?

Lord President. I did not know any thing of it from them then.

L. C. J. Now you may make your observations upon this two hours hence: now we shall hear what Mr. Finch had further to offer, I suppose.

[Then my Lord President went away.]

Sol. Gen. I think now it is very plain.

L. C. J. Truly, I must needs tell you, there was a great presumption before, but there is a greater now, and I think I shall leave it with some effect to the jury. I cannot see but here is enough to put the proof upon you. They came to the lord president, and asked him how they might deliver a petition to the king: he told them he would go see what the king said to it. They would have had him read their petition, but he refused it: he comes and tells them the king said they might come when they would: then those two that came to my lord president went and gathered up the other four (the archbishop indeed was not there) but they six came, and my lord president gave direction they should be let in, and they did go into the room where the king was. Now this, with the king's producing the paper, and their owning it at the council, is such a proof to me, as I think will be evidence to the jury of the publication.

Mr. Pollexfen. Then, my lord, thus far they only can go; the archbishop was not there, and so there is no evidence against him.

Sol. Gen. As to the writing, we have given proof against him, for it is all his hand.

Mr. Pollexfen. That still is in another country, and there is nothing proved to be done by my lord archbishop in Middlesex; and next, for the other six lords, my lord president does not say that this is the petition that they said they had to deliver to the king; nor did he see them deliver any thing to the king; but that is still left doubtful, and under your judgment, so that it stands upon presumption, not upon proof, that this is the same, and left under consideration.

Att. Gen. Then we will leave it fairly to the jury upon this fact.

Mr. Pollexfen. If so, then we desire to be heard in our defence.

Sir R. Sawyer. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, you have heard this charge which Mr. Attorney has been pleased to make against my lords the bishops, and that is this, that they did conspire to diminish the royal authority, and regal prerogative, power, and government of the king, and to avoid the order of council; and in prosecution of this, they did falsely, maliciously and seditiously make a libel against the king, under pretence of a petition, and did publish the same in the king's presence.

This, gentlemen, is a very heinous and heavy charge; but you see how short their evidence is: the evidence they bring forth is only, that my lords the bishops presented the paper to the king in the most private and humble manner they could: that which they have been so many hours a proving, and which they cry up to be as strong an evidence as ever was given, proves it to be the farthest from sedition in the doing of it that can be: and you see what it is, it was a petition to be relieved against an order of council, which they conceive they were aggrieved by. They indeed do not deal fairly with the court nor with us, in that they do not set it forth that it was a petition.

L. C. J. That was over-ruled before.

Sir R. Sawyer. I do not insist upon it now so much an exception to the information, as I do the evidence. They set this forth to be a scandalous matter, but it only contains their reasons, whereby they would satisfy his majesty why they cannot comply in a concurrence with his majesty's pleasure; and therefore they humbly beseech the king, and beg and request him (as the words of it are) that his majesty would be pleased not to insist upon their distributing and reading of this declaration: so the petitioners, on behalf of themselves and the whole clergy of England, beg of the king that he would please not to insist upon it.

Gentlemen, you may observe it, that there is nothing in this petition that contains any thing of sedition in it; and it would be strange this petition should be felo de se, and by one part of it destroy the other. It is laid indeed in the information, that it was with intent and purpose to diminish the king's royal authority; but I appeal to your lordship, the court, and the jury, whether there be any one word in it, that any way touches the king's prerogative, or any tittle of evidence that has been given to make good the charge. It is an excuse barely for their non-compliance with the king's order, and a begging of the king with all humility and submission, that he would be pleased not to insist upon the reading of his majesty's declaration upon these grounds, because the dispensing power upon which it was founded, had been several times in parliament declared to be against law, and because it was a case of that consequence that they could not in prudence, honour, or conscience concur in it.

My lord, Mr. Attorney has been pleased to charge in this information, that this is a false, malicious, and seditious libel: both the falsity of it, and that it was malicious and seditious, are all matters of fact, which, with submission, they have offered to the jury no proof of, and I make no question but easily to demonstrate the quite contrary.

For, my lord, I think it can be no question, but that any subject that is commanded by the king to do a thing which he conceives to be against law, and against his conscience, may humbly apply himself to the king, and tell him the reason why he does not that thing he is commanded to do, why he cannot concur with his majesty in such a command.

My lord, that which Mr. Attorney did insist upon in the beginning of this day (and he pretended to cite some cases for it) was, that in this case, my lords the bishops were not sued as bishops, nor prosecuted for their religion. Truly, my lord, I do not know what they are sued for else: the information is against them as bishops, it is for an act they did as bishops, and no otherwise; and for an act they did, and do conceive they lawfully might do with relation to their ecclesiastical polity, and the government of their people as bishops.

The next thing that Mr. Attorney offered was, That it was not for a non-feasance, but for a feasance. It is true, my lord, it is for a feasance in making of the petition, but it was to excuse a non-feasance, the not reading according to the order; and this sure was lawful for all the bishops as subjects to do; and I shall shew it was certainly the duty of my lords the bishops, or any peer of this realm, to do the same in a like case. It was likewise said, they were prosecuted here for affronting the government, and intermeddling with matters of state; but I beg your lordship and the jury to consider, whether there is one tittle of this mentioned in the petition, or any evidence given of it. The petition does not meddle with any thing of any matter of state, but refers to an ecclesiastical matter, to be executed by the clergy, and to a matter that has relation to ecclesiastical causes; so that they were not busybodies, or such as meddled in matters that did not relate to them, but that which was properly within their sphere and jurisdiction.

But after all, there is no evidence, nor any sort of evidence that is given by Mr. Attorney, that will maintain the least tittle of this charge; and how he comes to leave it upon this sort of evidence I cannot tell; all that it amounts to is, That my lords the bishops being grieved in this manner, made this petition to the king in the most private and respectful manner; and for him to load it with such horrid black epithets, that it was done libellously, maliciously, and scandalously, and to oppose the king and government, 'tis very hard; 'tis a case of a very extraordinary nature, and I believe my lords the bishops cannot but conceive a great deal of trouble, that they should lie under so heavy a charge, and that Mr. Attorney should draw so severe an information against them, when he has so little proof to make it out.

My lord, by what we have to say to it, we hope we shall give your lordship and the jury satisfaction, that we have done but our duties, supposing here has been a sufficient evidence of the fact given, which we leave to your lordship and the jury.

My lord, we say in short, That this petition is no more than what any man, if he be commanded to do any thing, might humbly do it, and not be guilty of any crime: and, my lord, as to the matter of our defence, it will consist of these heads:

First, We shall consider the matter of this Petition.

Secondly, The manner of delivering it, according as they have given evidence here; and,

Thirdly, The persons that have delivered this petition. And we hope to make it appear, beyond all question, that the matter contained in this petition, is neither false nor contrary to law, but agreeable to all the laws of the land in all times. We shall likewise shew you (though that appear sufficiently to you already) that the manner of delivering it was so far from being seditious, that it was in the most secret and private manner, and with the greatest humility and duty imaginable. And then as to the persons, we will shew you that they are not such as Mr. Attorney says, who meddle with matters of state, that are out of their sphere; but they are persons concerned, and concerned in interest in the case, to make this humble application to the king. And when we have proved all this matter, you will see how strangely we are blackened with titles and epithets which we no ways deserve, and of which, God be thanked, there is no proof.

For, my lord, for the matter of the petition, we shall consider two things.

The first is, the prayer, which is this; They humbly beg and desire of the king, on behalf of themselves and the rest of the clergy, that he would not insist upon the reading and publishing of this declaration.

Surely, my lord, there is nothing of falsity in this, nor any thing that is contrary to law, or unlawful for any man that is pressed to any thing, especially by an order of council; and this is nothing but a petition against an order of council; and if there be an order that commands my lords the bishops to do a thing that seems grievous to them, surely they may beg of the king that he would not insist upon it.

As for this matter, they were so well satisfied about it, and so far from thinking that it was any part of a libel, that they left it out of the information, and so have made a deformed and absurd story of it, without head or tail, a petition directed to nobody, and for nothing, it being without both title and prayer; so that this is plain, it was lawful to petition,

Then, my lord, the next thing is, the reasons which my lords the bishops come to acquaint the king with; why in honour and conscience they cannot comply with, and give obedience to this order; and the reasons, my lord, are two.

The first reason that is assigned, is, the several declarations that have been in parliament (several of which are mentioned) that such a power to dispense with the law, is against law, and that it could not be done but by an act of parliament; for that is the meaning of the word illegal, that has no other signification but unlawful; the same word in point of signification with the word illicite, which they have used in their information, a thing that cannot be done by law; and this they are pleased to tell the king, not as declaring their own judgments, but what has been declared in parliament; though if they had done the former, they being peers of the realm, and bishops of the church, are bound to understand the laws, especially when (as I shall come to shew you) they are made guardians of these laws; and if any thing go amiss, and contrary to these laws, they ought to inform the king of it.

My lord, the next thing is, Because it is a thing of so great moment, and the consequence that will arise from their publishing of this declaration, and that too, my lord (for the latter I shall begin first with) there can be no question about, or any pretence that this is libellous or false; for certainly it is a case of the greatest consequence to the whole nation that ever was, therefore it cannot be false or libellous to say so.

My lord, I would not mention this, for I am loth to touch upon things of this nature, had not the information itself made it the very gist of the charge; for the information (if there be any thing in it) says, that it was to diminish the king's prerogative and regal power in publishing that declaration.

Now, my lord, what the consequence of this would be, and what my lords the bishops meant, by saying it was a cause of great moment, will appear, by considering that which is the main clause in the Declaration, at which my lords the bishops scrupled, which is the main stumbling-block to my lords, and has been to many honest men besides, and that is this:

'We do likewise declare, it is our royal will and pleasure, that from henceforth the execution of all and all manner of penal laws, in matters ecclesiastical, for not coming to church, or not receiving the sacrament or for any other non-conformity to the religion established; or for or by reason of the exercise of religion in any manner whatsoever, be immediately suspended; and the further execution of the said penal laws, and every of them, is hereby suspended.'*

* Here the Lord Chief Justice speaking aside, said,

L. C. J. I must not suffer this; they in-

Now, my lord, this clause either is of some legal effect and signification, or it is not. If Mr. Attorney, or the king's counsel, do say it is of no effect in law, then there is no harm done; then this petition does no ways impeach the king's prerogative, in saying, it has been declared in parliament, according as the king's counsel do agree the law to be.

But, my lord, if it have any effect in law, and these laws are suspended by virtue of this clause in the declaration; then certainly, my lord, it is of the most dismal consequence that can be thought of, and it behoved my lords, who are the fathers of the church, humbly to represent it to the king.

For, my lord, by this declaration, and particularly by that clause in it, not only the laws of our Reformation, but all the laws for the preservation of the Christian religion in general are suspended, and become of no force; if there be such an effect in law wrought by this declaration as is pretended; that is, that the obligation of obedience to them ceaseth; the reason of it is plain, the words cannot admit of such a quibble as to pretend, that the suspending the execution of the law, is not a suspending of the law; for we all know the end of every law, in its primary intent, is obedience to it; that of the penalty comes in by the way of punishment and recompence for their disobedience.

Now, my lord, if this declaration does discharge the king's subjects from their obedience to, and the obligation from those laws; then pray, my lord, where are we? Then all the laws of the Reformation are suspended, and the laws of Christianity itself, by those latter words, [or for or by reason of religion in any manner whatsoever] so that it is not confined to the Christian religion, but all other religions are permitted under this clause; and thus all our laws for keeping the Sabbath, and which distinguish us from heathens, will be suspended too.

My lord, this is such an inconvenience as, I think, I need name no more; and it is a very natural consequence from that clause of the declaration; it discharges at once all ministers tend to dispute the king's power of suspending laws.

Just. Powell. My lord, they must necessarily fall upon the point; for if the king hath no such power (as clearly he hath not in my judgment), the natural consequence will be, that this petition is no diminution of the king's regal power, and so not seditious or libellous.

L. C. J. Brother, I know you are full of that doctrine; but however, my lords the bishops shall have no occasion to say, that I deny to hear their counsel. Brother, you shall have your will for once, I will hear them, let them talk till they are weary.

Just. Powell. I desire no greater liberty to be granted them, than what in justice the court ought to grant, that is, to hear them in defence of their clients.

and clergymen from performing their duty in reading the service of the church; it discharges their hearers from attending upon that service.

When a law is suspended, the obligation thereof is taken away; and those that before thought themselves bound to obey, now conclude they are not so obliged; and what a mischief that will be to the church, which is under the care of my lords the bishops, your lordship will easily apprehend.

These things, my lord, I only mention, to shew the great and evil consequences that apparently follow upon such a declaration, which made my lords the bishops decline obeying the order, and put them under a necessity of applying thus to the king, to acquaint him with the reasons why they could not comply with his commands to read this declaration to the people, because the consequences thereof were so great, it tending naturally to lead the people into so great an error, as to believe those laws were not in force, when in truth and reality they are still in force, and continue to oblige them.

And that being the second reason in this petition, I come next to consider it, to wit, that the parliament had often declared this pretended power to be illegal; and for that we shall read the several records in parliament mentioned in their petition, and produce several ancient records of former parliaments that prove this point; and particularly in the time of Richard the second, concerning the statute of provisors, where there were particular dispensations for that statute, the king was enabled to do it by act of parliament, and could not do it without.

L. C. J. Pray, sir Robert Sawyer, go to your proofs, and reserve your arguments till afterwards.

Sir R. Sawyer. My lord, I do but shortly mention these things; so that, my lord, as to the matter of this petition, we shall shew you, that it is true and agreeable to the laws of the land.

Then, my lord, as to the manner of delivering it, I need say no more, but that it is plain from their evidence, that it was in the most private and humble manner. And, as the lord president said, leave was asked of the king for them to be admitted to present it: leave was given, and accordingly they did it.

We come then, my lord, to the third thing, the persons, these noble lords; and we shall shew they are not busy-bodies, but in this matter have done their duty, and meddled with their own affairs. That, my lord, will appear,

First, by the general care that is reposed in them by the law of the land: they are frequently in our books called the king's spiritual judges; they are entrusted with the care of souls, and the superintendency over all the clergy is their principal care.

But, besides this, my lord, there is another special care put upon them by the express words of an act of parliament; for over and above the general care of the church, by virtue of their offices as bishops, the act of 1 Eliz. cap. 2. makes them special guardians of the law of uniformity, and of that other law in his late majesty's reign; where all the clauses of that statute of 1 Eliz. are revived and made applicable to the present state of the church of England. Now in that statute of 1 Eliz. there is this clause:

'And for the due execution hereof, the queen's most excellent majesty, the lords spiritual and temporal, and all the commons in this present parliament assembled, do, in God's name, earnestly require all the archbishops, and bishops, and other ordinaries, that they do endeavour themselves, to the utmost of their knowledges, that the due and true execution hereof may be had throughout their dioceses and charges, as they will answer before God, for such evils and plagues where-with Almighty God may justly punish his people, for neglecting this good and wholesome law.'

This is the charge that lies upon the bishops, to take care of the execution of that law; and I shall pray by and bye, that it may be read to the jury.

Sol. Gen. This is very well, indeed! To what purpose?

Sir R. Sawyer. So that, my lord, by this law it is plain, that my lords the bishops, upon pain of bringing upon themselves the imprecation of this act of parliament, are obliged to see it executed; and then, my lord, when any thing comes under their knowledge, especially if they are to be actors in it, that hath such a tendency to destroy the very foundation of the church, as the suspension of all the laws that related to the church must do, it concerns them that have no other remedy, to address the king, by petition, about it.

For that Mr. Attorney, my lord, has agreed, that if a proper remedy be pursued in a proper court, for a grievance complained of, though there may be many hard words that else would be scandalous, yet being in a regular course, they are no scandal: and it is said Lake's case, in my lord Hobart.

My lord, we must appeal to the king, or we can appeal to nobody, to be relieved against an order of council with which we are aggrieved; and it is our duty so to do, according to the care that the law hath placed in us.

Besides, my lord, the bishops were commanded by this order to do an act relating to their ecclesiastical function, to distribute it to be read by their clergy: and how could they in conscience do it, when they thought part of the declaration was not according to law?

Pray, my lord, what has been the reason of his majesty's consulting of his judges? And if his majesty, or any the great officers, by his command, are about to do any thing that is contrary to law, was it ever yet an offence to tell the king so? I always looked upon it as the duty of an officer or magistrate to tell the king what is law, and what is not law.

Cavendish's case, in the queen's time, there was an office granted of the return of the writs of supersedeas in the court of Common-Pleas; and he comes to the court, and desires to be put into the possession of the office: the court told him, they could do nothing in it, but he must bring his assize. He applies to the queen, and she sends under the privy-seal, a command to sequester the profits, and to take security to answer the profits, as the judgment of the law should go: but the judges there return an answer, that it was against law, and they could not do it. Then there comes a second letter, reciting the former, and commanding their obedience: the judges returned for answer, they were upon their oaths, and were sworn to keep the laws, and would not do it.

My lord, the like was done in the time of my lord Hobart: we have it reported in Anderson, in a case where a prohibition had gone: there came a message from court, that a consultation should be granted; and that was a matter wherein there were various opinions, whether it was ex necessitate, or discretionary; but there they returned, that it was against law for any such message to be sent.

Now here, my lord, is a case full as strong: my lords the bishops were commanded to do an act, which they conceived to be against law, and they declined it, and tell the king the reason; and they have done it in the most humble manner that could be, by way of petition. If they had done (as the civil law terms it) Rescribere generally, that had been lawful; but here they have done it in a more respectful manner by an humble petition. If they had said the law was otherwise, that sure had been no fault; but they do not so much as that, but they only say, it was so declared in parliament: and they declare it with all humility and dutifulness. So that, my lord, if we consider the persons of the defendants, they have not acted as busy-bodies; and therefore, as this case is, when we have given our evidence, here will be an answer to all the implications of law that are contained in this information: for they would have this petition work by implication of law, to make a libel of it; but by what I have said, it will appear, there was nothing of sedition, nothing of malice, nothing of scandal in it, nothing of the salt, and vinegar, and pepper that they have put into the case. We shall prove the matters that I have opened for our defence, and then, I dare say, your lordship and the jury will be of opinion, we have done nothing but our duty.

Mr. Finch. May it please your lordship, and you, gentlemen of the jury, this information sets forth (as you may observe upon opening it) that the king having, by his royal prerogative, set forth his declarations that we have read, and made an order of council for the reading the said declarations in the churches, and that the archbishops and bishops should severally send them into their dioceses, to be read; my lords the bishops, that are the defendants, did consult and conspire together to diminish the kingly authority, and royal prerogative of the king, and his power and government in his royal prerogative, in setting forth his declaration; and that, in prosecution of that conspiracy, they did contrive (as it was laid in the information) a malicious, seditious, false, and feigned libel, under pretence of a petition, and so set forth the petition; and that they published the petition in the presence of the king.

To this charge in the information, not guilty being pleaded, the evidence that hath been given for the king, I know, hath been observed by the court and jury, and I know will be taken into consideration, how far it does come up to the proof of the delivery of this petition by my lords the bishops; for all that was said till my lord president was pleased to come, was no evidence of any delivery at all; and my lord president's evidence is, that they were going to deliver a petition; but whether they did deliver it, or did it not, or what they did deliver, he does not know. This is all the evidence that has been given for the king.

But supposing now, my lord, that there were room to presume that they had delivered this Petition set forth in the information, let us consider what the question is between the king and my lords the bishops: the question is, whether they are guilty of contriving to diminish the king's regal authority and royal prerogative, in his power and government, in setting forth this declaration? Whether they are guilty of the making and presenting a malicious, seditious, and scandalous libel; and whether they have published it, as it is said in the information, in the king's presence?

So that the question is not now reduced to this, Whether this paper, that is set forth in the information, was delivered to the king by my lords the bishops; but whether they have made a malicious and scandalous libel, with an intent to diminish the king's royal prerogative, and kingly authority? and then, if you, gentlemen, should think that there is evidence given sufficient to prove that my lords the bishops have delivered to the king that paper which is set forth in the information; yet, unless they have delivered a false, malicious, seditious, and scandalous libel; unless they have published it, to stir up sedition in the kingdom; and unless they have contrived this by conspiracy, to diminish the king's royal prerogative and authority, and that power that is said to be in the king, my lords the bishops are not guilty of this accusation.

There are in this declaration several causes, which, upon reading of the information, I am sure, cannot but have been observed by you, gentlemen of the jury; and one special cause hath been by the counsel already opened to you, and I shall not enlarge upon it.

My lord, this petition that is thus delivered to the king, if it be a libel, a scandalous and seditious libel (as the information calls it) it must be so, either for the matter of the petition, or for the persons that delivered the petition, or for the manner of their presenting and delivering it: but neither for the matter, nor for the persons, nor for the manner of presenting it, is there any endeavour to diminish the king's royal prerogative, nor to stir up sedition, nor reflection upon the king's royal and kingly authority.

The petition does humbly set forth to his majesty, that there having been such a declaration, and such an order of council; they did humbly represent to his majesty, that they were not averse to any thing commanded them in that order, in respect to the just and due obedience that they owed to the king, nor in respect of their want of a due tenderness to those persons to whom the king had been pleased to shew his tenderness; but the declaration being founded upon a power of dispensing, which had been declared illegal in parliament several times, and particularly in the years 1662, 72, and 85, they did humbly beseech his majesty (they not being able to comply with his command in that matter) that he would not insist upon it.

Now, my lord, Where is the contrivance to diminish the king's regal authority, and royal prerogative?

This is a declaration founded upon a power of dispensing, which undertakes to suspend all laws ecclesiastical whatsoever; for not coming to church, or not receiving the sacrament, or any other non-conformity to the religion established, or for, or by reason of the exercise of religion in any manner whatsoever; ordering that the execution of all those laws be immediately suspended, and they are thereby declared to be suspended; as if the king had a power to suspend all the laws relating to his established religion, and all the laws that were made for the security of our reformation. These are all suspended by his majesty's declaration (as it is said) in the information, by virtue of his royal prerogative, and power so to do.

Now, my lord, I have always taken it, with submission, that a power to abrogate laws, is as much a part of the legislature, as a power to make laws: a power to lay laws asleep, and to suspend laws, is equal to a power of abrogating them; for they are no longer in being, as laws, while they are so laid asleep, or suspended: and to abrogate all at once, or to do it time after time, is the same thing; and both are equally parts of the legislature.

My lord, in all the education that I have had, in all the small knowledge of the laws that I could attain to, I could never yet hear of, or learn, that the constitution of the government in England was otherwise than thus, that the whole legislative power is in the king, Lords, and Commons; the king and his two houses of parliament. But then, if this declaration be founded upon a part of the legislature, which must be by all men acknowledged not to reside in the king alone, but in the king, Lords, and Commons, it cannot be a legal and true power, or prerogative.

This, my lord, has been attempted but in the last king's time; it never was pretended till then; and in that first attempt, it was so far from being acknowledged, that it was taken notice of in parliament, and declared against: so it was in the years 1662, 1672.

In the year 1662, where there was but the least umbrage of such a dispensing power; although the king had declared, in his Speech to the parliament, that he wished he had such a power, which his Declaration before seemed to assume; the parliament was so jealous of this, that they immediately made their application to his majesty, by an address against the Declaration; and they give reasons against it, in their address: one in particular was, 'That the king could not dispense with those laws without an act of parliament.'

There was another attempt in 1672, and then, after his majesty had, in his speech mentioned his declaration to them, the parliament there again, particularly the House of Commons, did humbly address to his majesty; setting forth, that this could not be done by law, without an act of parliament: and your lordship, by and bye, upon reading the record, will be satisfied what was the event of all this. His majesty himself was so far pleased to concur with them in that opinion, that he cancelled his Declaration, tore off the seal, and caused it to be made known to the House of Lords, by the lord chancellor, who, by his majesty's command, satisfied the House of it, that his majesty had broken the seal, and cancelled the Declaration; with this further declaration, which is entered in the records of the House, 'That it should never be drawn into example, or consequence.'

My lord, the matter standing thus, in respect to the king's prerogative, and the declarations that had been made in parliament; consider next, I beseech you, how far my lords the bishops were concerned in this question, humbly to make their application to the king.

My lords the bishops lying under a command to publish this declaration, it was their duty, as peers of the realm, and bishops of the Church of England, humbly to apply themselves to his majesty, to make known their reason why they could not obey that command; and they do it with all submission, and all humility, representing to his majesty what had been declared in parliament; and it having been so declared, they could not comply with his order, as apprehending that this declaration was founded upon that which the parliament declared to be illegal; and so his majesty's command to publish this declaration would not warrant them so to do. This they did as peers; and this they had a right to do as bishops, humbly to advise the king.

For, suppose, my lord (which is not to be supposed in every case, nor do I suppose it in this.) But suppose that there might be a king of England that should be misled. I do not suppose that to be the case now, I say, but I know it hath been the case formerly), that the king should be environed with counsellors that had given him evil advice; it hath been objected as a crime against such evil counsellors, that they would not permit and suffer the great men of the kingdom to offer the king their advice. How often do we say in Westminster-hall, that the king is deceived in his grant: there is scarce a day in the term, but it is said in one court or other; but it was never yet thought an offence to say so: and what more is there in this case?

My lord, if the king was misinformed, or under a misapprehension of the law, my lords, as they are peers, and as they are bishops, are concerned in it; and if they humbly apply themselves to the king, and offer him their advice, where is the crime?

My lord, these noble lords, the defendants, had more than an ordinary call to this; for besides the duty of their office, and the care of the church, that was incumbent on them as bishops, they were here to become actors; for they were, by that order of council, commanded themselves to publish it, and to distribute it to the several ministers in their several dioceses, with their commands to read it: therefore they had more than ordinary reason to concern themselves in the matter.

Next, we are to consider, my lord, in what manner this was done: they make their application to the king by an humble petition, with all the decency and respect that could be shewn; asking leave, first, to approach his person; and having leave, they offered my lord president the matter of their petition, that nothing might seem hard or disrespectful, or as if they intended any thing that was unfit to be avowed. When they had taken all this care in their approach, and begging leave for it, they come secretly to the king in private, when he was all alone, and they humbly presented this petition to his majesty. Now, how this can be called the publication of a malicious and seditious libel, when it was but the presenting of a petition to the king alone; and how it can be said to be with an intent to stir up sedition in the people against his majesty, and to alienate the hearts of his people from him, when it was in this private manner delivered to him himself only, truly I cannot apprehend.

My lord, I hope nothing of this can be thought an offence: if the jury should think that there has been evidence sufficient given to prove that my lords the bishops did deliver this paper to the king; yet that is not enough to make them guilty of this information, unless this paper be likewise found to be in diminution of the king's royal prerogative and regal authority in dispensing with, and suspending of, all laws, without act of parliament: unless it be found to be a libel against the king to tell him, that in parliament it was so and so declared. And unless the presenting this by way of petition (which is the right of all people that apprehend themselves aggrieved, to approach his majesty by petition) be a libelling of the king; and unless this humble petition, in this manner presented to the king in private, may be said to be a malicious and seditious libel, with an intent to stir up the people to sedition; unless all this can be found, there is no man living can ever find my lords the bishops guilty upon this information. Therefore, my lord, we will go on, and make out this matter that we have opened to your lordship, if Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor think fit to argue the points that we have opened.

Mr. Pollexfen. Pray, my lord, spare me a word on the same side. For the first point, it is a point of law, whether the matter contained in this petition be a libel. The king's counsel pretend it is so, because it says, the declaration is founded upon a power the parliament has declared to be illegal. But we say, that whatsoever the king is pleased to say in any declaration of his, it is not the king's saying of it that makes it to be law. Now, we say, this declaration under the great seal, is not agreeable to the laws of the land; and that for this reason, because it does, at one blow, set aside all the law we have in England.

My lord, if this be denied, we must a little debate this matter; for they are almost all penal laws; not only those before the reformation, but since; upon which the whole government, both in church and state, does in a great measure depend.

Especially, my lord, in matters of religion, they are all penal laws: for, by the Act of Uniformity, which my lords the bishops are sworn to observe, and adjured by an express clause in the act, no man is to preach unless he be episcopally ordained; no man is to preach without a licence. If all this be set aside, I confess then, it will go very far into the whole ecclesiastical government. If this be denied, we are ready to argue that too.

L. C. J. They are to do so still.

Mr. Pollexfen. My lord, I am sure the consequence is otherwise, if this declaration signify any thing. And if it be the will of the king, my lord, the will of the king is what the law is. If so be the king's will be not consonant to the law, it is not obliging.

My lord, the cases that we have had of dispensations, are all so many strong authorities against a general or particular abrogation. My lord, that is a matter of law, which if it fall out to be any way doubtful, it will be fit to have it debated and settled.

If they will say, that the penal laws in matters ecclesiastical can be abrogated or nulled, or made void pro tempore, or for life, without the meeting of the king and people in parliament, I must confess, they say a great thing, as it is a point of great concern; but I think that will not be said: and all that has been ever said in any case, touching dispensations, proves quite the contrary, and asserts what I affirm. For why should any man go about to argue, that the king may dispense with this or that particular law, if at once he can dispense with all the law, by an undoubted prerogative? This is a point of law which we insist upon, and are ready to argue with them; but we will go on with the rest of those things that we have offered: and first, we will read the Act of Uniformity, made 1 Eliz. that clause of it where they are so strictly charged to see the execution of that law.

This act, my lord, by the Act of Uniformity, made in the beginning of the late king's reign, is revived, with all the clauses in it relating to this matter. If then this be a duty incumbent upon them, and their oaths require it of them; and if they find that the pleasure of the king, in his declaration, is that which is not consonant to this law, what can they do?

Can any thing be more humble, or done with a more Christian mind, than by way of petition, to inform the king in the matter? For I never thought it, nor hath it ever, sure, been thought by any body else, to be a crime to petition the king: for the king may be mistaken in the law, so our books say; and we, every day, in Westminster-hall, argue against the king's grants, and say, he is deceived in his grants. It is the great benefit and liberty which the king gives to his subjects, to argue the legality or illegality of his grants.

My lord, when all this is done, to make this to be a libel, by putting in the words malicious, seditious, scandalous, and with an intent to raise sedition, would be pretty hard. My lord, we pray that clause of the statute may be read.

Sol. Gen. What for?

Mr. Pollexfen. It is a general law, and therefore the court will take notice of it; and we pray the jury may hear it read.

Sol. Gen. I agree it to be as Mr. Pollexfen has opened; and I agree it to be as sir Robert Sawyer has opened it.

Serj. Pemberton. My lord, we shall put it upon a short point. My lords the bishops are here accused of a crime of a very heinous nature as can be; they are here branded and stigmatized by this information, as if they were seditious libellers; when, my lord, it will in truth fall out, that they have done no more than their duty; their duty to God, their duty to the king, and their duty to the church.

For in this case, that which we humbly offer to your lordship (and insist upon it, as very very plain) is this; That the kings of England have no power to suspend or dispense with the laws and statutes of the kingdom, that establish religion: that is it which we stand upon for our defence. And we say, that such a dispensing power with laws and statutes, is a thing that strikes at the very foundation of all the rights, liberties, and properties of the king's subjects whatsoever. If the king may suspend the laws of the land which concern our religion, I am sure there is no other law but he may suspend: and if the king may suspend all the laws of the kingdom, what a condition are all the subjects in, for their lives, liberties, and properties? All at mercy.

My lord, the king's legal prerogatives are as much for the advantage of his subjects as of himself; and no man goes about to speak against them: but, under pretence of legal prerogatives, to extend the power of the king to support a prerogative that tends to the destruction of all his subjects, their religion and liberties; in that, I think, they do the king no service, who go about to do it.

But now we say, with your lordship's favour, that these laws are the great bulwark of the reformed religion; they are, in truth, that which fenceth the religion and church of England, and we have no other human fence besides. They were made upon a foresight of the mischief that had, and might come, by false religions in this kingdom; and they were intended to defend the nation against them, and to keep them out; particularly to keep out the Romish religion, which is the very worst of all religions, from prevailing among us; and that is the very design of the act for the tests, which is intituled, 'An Act to prevent dangers that may happen from Popish Recusants.'

My lord, if this declaration should take effect, what would be the end of it? All religions are let in, let them be what they will; Ranters, Quakers, and the like; nay, even the Roman Catholic religion, as they call it, which was intended, by these acts of parliament, and by the Act of Uniformity, and several other acts, to be kept out of this nation, as a religion no way tolerable, nor to be endured here.

If this declaration takes effect, that religion will stand upon the same terms with the Protestant religion. Suspend those laws, and that Romish religion, that was intended to be prohibited, and so much care was taken, and so many statutes made to prohibit it, will come in; and all this care, and all those statutes go for nothing. This one declaration sets them all out of doors; and then that religion stands upon equal terms with the established religion.

My lord, we say this farther, that my lords the bishops have the care of the church, by their very function and offices; and are bound to take care to keep out all those false religions that are prohibited, and designed to be kept out by the law. My lords the bishops finding this declaration founded upon a mere pretended power, that had been continually opposed and rejected in parliament, could not comply with the king's command to read it.

My lord, such a power to dispense with or suspend the laws of a nation, cannot with any shadow of reason be. It is not long since, that such a power was ever pretended to by any, but such as have the legislative too; for it is plain, that such a power must at least be equal to the power that made the laws. To dispense with a law must argue a power greater, or at least as great as that which made the law.

My lord, it has been often said in our books, That where the king's subjects are concerned in interest, the king cannot suspend or dispense with a particular law. But, my lord, how can the king's subjects be more concerned in interest, than when their religion lies at stake?

It has been resolved, upon the statute of Simony, that where the statute has disabled the party to take, there the king could not enable him against that act of parliament: and shall it be said, that by his dispensation he shall enable one to hold an office who is disabled by the Test Act?

My lord, we say, the course of our law allows no such dispensation as the declaration pretends to: and he that is but meanly read in our law, must needs understand this, That the kings of England cannot suspend our laws; for that would be to set aside the law of the kingdom; and then we might be clearly without any laws, if the king should please to suspend them.

'Tis true, we say, the last king Charles was prevailed upon, by misinformation, to make a dispensation somewhat of the nature of this, though not so full an one; for that dispensed only with some few ceremonies, and things of that nature: but the House of Commons (this taking air) in 1662, represent this to the king by a petition. And what is it that they do represent? That he, by his dispensation, has undertaken to do that which nothing but an act of parliament can do; that is, the dispensing with penal laws, which is only to be done by act of parliament. And thereupon it was thought fit, upon the king's account, to bring in an act for it in some cases.

My lord, the king did then, in his Speech to the parliament, (which we use as a great argument against this dispensing power) say this, "That considering the circumstances of the nation, he could wish with all his heart, that he had such a power to dispense with some laws, in some particulars." And thereupon there was a bill, in order to an act of parliament, brought in, giving the king a power to dispense; but, my lord, with a great many qualifications: which shews plainly, that it was taken by the parliament, that he had no power to dispense with the laws of himself.

My lord, afterwards in 1672, the king was prevailed upon again to grant another dispensation somewhat larger——

L. C. J. Brother Pemberton, I would not interrupt you, but we have heard of this over and over again already.

Serj. Pemberton. Then since your lordship is satisfied of all these things, as I presume you are, else I should have gone on, I have done, my lord.

Serj. Levinz. But, my lord, we shall go a little higher than that, and shew that it has been taken all along as the antient law of England, that such dispensations ought to be by the king and the parliament, and not by the king alone.

Sol. Gen. My lord, if you will admit every one of the counsel to speech it before they give their evidence, when shall we come to an end of this cause? We shall be here till midnight.

L. C. J. They have no mind to have an end of the cause, for they have kept it three hours longer than they need to have done.

Serj. Pemberton. My lord this case does require a great deal of patience.

L. C. J. It does so, brother; and the court has had a great deal of patience: but we must not sit here only to hear speeches.

Att. Gen. Now after all their speeches of two hours long, let them read any thing, if they have it.

Sir R. Sawyer. We will begin with the Record of Richard the 2nd—Call William Fisher.

Wm. Fisher, Clerk to Mr. Ince, sworn.

L. C. J. What do you ask him?

Sir R. Sawyer. Shew him that copy of the Record.—[The Record was then shewn him.]

L. C. J. Where had you those, Sir?

Mr. Fisher. Among the Records in the Tower.

L. C. J. Are they true copies?

Fisher. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Did you examine them by the Record?—Fisher. Yes, my lord.

Sir R. Sawyer. Then hand them in; put them in.

Clerk reads. 'Ex Rotulo Parlamenti de Anno Regni Regis Richardi Secundi 15 N. 1.'—My lord, it is written in French, and I shall make but a bad reading of it.

Sir S. Astry. Where is the man that examined it?—Do you understand French?

Fisher. Yes, my lord.

Sir R. Sawyer. The Record is in another hand than this; they may easily read it.

Sol. Gen. Who copied this paper?

Fisher. I did examine it.

Sol. Gen. What did you examine it with?

Fisher. I looked upon that copy, and Mr. Halstead read the record.

L. C. J. Young man, read out.

Fisher reads. 'Vendredy Lendemain del Almes qu'estoit le premier jour.'—

Sol. Gen. Pray tell us what it is you would have read?

Serj. Levinz. I'll tell you what it is, Mr. Solicitor: it is the dispensation with the statute of provisors: and the act of parliament does give the king a power to dispense till such a time.

Sol. Gen. Don't you think the king's prerogative is affirmed by many acts of parliament?

Serj. Levinz. If the king could dispense without an act of parliament, what need was there for the making of it?

Sol. Gen. Mr. Serjeant, we are not to argue with you about that yet.

L. C. J. Read it in English for the jury to understand it.

Fisher. My lord, I cannot undertake to read it so readily in English.

Just. Powell. Why don't you produce the Records that are mentioned in the petition, those in king Charles the 2nd's time?

Serj. Levinz. We will produce our records in order of time, as they are.

Sir Samuel Astry. There is the clerk of the Records of the Tower, Mr. Halstead, will read it very well in French or English.

[Then Mr. Halstead was sworn to interpret the Record into English, according to the best of his skill and knowledge; but not reading very readily—a true copy of the Record in English follows, out of the rolls of parliament, in the 15th year of king Richard the second, No. 1.]

‘Friday, the morrow of All-Souls, which was the first day of this parliament, holden at Westminster, in the 15th year of the reign of our lord king Richard the 2nd, after the conquest, the reverend father in God the archbishop of York, primate and chancellor of England, by the king’s commandment, being present in parliament, pronounced and declared very nobly and wisely, the cause of the summons of this parliament, and said, first, That the king would, that holy church principally, and afterwards the lords spiritual and temporal, and also the cities and boroughs, should have and enjoy their liberties and franchises as well as they had them, and enjoyed them, in the time of his noble progenitors, kings of England; and also in his own time. And afterwards said, the summons of this parliament was principally for three occasions. The first occasion was, to ordain how the peace and quiet of the land, which have heretofore been greatly blemished and disturbed, as well by detraction and maintenance as otherwise, might be better holden and kept, and the laws better executed, and the king’s commands better obeyed. The second occasion was, to ordain and see how the price of wools, which is beyond measure lessened and impaired, might be better amended and enhanced. And also, that in case the war should begin again, at the end of the present truce, to wit, at the assumption of our lady next coming, to ordain and see, how and whereby the said war may be maintained at the least charge of the people. And the third occasion was, touching the statutes of provisors, to ordain and see how our holy father might have that which to him belongs, and the king that which belongs to him, and his crown; according unto that, Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar’s, and unto God the things which are God’s.’

[Then the other Record of Richard the 2nd was read as follows, out of the rolls of parliament, the 15th year of king Richard the 2d, No. 8.]

‘Be it remembered, touching the statute of provisors, that the Commons, for the great confidence which they have in the person of our lord the king, and in his most excellent knowledge, and in the great tenderness which he hath for his crown, and the rights thereof; and also, in the noble and high discretions of the lords, have assented, in full parliament, that our said lord the king, by advice and assent of the said lords, may make such sufferance, touching the said statute, as shall seem to him reasonable and profitable, until the next parliament, so as the said statute be not repealed in no article thereof; and that all those who have any benefices by force of the said statute, before this present parliament; and also, that all those to whom any aid, tranquillity, or advantage is accrued, by virtue of the said statute of the benefices of holy church (of which they were heretofore in possession) as well by presentation, or collation of our lord the king, as of the ordinaries, or religious persons whatsoever, or by any other manner or way whatsoever, may freely have and enjoy them, and peaceably continue their possession thereof, without being ousted thereof, or any ways challenged, hindred, molested, disquieted, or grieved hereafter, by any provisors or others against the form and effect of the statute aforesaid, by reason of the said sufferance in any time to come. And moreover, that the said Commons may disagree at the next parliament to this sufferance, and fully resort to the said statute, if it shall seem good to them to do it: with protestation, that this assent, which is a novelty, and has not been done before this time, be not drawn into example or consequence for time to come. And they prayed our lord the king, that the protestation might be entered of record in the roll of the parliament; and the king granted, and commanded to do it.’

Serj. Levinz. Now, my lord, we will go on—This was in Richard the second’s time: and a power is given by the Commons to the king, with the assent of the Lords, to dispense, but only to the next parliament, with a power reserved to the Commons; and to disagree to it, and retract that consent of theirs the next parliament.

Sir George Treby. The statute of provisors was and is a penal law, and concerning ecclesiastical matters too; viz. The collating and presenting to archbishopricks, bishopricks, benefices, and dignities of the church: and in this record now read, the parliament give the king a limited power, and for the short time, to dispense with that statute. But, to obviate all pretence of such a power’s being inherent in the crown, as a prerogative, they declare, (1.) That it was a novelty; that is as much as to say, that the king had no such power before. (2.) That it should not be drawn into example; that is to say, that he should have no such power for the future.

Serj. Levinz. Now we will go on to the records mentioned in the petition; those in the last king’s time, in 1662, and 1672; and that in this king’s time, in 1685.—Where is the Journal of the House of Lords?

Mr. Walker sworn.

L. C. J. Is that the book of the House of Lords?

Mr. Walker. It is the Journal of the House of Lords.

L. C. J. Is it kept by you?

Mr. Walker. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Where is it kept?

Mr. Walker. In the usual place, here in Westminster.

Sol. Gen. What is that?

Serj. Levinz. It is the Journal of the House of Lords.—But, my lord, there is one thing that is mentioned in the last record that was read, which is worth your lordship's and the jury's observation; that it is declared a novelty, and a protestation, that it should not be drawn into precedent for the future.

L. C. J. That has been observed, brother: let us hear your record read.

Clerk reads.—'Die Mercurii, 13 die Februarii, 1662.

'His majesty was present this day, sitting in the regal crown and robes, the peers being likewise in their robes: the king gave order to the gentleman usher of the Black Rod, to signify to the House of Commons his pleasure, that they presently come up, and attend his majesty, with their speaker; who being present, his majesty made this speech following.

'My Lords and Gentlemen;

'I am very glad to meet you here again, having thought the time long since we parted, and often wished you had been together, to help me in some occasions which have fallen out: I need not repeat them unto you, you have all had the noise of them in your several countries; and, God be thanked, they were but noise, without any worse effects.

'To cure the distempers, and compose the differing minds that are yet amongst us, I set forth my declaration of the 26th of December. In which you may see, I am willing to set bounds to the hopes of some, and to the fears of others; of which when you shall have examined well the grounds, I doubt not but I shall have your concurrence therein. The truth is, I am in my nature an enemy to all severity for religion and conscience, how mistaken soever it be, when it extends to capital and sanguinary punishments; which I am told, were began in popish times. Therefore, when I say this, I hope I shall not need to warn any here, not to infer from thence that I mean to favour popery. I must confess to you, there are many of that profession, who, having served my father and myself very well, may fairly hope for some part in that indulgence I would willingly afford to others who dissent from us. But let me explain myself, lest some mistake me herein, as I heard they did in my declaration. I am far from meaning by this a toleration, or qualifying them thereby to hold any offices or places of trust in the government. Nay, further, I desire some laws may be made to hinder the growth and progress of their doctrine.

'I hope you have all so good an opinion of my zeal for the Protestant religion, as I need not tell you, I will not yield to any therein, not to the bishops themselves, nor in my liking the uniformity of it, as it is now established;

'which being the standard of our religion, must be kept pure and uncorrupted, free from all other mixtures. And yet, if the dissenters will demean themselves peaceably and modestly under the government, I could heartily wish I had such a power of indulgence to use upon occasion.'—

Sir George Treby. Pray, Sir, read that out distinctly.

Clerk reads.—'I could heartily wish I had such a power of indulgence to use upon occasion, as might not needlessly force them out of the kingdom; or, staying here, give them cause to conspire against the peace of it.

'My Lords and Gentlemen;

'It would look like flattering in me, to tell you in what degree I am confident of your wisdom and affection in all things that relate to the greatness and prosperity of the kingdom. If you consider well what is best for us all, I dare say we shall not disagree. I have no more to say to you at present, but, once again, to bid you heartily welcome.'

Mr. Finch. The next thing we shall shew you is, that after the king had made this speech, and wished he had such a power of indulgence to use upon occasion, there was a Bill in the House of Lords brought in, to enable the king to dispense with several laws: we shall shew you the Journal, where it was read and committed; but further than that it went not.

L. C. J. What use do you make of this, Mr. Finch?

Sir Robert Sawyer. You may easily apprehend the use we shall make of it. (The king, in his speech, says, 'He wished he had such a power'); the House of Lords thought he had not; and therefore they ordered a Bill to be brought in, to enable him.—Read the Journal of the Lords of the 13th of March, 1662.

Clerk reads. 'Die Veneris, 13 die Martii, 1662.

'After some debate, whether the House should be put into a grand committee, for the further debate of the Bill concerning his majesty's power in ecclesiastical affairs, it was put to the question; viz.

'As many of your lordships as would have this House adjourned, and put into a committee to consider of the said Bill, say, Content; others, Not Content.

'Passed in the affirmative.

'And then the lord chamberlain of the household was directed to take the chair, as formerly; which he did accordingly.

'And after debate, the House was resumed, after the grand committee had appointed a sub-committee, touching the said Bill.'

Sir Robert Sawyer. This is all in the Journal of the House of Lords about this matter.—We will now shew you the Bill itself.

Clerk reads. 'An Act concerning his majesty's power in ecclesiastical affairs.

'Whereas divers of his majesty's subjects,

‘ through error of judgment, and misguided ‘ consciences (whereunto the licentiousness of ‘ these late unhappy times have much con‘ tributed) do not conform themselves to the ‘ order of divine worship and service esta‘ blished by law; and though his majesty and ‘ both houses of parliament are fully satisfied, ‘ that those scruples of conscience, from ‘ whence this non-conformity ariseth, are ill
 ‘ grounded; and that the government of the ‘ church, with the service thereof, (as now ‘ established) is the best that is any where ex‘ tant, and most effectual to the preservation of ‘ the Protestant religion; yet hoping that cle‘ mency and indulgence may, in time, wear
 ‘ out those prejudices, and reduce the dis‘ senters to the unity of the church; and con‘ sidering that this indulgence, how necessary
 ‘ soever, cannot be dispensed by any certain ‘ rule, but must vary, according to the cir‘ cumstances of time, and the temper and prin‘ ciples of those to whom it is to be granted;
 ‘ and his majesty being the best judge when,
 ‘ and to whom this indulgence is to be dis‘ pensed, or as may be most consistent with ‘ the public peace, and without just cause of ‘ offence to others; and to the end his majesty
 ‘ may be enabled to exercise it with universal ‘ satisfaction, Be it enacted by the king’s most ‘ excellent majesty, by advice, and with the ‘ consent of the lords spiritual and temporal,
 ‘ and commons, in this present parliament as‘ sembled, and by the authority thereof, that
 ‘ the king’s majesty may, by letters patents
 ‘ under the great seal, or by such other ways
 ‘ as to his majesty shall seem meet, dispense ‘ with one act, or law, made the last session
 ‘ of this present parliament (intituled, An Act
 ‘ for the Uniformity of public prayers, and ad‘ ministration of the Sacraments, and other ‘ rites and ceremonies; and for establishing ‘ the form of making, and ordaining, and con‘ secrating bishops, priests and deacons, in the ‘ Church of England) and with any other ‘ laws or statutes concerning the same; or re‘ quiring oaths, or subscriptions; or which do ‘ enjoin conformity to the order, discipline, and ‘ worship established in this church, and the ‘ penalties in the said laws imposed, or any of ‘ them: and may grant licences to such of his ‘ majesty’s subjects of the Protestant religion,
 ‘ of whose inoffensive and peaceable disposition
 ‘ his majesty shall be persuaded, to enjoy and ‘ use the exercise of their religion and worship, ‘ though differing from the public rule (the said
 ‘ laws and statutes, or any disabilities incapa-
 ‘ cities, or penalties, in them, or any of them
 ‘ contained, or any matter or thing to the con‘ trary thereof notwithstanding.)

‘ Provided always, and be it enacted, That ‘ no such indulgence, licence, or dispensation
 ‘ hereby to be granted, shall extend, or be con‘ strued to extend to the tolerating, or permit‘ ting the use or exercise of the Popish, or ‘ Roman Catholic religion in this kingdom;
 ‘ nor to enable any person or persons to hold or ‘ exercise any place or office of public trust

‘ within this kingdom; who, at the beginning
 ‘ of this present parliament were, by the laws
 ‘ and statutes of this realm, disenabled there-
 ‘ unto; nor to exempt any person or persons ‘ from such penalties as are by law to be in‘ flicted upon such as shall publish or preach any ‘ thing to the depravation or derogation of the ‘ book of Common-Prayer, or the government, ‘ order and ceremonies of the church established
 ‘ by law.

‘ Provided also, and be it enacted, That no ‘ such licence or dispensation shall extend to ‘ make any priest or minister capable of any ‘ ecclesiastical living or benefice, with cure, ‘ who shall not, before the archbishop of the ‘ province, or bishop of the diocese where he ‘ lives, make such subscription to the articles ‘ of religion, as is enjoined by the statute of the ‘ 13th of Elizabeth, made for reformation of ‘ disorders in the church; nor shall extend, or ‘ be construed to extend to dispense with the ‘ book of Common Prayer: but that the said
 ‘ book shall be constantly read in all the cathe‘ dral and collegiate churches, and in all the ‘ parish churches, and public chapels.’

Sir Rob. Sawyer. Here your lordship sees what the Lords did in this matter.—We shall now shew you, out of the Commons Journal, what they did concerning this speech of the King—Shew the Journal of the 25th of February, 1662.

Mr. Jodrell sworn.

L. C. J. Did you examine that, Mr. Jodrell?

Mr. Jodrell. It is the original book. [The book delivered into the court.]

Clerk reads. ‘ Die Mercurii 25. die Fe-‘ bruarii, 15 Car. 2. Resolved, That it be ‘ presented—

Sir Rob. Sawyer. You must begin above
 —‘ The House then took into debate—

Clerk reads. ‘ The House then took into ‘ debate the matter touching indulgence to ‘ dissenters, from the act of uniformity.

‘ The question being put, that the present
 ‘ debate be adjourned till to-morrow morning,
 ‘ the House was divided; the Yeas went out.

‘ Sir John Goodrick, and sir William Lowther,
 ‘ tellers for the Noes; with the Noes 161.

‘ Sir Richard Temple, and sir John Talbot,
 ‘ tellers for the Yeas; with the Yeas 119.

‘ And so it passed in the negative.

‘ Resolved, &c. That it be presented to the ‘ King’s Majesty, as the humble advice of this ‘ House, That no indulgence be granted to the ‘ dissenters, from the act of uniformity—

Sol. Gen. Does your lordship think it to be evidence?

L. C. J. Let them read it, Mr. Solicitor, that we may hear what it is.

Clerk reads on.

‘ Ordered, That a Committee be appointed to ‘ collect and bring in the reasons of this House
 ‘ for this vote, upon the present debate; to be ‘ presented to his Majesty, and that the nomi‘ nating of the Committee be adjourned till to‘ morrow morning.’

Sir Rob. Sawyer. That's all.

Sol. Gen. Pray, if there be any thing more, read on; you shall not parcel out a record, and take and leave what you will.

Mr. Finch. Did not you parcel out our Petition?

Sol. Gen. Read on, if there be any thing about this matter.

Clerk. That is all.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. Turn to the 27th of February, 1662.

Clerk reads. 'Veneris, 27. Februarii, 15 Car. 2.

'Sir Heneage Finch reports from the Committee appointed to collect and bring in the reasons of the House for their vote of advice to the King's Majesty; and in the close of those reasons to add, That the House will assist his Majesty with their lives and fortunes: and to pen an address to his Majesty for that purpose, the several reasons and address agreed to by the Committee in writing, he read in his place, and did bring up, and deliver the same in at the clerk's table.

'The first paragraph was read, and upon the question agreed to.

'The second paragraph was read, and upon the question agreed to.

'The third was read, and upon the question agreed to.'

Sir Rob. Sawyer. Go over that, and go to the Address itself.

Clerk reads. 'May it please your most excellent Majesty; We your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the House of Commons in parliament assembled, having with all fidelity and obedience considered of the several matters comprized in your Majesty's late gracious declaration of the 26th of December last, and your most gracious speech at the beginning of this present session, do in the first place for ourselves, and in the names of all the Commons of England, render unto your sacred Majesty the tribute of our most hearty thanks for that infinite grace and goodness wherewith your Majesty hath been pleased to publish your royal intention of adhering to your act of indemnity and oblivion, by a constant and religious observance of it; and our hearts are further enlarged in these returns of thanksgiving, when we consider your Majesty's most princely and heroic profession relying upon the affections of your people, and the abhorring all sorts of military and arbitrary rule; but above all, we can never enough remember, to the honour of your Majesty's piety, and our own unspeakable comfort, those solemn and most endearing invitations of your Majesty's subjects, to prepare laws to be presented to your Majesty against the growth and increase of Popery; and withal, to provide more laws against licentiousness and impiety, at the same time declaring your own resolutions for maintaining the act of uniformity: and it becomes us always to acknowledge and admire your Majesty's wisdom in this your declaration, whereby your Majesty is pleased to resolve not only by sumptuary laws, but by your own royal example of frugality, to restrain that excess in men's expences, which is grown so general and so exorbitant, and to direct our endeavours to find out fit and proper laws for the advancement of trade and commerce.

'After all this, we most humbly beseech your Majesty to believe, that it is with extreme unwillingness and reluctance of heart, that we are brought to differ from any thing which your Majesty hath thought fit to propose; and though we do no ways doubt but that the unreasonable distempers of men's spirits, and the many mutinies and conspiracies which were carried on during the late intervals of parliament, did reasonably incline your Majesty to endeavour by your declaration to give some alloy to those ill humours, till the parliament assembled, and the hopes of an indulgence, if the parliament should consent to it; especially seeing the pretenders to this indulgence did seem to make some title to it by virtue of your Majesty's Declaration from Bredah: nevertheless, we your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, who are now returned to serve in parliament, from those several parts and places of your kingdom for which we are chosen, do humbly offer it to your Majesty's great wisdom, that it is in no sort adviseable that there be any indulgence to such persons who presume to dissent from the act of uniformity and religion established, for these reasons.

'We have considered the nature of your majesty's declaration from Bredah, and are humbly of opinion, That your majesty ought not to be pressed any further.

'Because it is not a promise in itself, but only a gracious declaration of your majesty's intentions to do what in you lay, and what a parliament should advise your majesty to do, and no such advice was ever given, or thought fit to be offered; nor could it be otherwise understood, because there were laws of uniformity then in being, which could not be dispensed with but by act of parliament.'

Sir R. Sawyer. This is all that we read this for; your lordship and the jury see what is here declared by the parliament, That the act of uniformity could not be dispensed with, without an act of parliament.

Next, my lord, we shall shew you what was done in the year 1672.—Read the king's speech the 5th of February, 1672.

[The Journals of the Lords House were delivered in.]

Clerk reads. 'Die Mercurij, 5 Februarij, 1672.

'My lords and gentlemen;

'I am glad to see you here this day. I would have called you sooner together, but that I was willing to ease you and the country, till there were an absolute necessity.

'Since you were last here, I have been ‘ forced to a most important, necessary, and expensive war; and I make no doubt but you will give me suitable and effectual assistance to go through with it. I refer you to my declaration for the causes, and indeed the necessity of this war, and shall now only tell you, That I might have digested the indignities to my own person, rather than have brought it to this extremity, if the interest, as well as the honour of the whole kingdom had not been at stake; and if I had omitted this conjuncture, perhaps I had not again ever met with the like advantage.

‘ You will find that the last supply that you gave me, did not answer expectation for the ends you gave it, the payments of my debts; therefore I must in the next place recommend them again to your special care.

‘ Some few days before I declared the war, I put forth my declaration for indulgence to dissenters, and have hitherto found a good effect of it, by securing my peace at home, when I had war abroad: there is one part in it that has been subject to misconstructions, which is that concerning the papists, as if more liberty was granted to them than to other recusants, when ’tis plain there is less; for the others have public places allowed them, and I never intended that they should have any, but only have the freedom of their religion in their own houses, without any concurrence of others; and I could not grant them less than this, when I had extended so much more grace to others, most of them having been loyal, and in the service of me, and the king my father: and in the whole course of this indulgence I do not intend that it shall any way prejudice the church, but I will support its rights, and it in its full power.

‘ Having said this, I shall take it very ill to receive contradiction in what I have done; and I will deal plainly with you, I am resolved to stick to my declaration.

‘ There is one jealousy more which is maliciously spread abroad, and yet so weak and frivolous, that I once thought it not of moment enough to mention; but it may have gotten some ground with some well-minded people, and that is, that the forces which I have raised in this war were designed to controul law and property. I wish I had had more forces the last summer; the want of them then, convinces me, I must raise more against this next spring; and I do not doubt but you will consider the charge of them in your supplies.

‘ I will conclude with this assurance to you, That I will preserve the true reformed protestant religion, and the church, as it is now established in this kingdom, and that no man’s property or liberty shall ever be invaded. I leave the rest to the chancellor.’

Serj. Pemberton. Now go to the Journal of the Commons of the 14th of February, 1672.

[The Journal put in.]

Clerk reads. ‘ Veneris 13, die Februarij, 1672.

‘ Mr. Powle reports from the committee appointed to prepare and draw up a petition and address to his majesty, the said petition and address, which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered the same in at the clerk’s table, and the same being again twice read, is as followeth, viz.

‘ Most gracious sovereign;

‘ We your majesty’s most loyal and faithful subjects, the commons assembled in parliament, do in the first place, as in all duty bound, return your majesty our most humble and hearty thanks for the many gracious promises and assurances which your majesty has several times, during this present parliament, given to us, that your majesty would secure and maintain unto us the true reformed protestant religion, our liberties and properties; which most gracious assurances your majesty, out of your great goodness, has been pleased to renew unto us, more particularly at the opening of this present session of parliament.

‘ And further, we crave leave humbly to represent, that we have, with all duty and expedition, taken into consideration the several parts of your majesty’s last speech to us; and withal, the declaration therein mentioned for indulgence to dissenters, dated the 15th of March last: and we find ourselves bound in duty to inform your majesty, that penal statutes, in matters ecclesiastical, cannot be suspended but by act of parliament.

‘ We therefore, the knights, citizens, and burgesses of your majesty’s house of commons, do most humbly beseech your majesty, That the said laws may have their free course, until it shall be otherwise provided for by act of parliament: and that your majesty would graciously be pleased to give such directions herein, that no apprehensions or jealousies may remain in the hearts of your majesty’s good and faithful subjects.

‘ Resolved, &c.

‘ That this house doth agree with the committee in the petition and address by them drawn up to be presented to his majesty.’

Sir R. Sawyer. Now turn to the 24th of February, 1672, in the same book.

Clerk reads. ‘ Lunæ, 24 Februarij, 1672.

‘ Mr. Secretary Coventry reports and presents in writing from his majesty, his Answer to the humble Petition and Address of this House, which was thrice read, and the matter debated, and is as followeth; viz.

‘ CHARLES R.

‘ His majesty hath received an address from you, and he hath seriously considered of it, and returns you this answer, That he is very much troubled, that that declaration which he put out for ends so necessary for the quiet of his kingdom, and especially in that conjuncture, should have proved the cause of disquiet in his House of Commons,

‘ and give occasion to the questioning of his ‘ power in ecclesiastics, which he finds not done
 ‘ in the reigns of any of his ancestors. He is ‘ sure he never had thoughts of using it other‘ wise than as it hath been entrusted in him, to ‘ the peace and establishment of the Church ‘ of England, and the ease of all his subjects in ‘ general; neither does he pretend to the right
 ‘ of suspending any laws, wherein the pro‘ perties, rights, or liberties of any of his sub‘ jects are concerned, nor to alter any thing in ‘ the established doctrine or discipline of the ‘ Church of England. But his only design in ‘ this, was to take off the penalties the statutes ‘ inflicted upon dissenters, which he believes,
 ‘ when well considered of, you yourselves
 ‘ would not wish executed according to the ri‘ gor and letter of the law; neither hath he ‘ done this with any thought of avoiding or ‘ precluding the advice of his parliament; and ‘ if any bill shall be offered, which shall appear ‘ more proper to attain the aforesaid ends, and ‘ secure the peace of the church and kingdom,
 ‘ when tendered in due manner to him, he will ‘ shew how readily he will concur in all ways
 ‘ that shall appear good for the kingdom.’

Sir R. Sawyer. Turn to the 26th of February, 1672.

Clerk reads. ‘ Die Mercurii, 26 Feb. 1672.

‘ Mr. Powle reports from the committee ap‘ pointed to consider of an answer to return to ‘ his majesty’s last message upon the debate of ‘ the House, an answer agreed by the com‘ mittee, and drawn up, and put into writing,
 ‘ which he read in his place, and then delivered
 ‘ the same in at the clerk’s table, where it was ‘ twice read, and is as followeth; viz.

‘ Most gracious Sovereign;

‘ We your majesty’s most humble and loyal ‘ subjects, the knights, citizens, and burgesses
 ‘ in this present parliament assembled, do ren‘ der to your most sacred majesty our most du‘ tiful thanks, for that, to our unspeakable com‘ fort, your majesty has been pleased so often
 ‘ to reiterate unto us those gracious promises
 ‘ and assurances of maintaining the religion
 ‘ now established, and the liberties and pro‘ perties of your people; and we do not in the ‘ least measure doubt but that your majesty
 ‘ had the same gracious intention in giving ‘ satisfaction to your subjects, by your answer
 ‘ to our last petition and address: yet, upon a ‘ serious consideration thereof, we find that ‘ the said answer is not sufficient to clear the ‘ apprehensions that may justly remain in the ‘ minds of your people, by your majesty’s hav‘ ing claimed a power to suspend penal statutes
 ‘ in matters ecclesiastical, and which your ma‘ jesty does still seem to assert, in the said an‘ swer, to be entrusted in the crown, and never ‘ questioned in the reigns of any of your an‘ cestors: wherein we humbly conceive your ‘ majesty has been very much misinformed;
 ‘ since no such power ever was claimed or ex‘ ercised by any of your majesty’s predecessors;
 ‘ and if it should be admitted, might tend to the ‘ interrupting the free course of the laws, and

VOL. XII.

‘ altering the legislative power, which hath al‘ ways been acknowledged to reside in your ‘ two houses of parliament.

‘ We therefore, with an unanimous consent, ‘ become again most humble suitors unto your ‘ sacred majesty, That you would be pleased ‘ to give us a full and satisfactory answer to ‘ our said petition and address, and that your ‘ majesty would take such effectual order, that ‘ the proceedings in this matter may not for ‘ the future be drawn into consequence or ex‘ ample.

‘ The answer to his majesty’s message was ‘ again read by paragraphs, and the several pa‘ ragraphs to the last were, upon the question, ‘ severally agreed.

‘ The last paragraph being read, and the ‘ question being put, that the word ‘ unanimous’
 ‘ should stand in the paragraph,

‘ The House divided:—The Noes go out.

‘ Tellers. Lord St. John and Mr. Vaughan,
 ‘ for the Yeas, 180.

‘ Sir Richard Temple and sir Philip Howard,
 ‘ for the Noes, 77. And so it was resolved in ‘ the affirmative.

‘ The question being put to agree to the pa‘ ragraph, it was resolved in the affirmative.

‘ Resolved, &c.

‘ That the whole Address be agreed to, as it
 ‘ was brought in by the committee.’

Sir Robert Sawyer. Now turn to the Lords’ Journal, and there your lordship will see, that the king does communicate this Address to the Lords, and desires their advice. Read the 1st of March, 1672.

Clerk reads. ‘ Die Sabbati primo die Martii, ‘ 1672.

‘ His Majesty this day made a short speech,
 ‘ as follows:

‘ My Lords;

‘ You know, that at the opening of this ses‘ sion, I spoke here to your satisfaction; it has ‘ notwithstanding begotten a greater disquiet in ‘ the House of Commons than I could have ‘ imagined.

‘ I received an address from them, which I ‘ looked not for, and I made them an answer
 ‘ that ought to have contented them; but on the ‘ contrary, they have made me a reply of such ‘ a nature, that I cannot think fit to proceed
 ‘ any further in this matter without your advice.

‘ I have commanded the Chancellor to ac‘ quaint you with all the transactions, wherein ‘ you will find both me and yourselves highly ‘ concerned. I am sensible for what relates to ‘ me, and I assure you, my Lords, I am not ‘ less so for the privilege and the honour of ‘ this House.

‘ Afterwards the Lord Chancellor read the ‘ several papers and addresses of the House of ‘ Commons, and his Majesty’s answer there-‘ unto, and opened his Majesty’s proceedings ‘ upon them.

The Address of the House of Commons was read.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. Pass over that, you have read it already.

Clerk reads. 'The next, his Majesty's Answer to the Address of the House of Commons, was read as follows,——'

Sir Rob. Sawyer. That hath been read too.

Clerk reads. 'Then was read the reply of the House of Commons to his Majesty's Answer, as followeth,——'

Mr. Finch. You have read that likewise.

Clerk reads. 'Upon this it is ordered, that the Lord Treasurer, duke of Buckingham, earl of Bridgwater, earl of Northampton, earl of Bristol, earl of Berks, earl of Bolingbroke, and the earl of Anglesey, do forthwith withdraw, and consider what humble thanks is fit to be given to his Majesty for his great favour in communicating this business to this House, and report the same. And accordingly, the said Lords Committees did withdraw themselves for that purpose.

'The Lords being returned, the duke of Buckingham reported what the Committee had prepared to present to his Majesty by way of thanks, which was read as followeth.

'We the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, do unanimously present to your sacred Majesty our most humble thanks, for having been pleased to communicate to us what has passed between your Majesty and the House of Commons, whereby you have graciously offered us the means of shewing our duty to your Majesty, and of asserting the antient just rights and privileges of the House of Peers.

'The question being put, whether to agree with the Committee?

'It was resolved in the affirmative.

'Ordered, That his Majesty be desired, that his speech, and the papers read this day, may be entered into the Journal-book of this House.

'The lord treasurer, the duke of Buckingham, and the lord Chamberlain, are appointed to attend his Majesty presently, to know his pleasure, what time and place this whole House shall wait upon him, to present the humble thanks of this House for his great favour shewed this day.

'Ordered, That upon Monday morning next, this House will debate the whole matter of his Majesty's speech, and these papers; and to consider the points of privilege, and what else may arise thereupon.

'The lords that were appointed to attend his Majesty, return with this answer.

'That his Majesty has appointed this afternoon at five of the clock, for this House to wait upon him in the banquetting house, at Whitehall.

'Ordered, That all the judges now in town, shall attend this House on Monday morning next.'

Sir Rob. Sawyer. The third of March, 1672, is the next.

Clerk reads. 'Die Lunæ 3 die Martii, 1672.

'The Lord Chancellor reported, that the whole House on Saturday last waited upon his Majesty at Whitehall, and presented the humble Address of this House, and his Majesty was pleased to return this Answer.

'My Lords;

'I take this Address of your's very kindly; I will always be very affectionate to you, and expect you should stand by me, as I will always by you.

'Then the House took into consideration the whole matter of his Majesty's speech on Saturday, and the three papers which his Majesty acquainted this House withal, and all the said papers in their order were read, and after a long debate, the question being put,

'Whether this House shall in the first place enter into consideration of giving advice to his Majesty?—It was resolved in the affirmative.

'It is ordered, that this business shall be taken into consideration to-morrow morning, at nine of the clock, the first business.

'Ordered, That the judges now in town, shall attend to-morrow morning.'

Sir Rob. Sawyer. The 4th of March, 1672.

Clerk reads. 'Next, the House took into consideration the advice to be given to his Majesty, concerning the Addresses made to him from the House of Commons.

'The Address of the House of Commons, and his Majesty's Answer were read, and after a long debate, the question being put, whether the King's Answer to the House of Commons, in referring the points now controverted to a parliamentary way by Bill, is good and gracious, that being a proper and natural course for satisfaction therein?

It was resolved in the affirmative.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. The 8th of March, 1672.

Clerk reads. 'Die Sabbati 8 die Martij, 1672.

'His Majesty on his royal throne, adorned with his crown and regal ornaments, commanded the gentleman usher of the black-rod to give notice to the House of Commons, that they attend his Majesty presently.

'The Commons being come with their speaker, his Majesty made this short speech following.

'My Lords and Gentlemen;

'Yesterday you presented me an address, as the best means for the satisfying and composing the minds of my subjects, to which I freely and readily agreed, and I shall take care to see it performed accordingly.

'I hope, on the other side, you gentlemen of the House of Commons will do your part; for I must put you in mind, it is near five weeks since I demanded a supply, and what you voted unanimously upon it, did both give life to my affairs at home, and dishearten mine enemies abroad; but the seeming delay it hath met withal since, hath made them to take new courage, and they are now preparing for this next summer a greater fleet, as they say, than ever they have had yet; so that if the supply be not very speedily dispatch'd, it will be altogether ineffectual, and the safety, ‘honour and interest of England must of necessity be exposed. Pray lay this to heart, and let not the fears and jealousies of some draw an inevitable ruin upon us all.

‘My Lords and Gentlemen;

‘If there be any scruple remaining with you concerning the suspension of penal laws, I here faithfully promise you, that what has been done in that particular, shall not for the future be drawn either into consequence or example. And as I daily expect from you a bill for my supply, so I assure you, I shall as willingly pass any other you shall offer me that may tend to the giving you satisfaction in all your just grievances.

‘Next my Lord Chancellor reported, That both Houses waited upon the King yesterday, and presented him with the Address against the growth of Popery, and his Majesty hath been pleased to return this answer.

‘My Lords and Gentlemen;

‘I do heartily agree with you in your Address, and shall give speedy order to have it put in execution. There is one part to which I believe it is not your intention that it should extend; for I can scarce say, those are in my pay that are presently to be employed abroad; but as for all other parts, I shall take care it shall be done as you desire.’

After which the Lord Chancellor said, he had somewhat more to impart to the House by the King’s command, which was,

‘That his Majesty last night, having spoken with several members of both Houses, found some dissatisfaction remaining concerning his answer to their address, in the particular of the officers to be employed abroad, of which number he had five or six that were of the best officers of France and Flanders, and being his own subjects, he had been very solicitous to get; but if that bred any umbrage, the king commanded him to let them know, that he resolves to give both his Houses full satisfaction to their desires.

‘There was another particular that the Lord Chancellor said he thought fit to acquaint them with, which, though it was by his Majesty’s leave, yet it was not by his command: however, he thought it his duty to acquaint the House with it (Mr. Secretary Coventry intending to acquaint the House of Commons with the same), That his Majesty had the last night, in pursuance of what he then intended, and declared this morning, concerning the suspension of Penal Laws not being for the future drawn either into consequence or example, caused the original declaration under the Great-Seal to be cancelled in his presence, whereof himself and several other lords of the council were witnesses.’

Sir Robert Sawyer. Turn to the 10th of March, 1672.

Clerk reads. ‘Die Lunæ decimo die Martij, 1672.

‘Ordered, That what my Lord Chancellor said on Saturday last, concerning his Majesty’s causing the vacating his indulgence under the Great-Seal of England, shall be entered into the Journal-Book of this House, as on Saturday last.’

Sir Rob. Sawyer. We shall now come to that which passed in the parliament in 1685—Read the 9th of November, 1685. [The Journal of the Lords, 1685, put in.]

Clerk reads. ‘His Majesty being on his royal throne adorned with his regal robes and crown (the Lords being in their robes also) commanded the gentleman-usher to give notice to the House of Commons that they immediately attend his Majesty; who being come, his Majesty made the following speech.

‘My Lords and Gentlemen;

‘After the storm that seemed to be coming upon us when we parted last, I am glad to meet you all again in so great peace and quietness; God Almighty be praised, by whose blessing that rebellion was suppressed; but when I reflect what an inconsiderable number of men began it, and how long they carried it on without any opposition, I hope every body will be convinced that the militia, which hath hitherto been so much depended upon, is not sufficient for such occasions, and that there is nothing but a good force of well-disciplined troops in constant pay that can defend us from such as either at home or abroad are disposed to disturb us.

‘And in truth, my concern for the peace and quiet of my subjects, as well as for the safety of the government, make me think it necessary to increase the number to the proportion I have done. This I owed as well to the honour as to the security of the nation, whose reputation was so infinitely exposed unto all our neighbours, by having lain open to this late wretched attempt, that it is not to be repaired without keeping such a body of men on foot, that none may ever have the thoughts again of finding us so miserably unprovided.

‘It is for the support of this great charge, which is now more than double to what it was, that I ask your assistance, in giving me a supply answerable to the expence it brings along with it: and I cannot doubt, but what I have begun so much for the honour and defence of the government, will be continued by you with all the chearfulness and readiness that is requisite for a work of so great importance.

‘Let no man take exceptions that there are some officers in the army not qualified according to the late tests for their employments: the gentlemen, I must tell you, are most of them well known to me; and having formerly served with me on several occasions, and always approved the loyalty of their principles by their practices, I think them fit now to be employed under me; and will deal plainly with you, that after having had the benefit of their services in such time of need and danger, I will neither expose them to disgrace, nor myself to the want of them, if there should ‘be another rebellion to make them necessary to me.

‘I am afraid some men may be so wicked to hope and expect that a difference may happen between you and me upon this occasion; but when you consider what advantages have risen to us in a few months by the good understanding we have hitherto had, what wonderful effects it has already produced in the change of the whole scene of affairs abroad, so much more to the honour of the nation, and the figure it ought to make in the world, and that nothing can hinder a further progress in this way, to all our satisfactions, but fears and jealousies amongst ourselves; I will not apprehend that such a misfortune can befall us as a division, or but a coldness between me and you; nor that any thing can shake you in your steadiness and loyalty to me, who, by God’s blessing, will ever make you all returns of kindness and protection, with a resolution to venture even my own life in the defence of the true interest of this kingdom.’

Sir R. Sawyer. Turn to the Commons Journal, the 16th of Nov. 1685. [The Journal of the House of Commons put in.]

Clerk reads. ‘Die Lunæ, 16 die Novemb. 1685.

‘Most gracious Sovereign;

‘We your majesty’s most loyal and faithful subjects, the Commons in parliament assembled, do in the first place (as in duty bound) return your majesty our most humble and hearty thanks for your great care and conduct in the suppression of the late rebellion, which threatened the overthrow of this government both in church and state, and the uttermost extirpation of our religion by law established, which is most dear unto us, and which your majesty has been pleased to give us repeated assurances you will always defend and support, which with all grateful hearts we shall ever acknowledge.

‘We further crave leave to acquaint your majesty, That we have with all duty and readiness taken into our consideration your majesty’s gracious speech to us; and as to that part of it relating to the officers in the army not qualified for their employment according to an act of parliament made in the 25th year of the reign of your majesty’s royal brother of blessed memory, entitled, An Act for preventing dangers that may happen by Popish recusants, We do, out of our bounden duty, humbly represent unto your majesty, That those officers cannot by law be capable of their employments, and that the incapacities they bring upon themselves thereby, can no ways be taken off but by act of parliament.

‘Therefore, out of the great deference and duty we owe unto your majesty (who has been graciously pleased to take notice of their services to you), we are preparing a Bill to pass both houses for your royal assent, to indemnify them from the penalties they have now incurred; and because the continuance of them in their employments may be taken to be dispensing with that law without act of parliament, the consequence of which is of the greatest concern to the rights of all your majesty’s dutiful and loyal subjects, and to all the laws made for the security of their religion:

‘We therefore, the knights, citizens, and burgesses of your majesty’s House of Commons, do most humbly beseech your majesty, that you would be graciously pleased to give such directions therein, that no apprehensions or jealousies may remain in the hearts of your majesty’s good and faithful subjects.’

Mr. Pollerfen. My lord, we pray that these half dozen lines of the statute 1 Eliz. may be read. [A Statute-Book was then produced by Mr. Ince.]

L. C. J. We will have it read out of our own book. [Which was delivered into court.]

Clerk reads. ‘This is 1 Eliz. cap. 2. An Act for uniformity of religion, &c. Whereabout is it?’

Mr. Ince. It is the 15th paragraph, at these words—And for due execution, &c.

Clerk reads. ‘And for due execution hereof, the queen’s most excellent majesty, the lords spiritual and temporal in this parliament assembled, do in God’s name earnestly require and charge all the archbishops and bishops, and other ordinaries, and they shall endeavour themselves, to the utmost of their knowledge, that the due and true execution hereof may be had throughout their dioceses and charges, as they will answer before God for such evils and plagues, wherewith Almighty God may justly punish his people for neglecting this good and wholesome law.’

Serj. Levinz. Now, my lord, if your lordship pleases, the charge is a charge for a libel, and there are two things to be considered.

First, Whether the bishops did deliver this paper to the king? But that we leave upon the evidence that has been given; only we say, there has been no direct proof of that.

In the next place, supposing they did deliver this petition to the king, Whether this be a libel upon the matter of it, the manner of delivering it, or the persons that did it?

And with submission, my lord, this cannot be a libel, although it be true that they did so deliver it.

First, my lord, there is little disingenuity offered to my lords the bishops, in only setting forth part, and not the whole; in only reciting the body, and not the prayer.

But, my lord, with your lordship’s favour, taking the petitionary part, and adding it to the other, it quite alters the nature of the thing; for it may be, a complaint without seeking redress might be an ill matter; but here taking the whole together, it appears to be a complaint of a grievance, and a desire to be eased of it.

With your lordship’s favour, the subjects have a right to petition the king in all their grievances, so say all our books of law, and so says the statute of the thirteenth of the late king; they may petition, and come and deliver their petition under the number of ten, as heretofore they might have done, says the statute; so that they all times have had a right so to do, and indeed if they had not, it were the most lamentable thing in the world, that men must have grievances upon them, and yet they not to be admitted to seek relief in an humble way.

Now, my lord, this is a petition setting forth a grievance, and praying his majesty to give relief. And what is this grievance? It is that command of his, by that order made upon my lords the bishops, to distribute the declaration, and cause it to be read in the churches: and pray, my lord, let us consider what the effects and consequences of that distribution and reading is: it is to tell the people, that they need not submit to the Act of Uniformity, nor to any act of parliament made about ecclesiastical matters, for they are suspended and dispensed with. This my lords the bishops must do, if they obey this order; but your lordship sees, if they do it, they lie under an Anathema by the statute of 1 Eliz. for there they are under a curse if they do not look to the preservation and observation of that act: but this command to distribute and read the declaration, whereby all these laws are dispensed with, is to let the people know, they will not do what the act requires of them.

Now, with your lordship's favour, my lords the bishops lying under this pressure, the weight of which was very grievous upon them, they by petition apply to the king to be eased of it, which they might do as subjects: besides, my lord, they are peers of the realm, and were most of them sitting as such in the last parliament, where, as you have heard, it was declared, such a dispensation could not be; and then in what a case should they have been, if they should have distributed this declaration, which was so contrary to their own actings in parliament? What could they have answered for themselves, had they thus contributed to this declaration, when they had themselves before declared, that the king could not dispense?

And that this was no new thing, for it had been so declared in a parliament before, in two sessions of it, in the late king's reign, within a very little time one of another; and such a parliament that were so liberal in their aids to the crown, that a man would not think they should go about to deprive the crown of any of its rights. It was a parliament that did do as great services for the crown as ever any did, and therefore there is no reason to suspect, that if the king had had such a power, they would have appeared so earnest against it.

But, my lord, if your lordship pleases, these are not the beginnings of this matter; for we have shewed you from the fifteenth of Richard the second, that there was a power granted by the parliament to the king to dispense with a particular act of parliament, which argues, that it could not be without an act of parliament: and in 1662, it is said expressly, that they could not be dispensed with but by an act of parliament. It is said so again in 1672. The king was then pleased to assume to himself such a power as is pretended to in this declaration; yet upon information from his houses of parliament, the king declared himself satisfied that he had no such power, cancelled his declaration, and promised that it should not be drawn into consequence or example. And so the Commons, by their protestation, said in Richard the second's time, that it was a novelty, and should not be drawn into consequence or example.

Now, my lord, if your lordship pleases, if this matter that was commanded the bishops to do, were something which the law did not allow of, surely then my lords the bishops had all the reason in the world to apply themselves to the king, in an humble manner to acquaint him why they could not obey his commands; and to seek relief against that which lay so heavy upon them.

Truly, my lord, Mr. Attorney was very right in the opening of the cause at first, that is, That the government ought not to receive affronts, no, nor the inferior officers are not to be affronted; a justice of the peace, so low a man in office, is not. For a man to say to a justice of peace, when he is executing his office, that he does not right in it, is a great crime, and Mr. Attorney said right in it: but suppose a justice of peace were making of a warrant to a constable, to do something that was not legal for him to do, if the constable should petition this justice of the peace, and therein set forth, Sir, you are about to command me to do a thing which, I conceive, is not legal; surely that would not be a crime that he was to be punished for: for he does but seek relief, and shew his grievance in a proper way, and the distress he is under.

My lord, this is the bishops' case, with submission; they are under a distress, being commanded to do a thing which they take not to be legal, and they with all humility, by way of petition, acquaint the king with this distress of theirs, and pray him, that he will please to give relief.

My lord, there is no law but is either an act of parliament, or the common law; for an act of parliament there is none for such a power; all that we have of it in parliamentary proceedings, is against it; and for the common law, so far as I have read it, I never did meet with any thing of such a nature, as a grant or dispensation that pretended to dispense with any one whole act of parliament; I have not so much as heard of any such thing mentioned by any of the king's counsel; but here, my lord, is a dispensation that dispenses with a great many laws at once, truly I cannot take upon me to tell how many, there may be forty or above, for aught I know.

Therefore, my lord, the bishops lying under such a grievance as this, and under such a pressure, being ordered to distribute this declaration in all their churches, which was to tell the people they ought to be under no law in this case, which surely was a very great pressure, both in point of law and conscience too, they lying under such obligations to the contrary, as they did; with submission to your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, if they did deliver this petition (publishing of it I will not talk of, for there has been no proof of a publication, but a delivering of a petition to his majesty in the most secret and decent manner that could be imagined), my lords the bishops are not guilty of the matter charged upon them in this information. It has been expressly proved, that they did not go to disperse it abroad, but only delivered it to the king himself: and, in short, my lord, if this should be a libel, I know not how sad the condition of us all would be, if we may not petition when we suffer.

Mr. Finch. My lord, I challenge them to shew us any one instance of such a declaration, such a general dispensation of laws, from the conquest till 1672. The first umbrage of such a thing is that of Car. 2, 1662; but your lordship hears the declaration of the parliament upon it. Before that, as there was no such thing, so your lordship sees what the parliament did to enable the king (not to do this thing, but something like it) in Richard the second's time, where you see the parliament did give the king a power to dispense with the statute of provisors for a time; but at the same time declared that very grant of their own to be a novelty, and that it should not be drawn into consequence or example.

My lord, we shall leave it upon this point; to suspend law is all one as to abrogate laws; for so long as a law is suspended, whether the suspension be temporary, or whether it be for ever; whether it be at once, or at several times, the law is abrogated to all intents and purposes: but the abrogation of laws is part of the legislature, that legislative power is lodged (as I said before, and I could never find it otherwise in all our law) in Kings, Lord, and Commons.

L. C. J. You did open that before, Mr. Finch.

Mr. Finch. With this, my lord, that my lords the bishops finding this order made upon them to publish this declaration, did what in duty they were bound to do; and unless the jury do find, that they have done that which is contrary to law, and to the duty of their places, and that this petition is a libel and a seditious libel, with an intent to stir up sedition among the people (we rely upon it), my lords the bishops can never be found guilty upon this information.

L. C. J. Have you now done, gentlemen?

Mr. Finch. Yes, my lord, till they give us further occasion: if they have any other evidence to offer, we must answer it; if not, this is the answer we give to what they have said.

Sol. Gen. We make no bargain with you: if you have done, say so.

L. C. J. You must know, that you are not to have the last word.

Sol. Gen. You have been three hours already, if you have any more to say, pray conclude.

Mr. Finch. If they say they have no more evidence, then we know what we have to do.

L. C. J. If you do say any thing more, pray let me advise you one thing; don't say the same thing over and over again; for after so much time spent, it is irksome to all company as well as to me.

Mr. Finch. My lord, we have no more evidence to offer to your lordship at present, unless they, by offering new evidence, give us occasion to reply upon them.

L. C. J. Gentlemen, you shall have all the legal favour and advantage that can be; but pray let us keep to an orderly decent method of proceeding.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray, my lord, favour me a word before we conclude. My lord, I do find very few attempts of this nature in any king's reign. In the reign of Henry the 4th, there was an act of parliament that foreigners should have a free trade in the city of London, notwithstanding the franchises of London: after the parliament rose, the king issued out his proclamation, forbidding the execution of that law, and commanding that it should be in suspense, 'usque ad proximum Parliamentum'; yet that was to be held against law.

L. C. J. Sir Robert Sawyer, that which you are to look to, is the publishing of this paper, and whether it be a libel or no. And as to the business of the parliament you mentioned, that is not to the purpose.

Sir R. Sawyer. My lord, I say, I would put it where the question truly lies; if they don't dispute the point, then we need not labour it; but I don't know whether they will or no, and therefore I beg your lordship's favour to mention one case more, and that is upon the statute of 31 Hen. 8. cap. 8. which enables the king by proclamation, in many cases, to create the law; which statute was repealed by 1 Edw. 6. cap. 12. That very act does recite, that the law is not to be altered, or restrained, but by act of parliament; and therefore the parliament enables the king to do so and so: but that was such a power, that the parliament thought not fit to continue, and it was afterwards repealed; but it shews, that at that time the parliament was of the same opinion, as to this matter, that other parliaments have been since.

Mr. Sommers. My lord, I would only mention the great case of Thomas and Sorrel in the Exchequer-chamber, upon the validity of a dispensation of the statute of Edward the 6th, touching selling of wine. There it was the opinion of every one of the judges, and they did lay it down as a settled position, that there never could be an abrogation, or a suspension (which is a temporary abrogation) of an act of parliament, but by the legislative power. That was a foundation laid down quite through the debate of that case. Indeed it was disputed, how far the king might dispense with the penalties in such a particular law, as to particular persons; but it was agreed by all, that the king had no power to suspend any law: and, my lord, I dare appeal to Mr. Attorney General himself, whether, in the case of Godden and Hales, which was lately in this court, to make good that dispensation, he did not use it as an argument then, that it could not be expounded into a suspension: he admitted it not to be in the king's power to suspend a law, but that he might give a dispensation to a particular person, was all that he took upon to justify him at that time.

My lord, by the law of all civilized nations, if the prince does require something to be done, which the person who is to do it takes it to be unlawful, it is not only lawful, but his duty, rescribere principi. This is all that is done here, and that in the most humble manner that could be thought of. Your lordship will please to observe how far it went, how careful they were that they might not any way justly offend the king; they did not interpose by giving advice, as peers; they never stirred till it was brought home to themselves. When they made their petition, all they beg is, that it may not so far be insisted upon by his majesty, as to oblige them to read it. Whatever they thought of it, they do not take upon them to desire the declaration to be revoked.

My lord, as to matters of fact alledged in the said petition, that they are perfectly true, we have shewn by the journals of both houses. In every one of those years which are mentioned in the petition, this power of dispensation was considered in parliament, and, upon debate, declared to be contrary to law: there could be no design to diminish the prerogative, because the king hath no such prerogative. Seditious, my lord, it could not be, nor could possibly stir up sedition in the minds of the people, because it was presented to the king in private and alone: false it could not be, because the matter of it is true: there could be nothing of malice, for the occasion was not sought: the thing was pressed upon them; and a libel it could not be, because the intent was innocent, and they kept within the bounds set by the act of parliament, that gives the subject leave to apply to his prince by petition, when he is aggrieved.

Att. Gen. Have you done, gentlemen?

Mr. Finch. We have done, Sir.

Att. Gen. My lord, I shall be a great deal more merciful to your lordship and the jury than they have been, who have spent these four hours in that which I think is not pertinent to the case in question: they have let themselves into large discourses, making great complaints of the hardships put upon my lords the bishops, by the order of council, to read his majesty's declaration; and putting these words into the information of seditious, malicious, and scandalous: but, my lord, I admire that sir Robert Sawyer should make such reflections and observations upon these words, when I am sure he will scarce find any one of his own exhibiting, that has so few of those aggravating words as this has; and therefore that might have been very well spared, especially by him.

In the next place, my lord, we are told what great danger our religion is in by this declaration: I hope we have an equal concern for that with them, or any person else whatsoever. But, however, I am sure our religion teaches us, not to preserve our religion, or our lives, by any illegal courses; and the question is, whether the course that my lords the bishops have taken to preserve, as they say, our religion, be legal or not? If it be not legal, then I am sure our religion will not justify the using such a course for never so good an end.

My lord, for the thing itself, I do admire that they, in so long a time and search that they have made, should not, which I expected, produce more precedents of such a paper as this is. They challenge us to shew, that ever there was any such declaration as this: I'll turn the same challenge upon them. Shew me any one instance, that ever so many bishops did come, under pretence of a petition, to reflect upon the king out of parliament.

Sir R. Sawyer. Is that your way of answering, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. Pray, sir Robert Sawyer, you have had your time, don't interrupt us; sure we have as much right to be heard as you.

L. C. J. You have been heard over and over again, sir Robert Sawyer, already.

Sir R. Sawyer. My lord, I don't intend to interrupt him.

Sol. Gen. We cannot make them be quiet, they will still be chopping in upon us.

Att. Gen. That is an art that some people have always practised, not to permit any body to speak but themselves.

But, my lord, I say, that those few instances that they have produced, are nothing at all to this matter that is now upon trial before your lordship and this jury; nay, there are evidences against them; for they are only matters transacted in parliament, which are no more to be applied to this thing that is in controversy now, than any the most remote matter that could be thought of; and though they have gone so high in point of time, as to the reign of Richard the second, yet they have nothing between that and the late king's reign, to which they at last have descended down.

But, my lord, I say that all the talk of Richard the second's time is wholly out of the case: truly, I do not doubt but in Richard the second's time they may find a great many instances of some such sort of petitioning as this; for our histories tell us, that at that time they had 40,000 men in arms against the king; and we know the troubles that were in that king's reign, and how at length he was deposed: but certainly there may be found instances more applicable to the case, than those they produce. As for those in king Charles the 2nd's time, do they any ways justify this petition? For now they are upon justifying the words of their pe-tion, that this power has been declared to be illegal in 1662, 1672, and 1685.

For what was done in 1662? do they shew any thing more than some debates in the House of Commons, and at last an address, an answer by the king, a reply of the Commons, and then the thing dies? Pray, my lord, is a transaction in the House of Commons, a declaration of parliament? Sure, I think, no one will affirm that any thing can be a declaration of parliament, unless he that is the principal part concurs, who is the king: for if you speak of the court of parliament in a legal sense, you must speak of the whole body, king, lords and commons, and a declaration in parliament must be by all the whole body; and this is properly an act of parliament.

Why then they come to the year 1672, where your lordship observes, that the late king did insist upon his right; for after the dispute, which was in 1662, his majesty did issue out another declaration, and when it comes to be debated in parliament, he insists upon his right in ecclesiastical matters; and though his declaration was cancelled, yet there is no formal disclaimer of the right.

My lord, after all, how far these things that they have offered may work as to the point that they have debated, I shall not now meddle with it, nor give your lordship any trouble about it, because it is not at all pertinent to the case in question; for I do (after all this time and pains that they have spent) take leave to say, that these gentlemen have spent all this time to no purpose.

L. C. J. Yes, Mr. Attorney, I'll tell you what they offer, which it will lie upon you to give an answer to; they would have you shew how this has disturbed the government, or diminished the king's authority.

Att. Gen. Whether a libel be true or not, as to the matter of fact, was it ever yet in any court of justice permitted to be made a question whether it be a libel or not? or whether a party be punishable for it? And therefore I wonder to hear these gentlemen to say, that because it is not a false one, therefore it is not a libel. Suppose a man should speak scandalous matter of any noble lord here, or of any of my lords the bishops, and a scandalum magnatum be brought for it, though that which is spoken has been true, yet it has been the opinion of the courts of law, that the party cannot justify it, by reason it tends the disturbing of the peace, to publish any thing that is matter of scandal: the only thing that is to be looked into, is, whether there be any thing in this paper that is reflecting and scandalous, and not whether it be true or no? for if any man shall extra-judicially, and out of a legal course and way, reflect upon any of the great officers of the kingdom, nay, if it be put upon any inferior magistrate, he is to be punished and is not to make his complaint against them, unless he do it in a proper way. A man may petition a judge; but if any man in that petition shall come and tell the judge, sir, you have given an illegal judgment against me, and I cannot in honour, prudence, or conscience obey it; I do not doubt, nor will any man, but that he that should so say, would be laid by the heels, though the judgment perhaps might be illegal.

If a man shall come to petition the king, as we all know, the council-doors are thronged with petitioners every day, and access to the king by petition is open to every body, the most inferior person is allowed to petition the king; but because he may do so, may he therefore suggest what he pleases in his petition? Shall he come and tell the king to his face, what he does is illegal? I only speak this, because they say, in this case his majesty gave them leave to come to him to deliver their petition; but the king did not understand the nature of their petition, I suppose, when he said, he gave them leave to come to him.

My lord, for this matter we have authority enough in our books; particularly there is the case of Wrenham [Wraynham, see vol. 2, p. 1059.] in my lord Hobart. The lord chancellor had made a decree against him, and he petitioned the king that the cause might be re-heard; and in that petition he complains of injustice done him by my lord chancellor, and he put into his petition many reflecting things. This, my lord, was punished as a libel in the star-chamber; and in that book it was said, though it be lawful for the subject to petition the king against any proceedings by the judges, yet it must not be done with reflections, nor with words that turn to the accusation or scandal of any of the king's magistrates or officers, and the justice of the decree is not to be questioned in the case; for there Wrenham, in his defence, would have opened the particulars wherein he thought the decree was unjust, but that the court would not meddle with, nor would allow him to justify for such illegality in the decree: so in this case, you are not to draw in question the truth or falshood of the matter complained against; for you must take the way the law has prescribed, and prosecute your right in a legal course, and not by scandal and libelling.

My lord, there is a great deal of difference between not doing a thing that is commanded, if one be of opinion that it is unlawful, and coming to the king with a petition highly reflecting upon the government, and with scandalous expressions telling him, Sir, you act illegally; you require of us that which is against prudence, honour, or conscience, as my lords the bishops are pleased to do in this petition of theirs. I appeal to any lord here, that if any man should give him such language, either by word of mouth or petition, whether he would bear it, without seeking satisfaction or reparation by the law.

My lord, there is no greater proof of the influence of this matter than the crowd of this day, and the harangue that hath been made: is it not apparent that the taking this liberty to canvass and dispute the king's power and authority, and to censure his actions, possesses the people with strange opinions, and raises discontent and jealousies, as if the free course of law were restrained, and arbitrary will and pleasure set up instead of it?

My lord, there is one thing that appears upon the face of the information, which shews this not to be the right course; and if my lords the bishops had given themselves the opportunity of reading the declaration seriously, they would have found in the end of the declaration, that the king was resolved to call a parliament in November. Might not my lords the bishops have acquiesced under their passive obedience till the parliament met? But nothing would serve them but this, and this must be done out of parliament, for which there is no precedent can be shewn, and this must be done in such a manner as your lordship sees the consequence of, by your trouble of this day.

There is one thing I forgot to speak to: they tell us, that it is laid malicious and seditious, and there is no malice or sedition found; we know very well that that follows the fact, those things arise by construction of law out of the fact. If the thing be illegal, the law says it is seditious; a man shall not come and say, he meant no harm in it; that was the case of Williams: * in his treasonable book, says he, I only intended to warn the king of the danger approaching, and concludes his book with God save the king; but no man will say, that a good preface at the beginning, or a good prayer at the end, should excuse treason or sedition in the body of a book. If I meet another man in the street and kill him, though I never saw him in my life, the indictment is, that it was 'ex malitia præcogitata,' as it often happens that a person kills one he never had acquaintance with before; and in favorem vitæ, if the nature of the fact be so, the jury are permitted to find according to the nature of the case; but in strictness of law there is malice implied: but, my lord, I think these matters are so common, and that is a point that has been so often settled, that the form of the indictment and information must follow the nature of the fact, that I need not insist upon it; if the act be unlawful, the law supplies the malice and evil intentions.

Sol. Gen. My lord, and gentlemen of the jury, I am of counsel in this case for the king, and I shall take leave to proceed in this method: first, I shall put the case of my lords the bishops, and then consider the arguments that have been used in their defence, and answer as much as is material to be answered; and then leave it to your lordship, and the jury's consideration, whether what has been said by these gentlemen, weigh any thing in this case.

First, my lord, I take it for granted, and I think the matter is pretty plain by this time, by my lord president's evidence, and their own confession, that it is not to be disputed, but that this paper was presented by some of my lords the bishops to the king; I think there is no great difficulty in that matter; I just touch upon it, because I would follow them in their own method.*

* In sir William Williams's MSS. much of what follows is so materially altered that I have thought it best to print it here from those MSS.

Then, my lord, let us take this case as it is, upon the nature of the petition, and the evidence that they have given. Consider, then, whether it will justify all that is done: for the business of petitioning, I would distinguish between petitioning in parliament and petitioning out of parliament to the king, and inquire whether my lords the bishops out of parliament can present any petition to the king, and of what nature, if any? I do agree, that in parliament the lords and commons may petition or make addresses to the king, and signify their desires, and make known their grievances, and there is no doubt but that is the proper and natural way of application from the subjects to his majesty. In the beginning of the parliament, there are anciently receivers and triers of petitions appointed by the houses of parliament; and upon debates in parliament, there are committees frequently appointed to prepare and frame petitions and addresses to the king, as occasions require; but to deduce an argument from these proceedings, that because the lords in parliament have done thus, and the commons in parliament have done thus, therefore my lords the bishops may do it out of parliament, is no consequence; no such conclusion can be drawn from those premises. This I offer as an answer to their evidence and arguments in defence of this petition, from their parliamentary records and proceedings.

Pray, my lord, consider what evidence they have given, and how material it is in this case for their defence: they begun with that record in Richard 2d's time, which is no more than that the king might dispense with the statute of Provisoers till the meeting of the then next parliament, and a protestation of the commons at the end of it. Whether that be an act of parliament that is declaratory of the common law, or introductory of a new law non constat, and for aught appears, it might be a declaratory act; and if so, then it is rather an evidence of the king's prerogative of dispensing. It might be an act in affirmance of the king's prerogative; as there are a great many such acts we very well know, and generally most of the laws in that kind are in affirmance of the king's power. That act then turns as some argument for the king's prerogative, and then their own evidence will turn upon themselves, for they shew Richard 2. had that power, but whether that be an argument one way or other conclusive, is left to your lordship and the jury to consider.

They say there is no execution of such a power till very lately, and the first instance

* See it in this Collection, vol. 3, p. 770.

Then, my lord, let us take this case as it is, upon the nature of the petition, and the evidence that they have given, and then consider whether it will justify all that is done: for the business of petitioning, I would distinguish and inquire, whether my lords the bishops out of that they produce is that in the year 1662. I do not take the exercise of power to be a proof of the right of it. Your lordship knows that before the reign of Henry the 4th, there was a large jurisdiction assumed by the lords in original causes till the Statute of Appeals, 1mo. Hen. 4, which takes notice that before that time the lords had assumed an original jurisdiction in all causes, and would proceed and determine them before themselves in parliament. And it fell out to be so great a grievance, that it was thought necessary to make a law against it, that appeals in parliament should be abolished and destroyed; then did the Statute of Appeals, a mighty law in favour of the subject of England, and the resolutions upon that statute, settle the bounds between the king and the lords in a great measure; before that time, the lords were grown very powerful, and where there is power there always follow applications. Since that statute, accusations are [qu. not] allowed to be before the lords in parliament, unless it be by impeachment of the commons, there is the benefit of that statute. It did abolish much of the power the lords had before assumed to themselves, and did establish the impeachment of the commons, which is as ancient as the parliament, for that was never yet spoken against; the power of the commons of impeaching any person in parliament under the degree of the prince, and that is the regular legal way, and this the commons have often asserted to be their ancient right. This is the proper course and way to address and apply to the king; that is the proper way and course to redress grievances. This, I conceive, had been the course that should have been taken by my lords the bishops; they should have staid to apply to the king till the complaint had come into parliament, and then it had been regular for them to address the king in a parliamentary way what was fit and proper perhaps to come upon the complaint by the impeachment of the commons; they interpose and give their advice before their time; if there be any irregularity in parliament or out of parliament, the lords and commons are to make their complaint of it, and have it redressed in parliament, and a man is not to be his own judge in any case, nor must all men create difficulties of their own, nor set upon petitioning in this sort; I neither do know of any precedent, ancient or modern, for petitioning by the lords the bishops to the king out of parliament in this sort; neither do I find that my lords the bishops, or their counsel, have produced any precedents; but it is said for my lords the bishops that were under an anathema, or some curse, that sir Robert Sawyer speaks of by the first of Elizabeth, and parliament can present any petition to the king? I do agree, that in parliament the lords and commons may make addresses to the king, and signify their desires, and make known their grievances there; and there is no doubt but that is a natural and proper way of appli-for fear of that they pursued this course; but my lords know, better fall into the hands of God than of men: I leave this to the casuists to consider, rather than trouble the court with it. I pass this over as a new fancy of their own, and to have no weight in a court of law.

My lord, the law continued thus, and was frequently practised for the punishment of high misdemeanors by impeachment in parliament, from 1 H. 4, till 3 H. 7, which doth establish the court of Star-Chamber, for the punishment of exorbitant crimes in the intervals of parliament, and in that court great men were often brought to judgment and punishment for their high misdemeanors; and though very great power was given that court, and the greatest officers of the kingdom, assisted with lords spiritual and temporal, who were made judges of that court, yet they arrogated to themselves a greater power and jurisdiction than the law gave them, whereby the very court grew grievous to the subject, and was therefore abolished by the statute of 7 Car. 1; and one of the reasons expressed in the statute for taking away of that court is, because the matters examinable and determinable in that court, may have their proper remedy, redress, and due punishment in the ordinary methods and course of justice. So that upon those two considerations, because that court became exorbitant, and because all misdemeanors that were punishable there might be punished in the ordinary courts of justice, that court was dissolved and taken away. As the statute of H. 4, multiplied impeachments in parliament by taking away the power and judicature assumed by the lords out of parliament to determine crimes out of parliament, or otherwise than by impeachment, so did the court of Star-Chamber, from 3 Hen. 7, to 17 Car. 1, lessen impeachments in parliament.

My lord, they find fault with the words of the information, and they say, Why are these words put in 'seditiose malitiose.' If the matter complained of in the information be libellous and seditious, we may lawfully suggest in the information, this was done 'seditiose;' and 'tis no more than the law speaks, it results out of the matter itself, and if it be a libellous paper, the law says it is maliciously and seditiously done; and those gentlemen need not quarrel with us, for so are all the informations for misdemeanours in all times: and 'tis no more than the 'vi et armis' inserted in informations where there is no actual 'vi et armis' done. 'Vi et armis,' that is, only a supposition of law, and they may as well object to the conclusion of the information, why it concludes 'contra coronam et dignitatem domini regis.'

cation: for in the beginning of the parliament, there are receivers of petitions appointed, and upon debates, there are committees appointed to draw up petitions and addresses; but to come and deduce an argument, that because the lords in parliament have done thus (there

If it be an illegal thing, as a libel, these are necessary consequences and results out of the subject matter of the information; it is no more than the speaking of the law upon the fact alleged.

But, my lord, let us a little consider whether this matter were warrantable, and whether my lords the bishops had any warrant or call to do what was done. They pretend it was done upon this account: the king had set forth a declaration, and ordered them to read it: to excuse themselves from such reading, they make this petition or this libel, call it what you will, and they use this as the main argument, that they say the king has done illegally; and they tell the king plainly so, as has been often declared in parliament, and particularly in 1662, 72, and 85, in the beginning of his majesty's reign, and expose the prudence, honour and conscience of what the king has done.

Pray, my lord, let us consider a little whether there be any such declaration in parliament that they have given evidence of: have they read in evidence any declaration in parliament in 1662, or 1672, or in the beginning of his majesty's reign, tending to what is a declaration in parliament? First, a bill that was enacted by king, lords and commons, we in law know and allow such to be a declaration in parliament. If a bill pass the commons it is no declaration in parliament; nay, if it pass the lords and commons it is not a declaration in parliament, except it also pass the king and have the royal assent; all these are only in fieri, and pass as nullities, and the law takes no notice of them. We have it in our books over and over, and no court ought to suffer any such evidence to be given, though received this day. I know those gentlemen are very well acquainted with the authorities in Fitzherbert tit. Parliament. There was said an act to be passed by the king and the lords, but because the commons did not agree to it, it is declared and adjudged to be as a nullity, and the court would take no notice of it; and how can any man call that a declaration in parliament which is only a vote of the house of commons, or of the lords: such only is the evidence given this day of declarations in parliament, to justify this petition.

My lord, there is another declaration in parliament, and so owned and allowed, as a judgment given by the lords as they are a court of judicature in parliament, and that is a declaration also in parliament; for if any matter comes judicially before the lords in parliament, either by writ of error or by natural appeal from any of the other courts, or by adjournment, and there be any judgment given, that is a declaration in parliament, and may fairly, being such methods of proceedings usual in parliaments) therefore my lords the bishops may do it out of parliament, that is certainly a non sequitur, no such conclusion can be drawn from those premises.

My lord, I shall endeavour to lay the fact and ought to be so called. So likewise, there is another declaration in parliament, which is, when any matter or crime comes before the lords in parliament upon an impeachment of the commons, and they give judgment upon that impeachment, that is a declaration in parliament: but to say that there is any other declaration in parliament, is to say more than these gentlemen have made out. If they can shew me any such declaration in parliament to justify this petition, I will submit to them, and not speak a word against my lords the bishops: but if these learned gentlemen cannot shew me any such declaration, then all that is said in this petition, under favour, doth not to me appear to be true.

Let us reflect what is there in this case, upon this evidence as they offer, for a declaration in parliament. That in 1662 is only a vote and an opinion of the house of commons; and I always understood, and have been told so by some of the gentlemen of the other side, that such a vote signified nothing: if any thing, not a judgment in parliament. Besides, it seems to be a mistaken address, for they say in it, that the declaration in 1662, against which they address, was the first declaration of that sort, to suspend laws without act of parliament; and yet, in the same breath, they take notice of the king's declaration from Breda, which was before 1662. Here is a mighty argument used from the king's speech, that because he wished he had such a power, this must be declared in parliament, that he had no such power. Is the speech of the prince a declaration in parliament? Would those gentlemen allow all the speeches that were made upon the opening of the parliament to be declarations in parliament? If the king had said in his speech at the opening of that parliament what he says now in his declaration, would you let that go for a declaration in parliament? Then the chancellor's, or keeper's speech, or the lord privy seal's, must be a declaration in parliament. Whoever speaks the sense of the king by his command, if he do not speak that which was law and right, is questionable for it in parliament; and several have been impeached for so doing: for they look not upon it as the king's speech, except it be according to law. Nothing can turn upon the prince but what is legal; if it be otherwise, it turns upon him that speaks it, for the king cannot err. I never did hear that a speech made by the chancellor in parliament (and I will appeal to all the lords that hear me in it), was a declaration in parliament.

Then, my lords, we come to the evidence in 1672, which, with that in 1662 and that in Breda, shew that this of the king's is not such before you as it really is, and then consider what is proper for the court to take notice of, as legal proof or evidence: and I take it, all those precedents that they have produced of what the lords did, and what the commons did in parliament, is no warrant for them to shelter themselves under, against the information here in question.

Mr. Just. Powell. My Lord, this is strange doctrine! Shall not the subject have liberty to petition the king but in parliament? If that be law, the subject is in a miserable case.

L. C. J. Brother, let him go on, we will hear him out, though I approve not of his position.

Sol. Gen. The lords may address to the king in parliament, and the commons may do it, but therefore that the bishops may do it out of parliament, does not follow. I heard nothing said that could have given colour to such a thing, but the curse that has been read in 1 Eliz.

But pray, my lord, let us consider that evidence they have given: they have begun with that record in Richard the second's time, and what is that? That the king may dispense with the statute of provisors till the meeting of the next parliament, and a protestation of the commons at the end of it, whether that be an act of parliament that is declaratory of the common law, or introductory of a new law, non constat; and for aught appears, it might be a declaratory act; and if so, it is a proof of the king's prerogative of dispensing. It might be an act in affirmance of the king's prerogative, as there a novelty, but has been attempted sometimes before. In 1672, the king was in distress for money; being entangled in a Dutch war, and wanting supply, he capitulates with his commons, as you have heard it read in their evidence, and upon the commons address to his majesty, he asserts it to be his right, and makes his complaint to the lords how the commons had used him. Whereupon conferences did arise between the lords and commons about it; at length it all ends in a speech from the king, wherein he tells them of his present necessities, well mixed with such gracious compliances, as prevailed with the commons for a good lump of money. Will this amount to a declaration in parliament? Can my lords the bishops fancy or imagine that this is to be imposed upon the king or upon the court for a declaration in parliament?

Then last of all, for that evidence in 1685 in this king's time, what is it more than the commons make an address to the king, and complain to his majesty of some of his officers in his army, that did pretend to have a dispensation to bear offices contrary to the test act, without taking the test and oaths as the law requires, can this be called a declaration in parliament? Will all addresses made by the late parliaments be allowed to be declarations in parliament?

are a great many such, we very well know; and generally most of the laws in that kind, are in affirmance of the king's power; so that the law turns as an argument for the king's prerogative, and they have given him that which will turn upon themselves: so it stood in Richard the second's time; but whether that be an argument one way or other conclusive, is left to your lordship and the jury.

Ay, but say they, there is no execution of such a power till very lately, and the first instance that they produce is that in the year 1662. But your lordship knows, that before the reign of Henry the fourth, there was great jurisdiction assumed by the lords in original causes: then comes the statute of appeals, 1 Hen. 4, which takes notice, that before that time the lords had assumed an original jurisdiction in all causes, and would proceed and determine them in parliament and out of parliament; and it fell out to be so great a grievance, that it was thought necessary to make a law against it, that appeals in parliament should be abolished and destroyed; and then comes that law in favour of the subject of England, and that settles the bounds between the king and the Lords in a great measure. Before that time the Lords were grown very powerful, and where there is a power, there always will be applications; and what is the effect of that statute, 1 Hen. 4? For all that we endeavour is, to make things as plain as can be, that no further applications, no accusations, no proceedings in any case whatsoever be before the lords in parliament, unless it be by impeachment of the commons, so that there is the salvo; and the use that I make of it is this, the commons, by that very statute, did abolish the power that the lords had arrogated to themselves, and ordered, that they should not meddle with any cause, but upon the impeachment of the house of commons, and establish the impeachment of the commons, which is as antient as the parliament, for that was never yet spoken against, the power of the commons impeaching any person under the degree of the prince; and that is the regular legal way, and so the commons asserted their antient right, and whatsoever the lords took notice of, must come by application of the commons; then conferences were to pass between the Houses, and both Houses by address apply to the king. This is the proper way and course of parliament, of which my lord Coke says, it is known to few, and practised by fewer; but it is a venerable, honourable way: and this is the course that should have been taken by my lords here, and they should have stayed till the complaint had come from the commons in parliament, and then it had been regular for them to address the king; but they were too quick, too nimble.

And whereas the statute of Hen. 4 says, That no lord whatsoever shall intermeddle with any cause, but by the impeachment of the commons; they interpose and give their advice before their time: if there be any irregularity in parliament, or out of parliament, the commons are to make their complaint of it, and a man must not be his own judge, nor his own carver, nor must every man create difficulties of his own, nor set upon petitioning in this sort: but there I lay my foundation, that in such a matter as this, there ought to have been the impeachment of the commons in parliament before these lords could do any thing; and I know nothing can be said for the bishops more than this, that they were under an anathema, under the curse that sir Robert Sawyer speaks of; and for fear of that, they took this irregular course. But some would say, better fall into the hands of God than of men: some would say so (I say), I know not what they would say; but these being the methods that these lords should have taken, they should have pursued that method; the law should have carved out their relief and remedy for them, but they were for going by a new fancy of their own.

My lord, the law continued thus, and was practised so till 3 Hen. 7, where the grievance was found, that offences in the intervals of parliament could not be well punished, and then comes the statute that sets up the court of Star-Chamber, and there men were often brought to judgment and punishment for their sins; and though very great power was given them, yet they arrogated to themselves a greater; and therefore that court is abolished by the statute of 15 Car. 1; and what is the reason of abolishing that statute? Because the Star-Chamber did not keep within their bounds that the law set them, but assumed to themselves a larger power than the law would allow, and grew very exorbitant and very grievous to the subject: and another reason was, which the statute of 15 Car. 1. founded itself upon, because there was nothing that was brought in judgment before that court, but might be relieved and remedied in the ordinary methods of justice in the courts of Westminster-Hall: so that upon those two considerations, because that court was exorbitant, and because all the sins and misdemeanors that were punished there, might be punished in an ordinary way of law in another court, and therefore there was no need of that court, and so it was abolished, and the subject was pretty safe. If there was a crime committed here, a man might come properly before your lordship into this court, and have it punished.

My lord, they find fault with the words in the information, and they say, Why are these words put in, seditious, malicious? If the matter be libellous and seditious, we may lawfully say, and it is no more than the law speaks, it results out of the matter itself; and, if it be a libellous paper, the law says, it is maliciously and seditiously done; and these gentlemen need not quarrel with us, for so are all the informations in all times past, and it is no more than the 'vi et armis,' which is common form. It may be said, How can the publishing of a libel be said to be done 'vi et armis?'

That is only a supposition of law, and they may as well object to the conclusion of the information, that it was 'contra coronam et dignitatem domini regis.' If it be an illegal thing, or a libel, these are necessary consequences; it is no more than the speaking of the law upon the fact.

But, my lord, let us a little consider, whether this matter were warrantable, and whether they had any warrant to do what was done. They pretend it was done upon this account, That the king had set forth a declaration, and had ordered them to read it; which to excuse themselves from, they make this petition, or this libel (call it what you will), and they use this as the main argument, That they say the king has done illegally, and they tell the king plainly so, that it is illegal; for they take notice of this declaration, and say, it is illegal, because it is contrary to the declarations of parliament in 1662, 1672, and 1685.

Pray, my lord, let us consider a little, whether there be any declaration in parliament that they have given evidence of? Have they read any declaration of the parliament in 1662? What is a declaration in parliament, but a bill that is passed by the king, lords, and commons? That we know to be the meaning, and no other. If it pass the commons, it is no declaration in parliament; nay, if it pass the lords and commons, it is not a declaration in parliament, except it also pass the king. All these things are nullities, and the law takes no notice of them: we have it in our books over and over, and no court ought to suffer such evidence to be given. I know these gentlemen are very well acquainted with the authority in Fitzherbert, title, Parliament. There was such an act that was said to be by the king and the lords; but because the commons did not agree to it, it is declared and adjudged to be a nullity, and the court would take no notice of it; and how can any man call that a declaration in parliament, which is only a vote of the house of commons, or of the lords? No, sure, that is one of the heads I go upon; it is not a declaration in parliament, unless it be by an act of parliament.

Indeed, my lord, there is another sort of a declaration in parliament before the lords, as they are a court of judicature, and that is a fair declaration too; for if any thing comes judicially before the lords, either by writ of error, or by natural appeal from any of the other courts, or by adjournment, and there be any judgment given, that is a declaration in parliament, and may be fairly so called. So likewise there is another judicial declaration, which is, when any thing comes before the lords judicially, upon an impeachment of the commons, and they give judgment upon that impeachment, that is a declaration in parliament. But to say that there is any other declaration in parliament, is to say more than these gentlemen can make out. If they will shew me any such, I will submit to them, and not speak a word against my lords the bishops; but if these learned gentlemen cannot shew me any such, then they have not said what was true in this petition, that it was so and so declared in parliament.

For let us consider what there is in this case upon this evidence; for that in 1662, is only a vote and opinion of the house of commons; and I always understood, and have been told so by some of the gentlemen of the other side, that such a vote signifies nothing: but besides, it seems to be a mistaken address, for they say in it, that the declaration in 1662, which they address against, was the first declaration of that sort to suspend laws without act of parliament; and yet in the same breath, they do take notice of the king's declaration from Breda. But here is a mighty argument used from the king's speech, that because he wished he had such a power, this must be declared in parliament that he had no such power. Is the speech of the prince a declaration to parliament? All the speeches that were made upon the opening of the parliament, will you say they are declarations in parliament? Then the chancellor, or the keeper's speech, or the lord privy seal's, must be a declaration in parliament. Whoever speaks the sense of the king, if he does not speak that which is law and right, is questionable for it, and several have been impeached for so doing; for they look not upon it as the king's speech, except it be according to law. Nothing can turn upon the prince but what is legal; if it be otherwise, it turns upon him that speaks it. I never did hear that a speech made by the chancellor (and I will appeal to all the lords that hear me in it) was a declaration in parliament.

Then, my lord, we come to the business in 1672, which, with that in 1662, and that in Breda, shews, that this of the king's is not such a novelty, but has been done often before. In 1672, the king was in distress for money, being entangled in a Dutch war, and wanted supply: he capitulates with his commons (you have heard it read), and, upon the commons address, he asserts it to be his right, and makes his complaint to the lords how the commons had used him; for when he gives them a fair answer, they replied, and there are conferences with the lords about it; but at length it all ends in a speech by the king, who comes and tells them of his present necessities, and so he was minded to remit a little at the instigation of the commons, and he has a good lump of money for it. Would this amount to a declaration in parliament? Can my lords the bishops fancy or imagine that this is to be imposed upon the king, or upon the court, for a declaration in parliament?

Then last of all, for that in 1685, in this king's time, what is it? The commons make an address to the king, and complain to his majesty of some of his officers in his army,*

* Here Mr. Justice Powell speaking to the Lord Chief Justice.

Mr. Just. Powell. My Lord, this is wide, that might pretend to have a dispensation, something of that nature contrary to the Test Act; and what is done upon it? They make their application to the king, and the king answers them, and that is all: but since it is spoken of in the court, I would take notice that it is very well known by the case of Godding and Hales, the judgment of the court was against the opinion of that address.

But what sort of evidence is all this? Would you allow all the addresses of the House of Commons to be evidence? Give me leave to say it, my lord, if you suffer these votes, these copies of imperfect bills, these addresses and applications of one or both houses of parliament to the king, to be evidence of declarations in parliament, then what will or may be said of the * Bill of Exclusion? Shall any body assert or mention that Bill of Exclusion to be a declaration in parliament? If so, then there is declaration against declaration; the declaration of the commons against the declaration of the lords. I know not of what judgment my lords the bishops may now be concerning those things, especially votes, addresses and speeches, and bills which passed the commons in parliament, and their being declarations in parliament, but I am sure they have spoken against it heretofore; nay, I am sure some of them have preached against it.

And if my lords the bishops have said, these are declarations in parliament, and they are not declarations in parliament; and if they accuse the king of having done an illegal thing, because he has done that which has been declared in parliament to be illegal, when it was never so declared, then the consequence is very plain, that they are sometimes in some things mistaken, and I suppose by this time they believe it.

I dare say it will not be denied me, that the king may, by his prerogative royal, issue forth his proclamation; it is as essential a prerogative as it is to give his assent to an act of parliament to make it a law. And it is another principle, which I think cannot be denied, that the king may make constitutions and orders in matters ecclesiastical; and that these he may make out of parliament, and without the parliament. If the king may do so, and these are his prerogatives, then suppose the king do issue forth his royal proclamation (and such in effect is this declaration under the great seal) in a matter ecclesiastical, by virtue of his prerogative royal; and this declaration is read in the council, and published to the world, and then

Mr. Solicitor would impose upon us: let him make it out if he can, that the king has such a power, and answer the objections made by the defendants' counsel.

L. C. J. Brother, impose upon us! He shall not impose upon me; I know not what he may upon you; for my part, I do not believe one word he says.

* Here there was a great hissing. [See what passed at the end of the Trial.]

the bishops come and tell the king, Sir, you have issued out an illegal proclamation or declaration, being contrary to what has been declared in parliament; is not this a diminishing the king's power and prerogative in issuing forth his proclamation or declaration, and making constitutions in matters ecclesiastical? Is not this a questioning of his prerogative? Do not my lords the bishops in this case raise a question between the king and the people? Do not they, as much as in them lies, stir up the people to sedition? For who shall be judge between the king and the bishops? Says the king, I have such a power and prerogative to issue forth my royal proclamation, and to make orders and constitutions in matters ecclesiastical, and that without the parliament, and out of parliament. Say my lords the bishops, you have done so, but you have no warrant for it. Says the king, every prince has done it, and I have done no more than what is my prerogative to do. But this, say the bishops, is against law. How shall this be tried? Should not the bishops have had the patience to have waited till a parliament came and complained there, and sought redress. The question in this case is not whether the king may dispense with the law, but whether he may issue out his proclamation in matters ecclesiastical. Sir W. W.'s MS. when the king himself tells them, he would have a parliament in November next at furthest.

L. C. J. Pray, Mr. Solicitor, come close to the business, for it is very late.

Sol. Gen. My lord, I beg your patience; you have had a great deal of patience with them, pray spare me a little. I am saying, when the king himself tells them, that he would have a parliament in November at furthest,* yet they have no patience to stay till November, [at which time this power of dispensing with the law might very properly and naturally be examined and redressed, but my lords the bishops, MS.] make this application to him [himself complaining to himself against himself, by accusing him of an illegal procedure, MS.]. Is not this raising a question upon the king's prerogative in issuing forth declarations? and upon the king's power and right in matters ecclesiastical? And when I have said this, that my lords the bishops have so done, if it be true that they have raised a question upon the right of the king, and the power of the king in matters ecclesiastical, then they have stirred [to which they make themselves a party, doth not this tend to stir, MS.] up sedition. That they have so done is pretty plain: and for the consequence of it time will shew it. I shall appeal to the case in 2 Cro. 2 Jac. 1. That is a plain direct authority for me.

Just. Powell. Nay, Mr. Solicitor, we all very well know, to deny the king's authority in temporals and spirituals, as by act of parliament, is high treason.

Sol. Gen. I carry it not so far, Sir. We have a gracious prince, and my lords the bishops find it so by this prosecution: but what says that case? It is printed in three books, in Noy 100, in Moor 375, and in Mr. Just. Cro. 371: what says that case? The king may make orders and constitutions in matters ecclesiastical.

Just. Powell. But how will you apply that case to this in hand, Mr. Solicitor?

*Sol. Gen. I will apply it by and bye, Sir; I would first shew what it is: there is a convention of the greatest men in the kingdom.

Just. Powell. Indeed, Mr. Solicitor, you shoot at rovers.

Sol. Gen. There is the lord privy seal, the archbishop of Canterbury, and a great many others: it is the greatest assembly we meet with in our books, and all of them are of this opinion, that the king may make orders and constitutions in matters ecclesiastical.

My lord, there is another authority, and that is, from the statute 1 Eliz. which † erected the high commission court, and that statute was not introductory of a new law, but declaratory of the old law. The king by his proclamation declares his sense to do such and such a thing; the court and all persons there give their judgment and opinion upon that statute, that they looked upon it as the grossest thing, and the foulest affront to the prince, for any man to bring into question that power of the king in matters ecclesiastical: 'tis said to be a very high crime. Why then, my lord, what is done in this case?

Just. Powell. Mr. Solicitor, pray, when you are applying, apply that other part of the case too, which says, that it was a heinous offence to raise a rumour that the king did intend to grant a general toleration; and is there any law since that has changed it, Mr. Solicitor?

Sol. Gen. In the main, judgment goes another way. As for that part, it was personal to the prince that then was, of whom they had

* The case will apply itself when you have considered it. Upon hearing of that solemn case, there was a convention of the highest officers and greatest men in the kingdom to judge of it. Sir W. W.'s MS.

† In the MS. the remainder of this speech is thus given: "appointed commissioners to be made by the queen to hear matters ecclesiastical, and that statute was not introductory of a new law but declaratory of the common law, and the divulging of that ordinance by the queen's proclamation was held a gracious admonition. The court and all persons there delegated declare their judgment, that it was an high affront to the prince for any man to bring into question the power of the king in matters ecclesiastical: it is said there to be a very high crime: without farther incroaching upon your patience, I refer your lordship to the case at large, reported in those books."

* There is no reason to believe that James, when he said this, had the slightest intention of calling a parliament.

scandalously reported, that he intended to introduce popery. They looked upon this report as a scandal to king James, that it was a sowing of sedition, and stirring up people against the government, and that will come up to our case, I think, without particular application: for as some men do it on the right side, others do it on the left; and whoever he be that endeavours to bring a dislike of the king or government upon the people, may be said to be a mover of sedition against the prince; but that case, in some parts of it, I take to be personal to the prince himself, and does not go to his successors.

Now, my lord, I come to that which is very plain from the case of De Libellis Famosis, in lord Coke's Reports: if any person have slandered the government in writing, you are to examine the truth of that fact in such writing, but the slander which it imports to the king or government; and be it never so true, yet if slanderous to the king or the government, it is a libel, and to be punished: in that case, the right or wrong is not to be examined, or if what was done by the government be legal or no; but whether the party have done such an act. If the king have a power (for still I keep to that) to issue forth proclamations to his subjects, and to make orders and constitutions in matters ecclesiastical, if he do issue forth his proclamation, and make an order upon the matters within his power and prerogative; and if any one would come and bring that power in question otherwise than in parliament, that the matter of that proclamation be not legal, I say that is sedition, and you are not to examine the legality or illegality of the order or proclamation, but the slander and reflexion upon the government, and that, I think, is very plain upon that case, in the fifth Report De Libellis Famosis; for it says, If a person do a thing that is libellous, you shall not examine the fact, but the consequence of it; whether it tended to stir up sedition against the public, or to stir up strife between man and man, in the case of private persons: as if a man should say of a judge, he has taken a bribe, and I will prove it; this is not to be sent in a letter, but they must take a regular way to prosecute it according to law.

If it be so in the case of an inferior magistrate, what must it be in the case of a king? To come to the king's face, and tell him, as they do here, that he has acted illegally, doth certainly sufficiently prove the matter to be libellous. What do they say to the king? They say and admit, that they have an averseness for the declaration, and they tell him from whence that averseness doth proceed: and yet they insinuate that they had an inclination to gratify the king, and embrace the dissenters, that were as averse to them as could be, with due tenderness, when it should be settled by parliament and convocation. Pray what hath their convocation to do in this matter?

L. C. J. Mr. Solicitor-General, I will not interrupt you; but, pray come to the business before us. Shew us that this is in diminution of the king's prerogative, or that the king ever had such a prerogative.

Sol. Gen. I will, my lord, I am observing what it is they say in this petition—They tell the king it is inconsistent with their honour, prudence and conscience, to do what he would have them to do: And if these things be not reflective upon the king and government, I know not what is. This is not in a way of judicature: possibly it might have been allowable to petition the king to put it into a course of justice, whereby it may be tried; but alas! there is no such thing in this matter.

It is not their desire to put it into any method for trial, and so it comes in the case de Libellis Famosis; for by this way they make themselves judges, which no man by law is permitted to do. My lords the bishops have gone out of the way, and all that they have offered does not come home to justify them; and therefore I take it, under favour, that we have made it a good case for the king: We have proved what they have done, and whether this be warrantable or not, is the question, gentlemen, that you are to try. The whole case appears upon record; the declaration and petition are set forth, and the order of the king and council. When the verdict is brought in, they may move any thing what they please in arrest of judgment. They have had a great deal of latitude, and taken a great deal of liberty; but truly, I apprehend, not so very pertinently. But I hope we have made a very good case of it for the king, and that you, gentlemen, will give us a verdict.

Just. Holloway. Mr. Solicitor, there is one thing I would fain be satisfied in: You say the bishops have no power to petition the king.

Sol. Gen. Not out of parliament, Sir.

Just. Holloway. Pray give me leave, Sir: Then the king having made such a declaration of a general toleration and liberty of conscience, and afterwards he comes and requires the bishops to disperse this declaration; this, they say, out of a tenderness of conscience, they cannot do, because they apprehend it is contrary to law, and contrary to their function: What can they do, if they may not petition?

Sol. Gen. I'll tell you what they should have done, Sir. If they were commanded to do any thing against their consciences, they should have acquiesced till the meeting of the parliament. [At which some people in the court hissed.]*

Att. Gen. This is very fine indeed! I hope the court and the jury will take notice of this carriage.

Sol. Gen. My Lord, it is one thing for a man to submit to his prince, if the king lay a command upon him that he cannot obey, and another thing to affront him. If the king will impose upon a man what he cannot do, he must acquiesce; but shall he come and fly in the face of his prince? Shall he say it is illegal? and the prince acts against prudence, honour or conscience, and throw dirt in the king's face? Sure that is not permitted; that is libelling with a witness.

* This and Mr. Attorney General's remark are cancelled in sir William Williams's MS. As to noise in court, see the end of the case.

L. C. J. Traly, Mr. Solicitor, I am of opinion that the bishops might petition the king; but this is not the right way of bringing it in. I am not of that mind that they cannot petition the king out of parliament; but if they may petition, yet they ought to have done it after another manner: for if they may in this reflective way petition the king, I am sure it will make the government very precarious.

Just. Powell. Mr. Solicitor, it would have been too late to stay for a parliament; for it was to have been distributed by such a time.

Sol. Gen. They might have lain under it and submitted.

Just. Powell. No, they would have run into contempt of the king's command, without petitioning the king not to insist upon it; and if they had petitioned, and not have shewn the reason why they could not obey, it would have been looked upon as a piece of sullenness, and that they would have been blamed for as much on the other side.

Serj. Baldock. After so long a debate, I shall not trouble you long; most things that are to be said have been said; but I shall only say this in short: I cannot deny, nor shall not, but that the subject has a right to petition; but I shall affirm it also, he has a duty to obey; and that in this case, the power of the king to dispense with penal laws in matters ecclesiastical, is not a thing that is now in question, nor need we here have had these long debates on both sides. It may be perceived plainly, by the proofs that have been read, that the kings and princes have thought themselves that they had such a power, though it may be the parliament thought they had not; and therefore the declarations of the one or the other I shall not meddle with in this case. That power itself which the king has, as king of this realm, in matters rather ecclesiastical and criminal, than matters of property, may somewhat appear by what has been read before your lordship. But all this will be nothing in our case, neither has his majesty now depended so much upon this thing. The declaration has been read to you, and what's there said? The king there says, That for those reasons he was ready to suspend those laws; and be they suspended. Yet, my lord, with this too, that he refers it to, and hopes to make it secure by a parliament. So that there being this, it has not gone, I think, very far; and it not having been touched here, it is not a point of duty in my lords the bishops, as bishops, that's here inquired into. Whether they should have meddled with this or no, in this manner, is the question. That the king is supreme over all of us, and has a particular supremacy over them, as supreme ordinary and governor, and moderator of the church, is very plain; and, my lord, it is as plain, that in such things as concern the church, he has a particular power to command them. This is not unknown, but very frequent and common in matters ecclesiastical, and matters of state. It is not here a question now, whether these declarations which they were commanded to take care of getting read, were legal or not legal? What prudence there was, what honour there was, what conscience there was, for their not reading it, is not the question neither: But the point was, the king as supreme ordinary of his kingdom, to whom the bishops are subject, does in council order; and what is it he orders? Their sending out and distributing his declaration. They were concerned in no more than that, and it had been a very pretty thing, a small thing, to send out the king's declaration to be read by the clergy. All the clergy were ordered to read it, but my lords the bishops were only commanded to distribute it. This he might do by virtue of his power ecclesiastical. And if this be not an evil in itself, and if it be not against the word of God, certainly obedience was due from my lords the bishops; active obedience was due from them to do so much as this. It was no consent of theirs, it was no approbation of theirs of what they read, that was required. So that if they had read it, or another had read it by the king's order, especially if that order be legal, they are bound to do it by virtue of their obedience, and not to examine more.

And, my lord, in this petition, here they come to relieve, not only themselves that were present, (for I speak to the preamble, as others before me have spoke to the conclusion) but they do involve the rest of the bishops that were absent; for it is in behalf of themselves, and their brethren, and all the clergy of that province. Now that all these should join in the petition, is a thing very uncertain. How does it construe here, whether they were all together and consented to it, or how all their minds could be so fully known, that they would be all involved in the disobedience to this order of the king? Then, my lord, what is the thing they are greatly averse to? There are two things required in the order: the bishops required to distribute the declaration to the inferior clergy, and the inferior clergy are required to read it. Then their averseness must be to distribute it, and the others to read it, and so they will be involved; none of whom did ever appear to have joined in it. And then they give reasons for their averseness; and it is true, reasons might have been given, and good reasons should be given, why they should not do this in duty to his majesty; more gentle reasons, and other kind of reasons than those that they have given.

L. C. J. Pray, brother, will you come to the matter before us?

Serj. Baldock. I have almost done, my lord.

Just. Powell. The information is not for disobedience, brother, but for a libel.

Serj. Baldock. No, Sir, it is not for disobedience, but it is for giving reasons for the disobedience in a libellous petition, and I am going on to that. The declaration is said in the petition to be illegal; which is a charge upon the king, that he has done an illegal act. They say, they cannot in honour, conscience, or prudence, do it; which is a reflection upon the prudence, justice, and honour of the king in commanding them to do such a thing: and this appearing to have been delivered to the king by my lords the bishops, persons to whom certainly we all owe a deference, as our spiritual masters, to believe what things they say as most likely to be true; and therefore it having an universal influence upon all the people, I shall leave it here to your lordship and the jury, whether they ought not to answer for it.

Recorder. Will your lordship please to spare me one word?

L. C. J. I hope we shall have done by and bye.

Recorder. If your lordship don't think fit, I can sit down.

L. C. J. No, no, go on, sir Bartholomew Shower, you'll say I have spoiled a good speech.

Recorder. I have no good one to make, my lord, I have but a very few words to say.

L. C. J. Well, go on, Sir.

Recorder. That which I would urge, my lord, is only this: I think, my lord, we have proved our information, and that they have made no answer to it; for the answer they have made is but argumentative, and taken either from the persons of the defendants, as peers, or from the form of its being a petition. As peers, it is said they have a right to petition to, and advise the king; but that is no excuse at all; for if it contains matter reproachful or scandalous, it is a libel in them as well as in any other subject; and they have no more right to libel the king than his majesty's other subjects have; nor will the privilege of their peerage exempt them from being punished. And for the form of this paper, as being a petition, there is no more excuse in that neither: for every man has as much right to publish a book, or pamphlet, as they had to present their petition. And as it would be punishable in that man to write a scandalous book, so it would be punishable in them to make a scandalous, and a libellous petition. And the author of Julian the Apostate, because he was a clergyman, and a learned man too, had as much right to publish his book, as my lords the bishops had to deliver this libel to the king. And if the city of London were so severely punished as to lose their charter, for petitioning for the sitting of a parliament, in which there were reflecting words, but more soft—

Just. Holloway. Pray, good Mr. Recorder, don't compare the writing of a book to the making of a petition; for it is the birthright of the subject to petition.

Recorder. My lord, it was as lawful for the city of London to petition for the sitting of a parliament, as it was for my lords the bishops to give reasons for their disobedience to the king's command: and if the matter of the city of London's petition was reckoned to be libellous, in saying that what the king had done in dissolving the parliament, was an obstruction of justice, what other construction can be made of my lords the bishops saying that the king's declaration is illegal? And if the matter of this petition be of the same nature with that of the city of London, your lordship can make no other judgment of it, but that it ought to have the same condemnation.

Just. Powell. Mr. Recorder, you will as soon bring the two poles together, as make this petition to agree with Johnson's book. They are no more alike than the most different things you can name.

Serj. Trinder. My lord, I have but one word.

L. C. J. How unreasonable is this now, that we must have so many speeches at this time of day! But we must hear it; go on, brother.

Serj. Trinder. My lord, if your lordship pleases, that which they seem most to insist upon on the other side, and which has not been much spoken to on our side, is, that this power which his majesty has exerted, in setting forth his declaration, was illegal, and their arguments were hypothetical. If it were illegal, they had not offended; and they offered at some arguments to prove it illegal; but as to that, my lord, we need not go much further than a case which is very well known here, which I crave leave to mention, only because the jury, perhaps, have not heard of it, and that was the case of sir Edward Hales;* where, after a long debate, it was resolved, That the king had a power to dispense with penal laws.

But, my lord, if I should go higher into our books of law, that which they seem to make so strange of, might easily be made appear to have been made a frequent and constant practice.—

L. C. J. That is quite out of the case, brother.

Serj. Trinder. I beg your lordship's favour for a word or two. If your lordship please to consider the power the king has, as supreme ordinary, we say, he has a power to dispense with these statutes as he is king, and to give ease to his subjects, as supreme ordinary of the whole kingdom, and as having supreme ecclesiastical authority throughout the kingdom. There might be abundance of cases cited for this, if there were need: the statute of primo Eliz. doubtless is in force at this time, and a great many of the statutes that have been made since that time, have express savings of the king's supremacy: so that the king's power is unquestionable. And if they have come and questioned this power in this manner, by referring themselves to the declarations in parliament, they have done that which of late days has been always looked upon as an ill thing ; as if the king's authority was under the suffrages of a parliament. But when they come to make out their parliament declarations, there was never a one, unless it be first in Richard the second's time, that can properly be called a parliament declaration, so that of the several parliaments is a matter perfectly mistaken ; and if they have mistaken it, it is in the nature of false news, which is a crime for which the law will punish them. More things might be added, but I consider your lordship has had a great deal of patience already, and much time has been spent, and therefore I shall conclude, begging your lordship's pardon for what I have said.

L. C. J.* I do assure you, if it had not been

* Narcissus Luttrell gives a copious account of this trial, and of preceding and subsequent events connected with it. The following is his account of the latter part of the trial and of what followed it :

" June 29, 1688. The Chief Justice summed up the evidence, and left it to them if they thought there was sufficient to prove a publication, for if then I take it to be a libel, and so judge Allybone held ; but Holloway thought it was none, being not done with a seditious intent. Powell held the same, and said if the king had such a dispensing power, there was no need of parliaments, but in all his life he never had read of any such power. So the trial held 'till 6 in the evening, and the jury went away and lay together till 6 the next morning, when they agreed (one Arnold stood out till then, the rest agreed over night) they would give no privy verdict, but came into court, and being called they found all the defendants Not Guilty ; at which there was a most mighty huzzah, and shouting in the hall, which was very full of people ; and all the way they came down, people asked their blessing on their knees ; there was continued shoutings for half an hour, so that no business could be done ; and they hissed the Solicitor.

" And at night was mighty rejoicing in ringing of bells, discharging of guns, lighting of candles, and bonfires in several places, though forbid, and watchmen went about to take an account of such as made them ; a joyful deliverance to the Church of England.

" July 2. Several persons are taken up on account of making bonfires on the bishops' day, and for committing pretended disorders.

" July 7. Letters out of the country from several parts, speak of the great rejoicings that were observed in several towns for joy of the bishops' acquittal : particularly at Gloucester, Bristol, Bedford, Litchfield, &c.

" Bills were preferred against several persons at the sessions for riots in making bonfires the evening that the bishops were acquitted, but the grand jury found them ignominious.

" October. Sir William Williams's chamber windows in Gray's Inn, were broken very a case of great concern, I would not have heard you so long. It is a case of very great concern to the king and the government on the one side, and to my lords the bishops on the other ; and I have taken all the care I can to observe what has been said on both sides. It is not to be expected that I should repeat all the speeches, or the particular facts, but I will put the jury in mind of the most material things, as well as my memory will give me leave ; but I have been interrupted by so many long and learned speeches, and by the length of the evidence which has been brought in, in a very broken, unmethodical way, that I shall not be able to do so well as I would.

Gentlemen, thus stands the case : it is an information against my lords the bishops, his much one night and reflecting inscriptions fixed over his door."

" The imprisonment of the bishops was now uppermost in the minds of most of the people, who flocked to them in such numbers, for their blessing, and to condole their hard usage, that great and very extraordinary remarks were made both of persons and behaviour. Among the rest, ten nonconformist ministers went to pay them a visit, which the king took so heinously, that he sent for four of them to reprimand them ; but their answer was, That they could not but adhere to the prisoners, as men constant and firm to the Protestant faith, or to that purpose. Nay, what is more extraordinary, the very soldiers that kept guard in the Tower, would frequently drink good health to the bishops ; which being understood by sir Edward Hales, constable of the Tower, he sent orders to the captain of the guard, to see it was done no more ; but the answer he received was, that they were doing it at the very instant, and would drink that, and no other health, while the bishops were there.

" At length the first day of the term came about, when the archbishop and the rest moving for the Habeas Corpus, twenty-one of the very prime of the nobility appeared at the King's Bench to bail them, and they were bailed accordingly. Upon this occasion the hall and Palace-yards were crowded with thousands of people, who begging their blessing as they passed, the archbishop freely gave it, and as freely, at the same time, exhorted them to be constant to their religion. A fortnight afterwards, an information was exhibited against their lordships, in the King's Bench, for that they had framed and published a seditious libel, of which the jury would not find them guilty, the counsel for the bishops, the ablest of their profession in all England, produced such arguments in their behalf, that the judges were divided, two of them declaring that the proofs did not extend to the making their petition or address a libel, and two of them that they did, which cost sir Richard Holloway and sir John Powell their seats on the bench, as soon as the term was over. In grace my lord of Canterbury, and the other six noble lords; and it is for preferring, composing, making, and publishing, and causing to be published, a seditious libel: the way that the information goes is special, and it sets forth, that the king was graciously pleased, by his royal power and prerogative, to set forth a declaration of indulgence for liberty of conscience, in the third year of his reign; and afterwards upon the 27th of April, in the fourth year, he comes and makes another declaration; and afterwards in May, orders in council that this declaration should be published by my lords the bishops in their several dioceses; and after this was done, my lords the bishops come and present a petition to the king, in which were contained the words which you have seen.

Now, gentlemen, the proofs that have been upon this, you will see what they are. The two declarations are proved by the clerks of the council, and they are brought here under the great seal. A question did arise, whether the prints were the same with the original declarations, and that is proved by Hills, or his the course of this trial, the power of the king to dispense with the laws, that grand point, was most exquisitely discussed by the bishops' counsel, who were so much an overmatch for the king's, that at court it was most heartily wished this business had never been pushed to such a crisis. Westminster-hall, the Palace-yards, and all the streets about, were thronged with an infinite people, whose loud shouts and joyful acclamations upon hearing the bishops were acquitted, were a very rebellion in noise, though very far from so either in fact or intention. Bonfires were made, not only in the city of London, but in most towns in England, as soon as the news reached them; though there were strict and general orders given out to prevent all such doings; and the clergy preached more loudly, and more freely than ever against the errors of the Latin church. The next day I waited on the king to the camp on Hounslow-heath, where every body observed him to labour under a very great disturbance of mind; but he spoke very kindly to me as I rode by him, upon several occasions.

"I was present, as a justice, at the general sessions held for the liberty of Westminster, and some days afterwards, at the same held for the county of Middlesex, at Hicks's Hall, where I found such a strange revolution among the justices of the peace, so many papists and fanatics put into the commission, that I neither sought business, nor chose to mix with them. At this last place there were several indicted as rioters, for that they had been concerned in making of bonfires, or contributed thereto; but the grand jury would find no bill, though they were sent out no less than three times; so generally did the love of the bishops and the Protestant cause prevail." Beresby's Memoirs, p. 262.

man, that they were examined, and are the same. Then the order of the council was produced by sir John Nicholas, and has likewise been read to you. Then they come to prove the fact against the bishops, and first they fall to proving their hands. They begun indeed a great way off, and did not come so close to it as they afterwards did; for some of their hands they could hardly prove, but my lord archbishop's hand was only proved, and some others; but there might have been some question about that proof. But afterwards it came to be proved, that my lords the bishops owned their hands; which if they had produced at first, would have made the cause something shorter than it was.

The next question that did arise, was about the publishing of it, whether my lords the bishops had published it? And it was insisted upon, that no body could prove the delivery of it to the king. It was proved, the king gave it to the council, and my lords the bishops were called in, and there they acknowledged their hands; but nobody could prove how it came to the king's hands. Upon which we were all of opinion, that it was not such a publishing as was within the information; and I was going to have directed you to find my lords the bishops not guilty: but it happened, that being interrupted in my directions, by an honest, worthy, learned gentleman, the king's counsel took the advantage, and informing the court that they had further evidence for the king, we staid till my lord president came, who told us how the bishops came to him to his office at Whitehall, and after they had told him their design, that they had a mind to petition the king, they asked him the method they were to take for it, and desired him to help them to the speech of the king: and he tells them he will acquaint the king with their desire, which he does; and the king giving leave, he comes down and tells the bishops, that they might go and speak with the king when they would; and, says he, I have given direction that the door shall be opened for you as soon as you come. With that the two bishops went away, and said, they would go and fetch their other brethren, and they did bring the other four, but my lord archbishop was not there; and immediately when they came back, they went up into the chamber, and there a petition was delivered to the king. He cannot speak to that particular petition, because he did not read it, and that is all that he knew of the matter; only it was all done the same day, and that was before my lords the bishops appeared at the council.

Gentlemen, after this was proved, then the defendants came to their part; and these gentlemen that were of counsel for my lords, let themselves into their defence, by notable learned speeches, by telling you that my lords the bishops are guardians to the church, and great peers of the realm, and were bound in conscience to take care of the church. They have read you a clause of a statute made in queen

Elizabeth's time, by which they say, my lords the bishops were under a curse, if they did not take care of that law: then they shew you some records; one in Richard the second's time, which they could make little of, by reason their witness could not read it; but it was, in short, a liberty given to the king, to dispense with the statute of provisors. Then they shew you some journals of parliament; first in the year 1662, where the king had granted an indulgence, and the house of commons declared it was not fit to be done, unless it were by act of parliament: and they read the king's speech, wherein he says, he wished he had such a power; and so likewise that in 1672, which is all nothing but addresses and votes, or orders of the house, or discourses; either the king's speech, or the subjects addresses; but these are not declarations in parliament. That is insisted upon by the counsel for the king, that what is a declaration in parliament is a law, and that must be by the king, lords, and commons; the other is but common discourse, but a vote of the house, or a signification of their opinion, and cannot be said to be a declaration in parliament. Then they come to that in 1685, where the commons take notice of something about the soldiers in the army that had not taken the test, and make an address to the king about it: but in all these things (as far as I can observe) nothing can be gathered out of them one way or the other; it is nothing but discourses. Sometimes this dispensing power has been allowed, as in Richard the 2nd's time, and sometimes it has been denied, and the king did once waive it: Mr. Solicitor tells you the reason, there was a lump of money in the case; but I wonder indeed to hear it come from him.

Sol. Gen. My lord, I never gave my vote for money, I assure you.

L. C. J. But those concessions which the king sometimes makes for the good of the people, and sometimes for the profit of the prince himself (but I would not be thought to distinguish between the profit of the prince and the good of the people, for they are both one; and what is the profit of the prince is always for the good of the people), but I say, those concessions must not be made law, for that is reserved in the king's breast, to do what he pleases in it at any time.

The truth of it is, the dispensing power is out of the case, it is only a word used in the petition; but truly, I will not take upon me to give my opinion in the question, to determine that now, for it is not before me: the only question before me is, and so it is before you, gentlemen, it being a question of fact, whether here be a certain proof of a publication? And then the next question is a question of law indeed, whether if there be a publication proved, it be a libel?

Gentlemen, upon the point of the publication, I have summed up all the evidence to you; and if you believe that the petition which these lords presented to the king was this petition, truly, I think, that is a publication sufficient: if you do not believe it was this petition, then my lords the bishops are not guilty of what is laid to their charge in this information, and consequently there needs no inquiry whether they are guilty of a libel? but if you do believe that this was the petition they presented to the king, then we must come to inquire whether this be a libel.

Now, gentlemen, any thing that shall disturb the government, or make mischief and a stir among the people, is certainly within the case of 'Libellis Famosis;' and I must in short give you my opinion, I do take it to be a libel. Now this being a point of law, if my brothers have any thing to say to it, I suppose they will deliver their opinions.

Just. Holloway. Look you, gentlemen, it is not usual for any person to say any thing after the Chief Justice has summed up the evidence; it is not according to the course of the court: but this is a case of an extraordinary nature, and there being a point of law in it, it is very fit every body should deliver their own opinion. The question is, Whether this petition of my lords the bishops be a libel or no. Gentlemen, the end and intention of every action is to be considered; and likewise, in this case, we are to consider the nature of the offence that these noble persons are charged with; it is for delivering a petition, which, according as they have made their defence, was with all the humility and decency that could be: so that if there was no ill intent, and they were not (as it is not, nor can be pretended they were) men of evil lives, or the like, to deliver a petition cannot be a fault, it being the right of every subject to petition. If you are satisfied there was an ill intention of sedition, or the like, you ought to find them guilty: but if there be nothing in the case that you find, but only that they did deliver a petition to save themselves harmless, and to free themselves from blame, by shewing the reason of their disobedience to the king's command, which they apprehended to be a grievance to them, and which they could not in conscience give obedience to, I cannot think it is a libel: it is left to you,* gentlemen, but that is my opinion.

L. C. J. Look you, by the way, brother, I did not ask you to sum up the evidence (for that is not usual) but only to deliver your opinion, whether it be a libel or no.

Just. Powell. Truly I cannot see, for my part, any thing of sedition, or any other crime, fixed upon these reverend fathers, my lords the bishops.

For, gentlemen, to make it a libel, it must

* As to the respective provinces of judge and jury, see in this Collection the cases of Lilburne, vol. 4, p. 1379, et seq.; of Bushell, vol. 6, p. 1013, et seq.; of R. Thompson, vol. 8, p. 36, et seq.; and the other cases therein cited. See, too, particularly the case of the dean of St. Asaph, A. D. 1783, in this Collection, and the Statute, 32 G. 3, c. 60.

be false, it must be malicious, and it must tend to sedition. As to the falshood, I see nothing that is offered by the king's counsel, nor any thing as to the malice: it was presented with all the humility and decency that became the king's subjects to approach their prince with.

Now, gentlemen, the matter of it is before you; you are to consider of it, and it is worth your consideration. They tell his majesty, it is not out of averseness to pay all due obedience to the king, nor out of a want of tenderness to their dissenting fellow subjects, that made them not perform the command imposed upon them; but they say, that because they do conceive that the thing that was commanded them was against the law of the land, therefore they do desire his majesty, that he would be pleased to forbear to insist upon it, that they should perform that command which they take to be illegal.

Gentlemen, we must consider what they say is illegal in it. They say, they apprehend the declaration is illegal, because it is founded upon a dispensing power, which the king claims, to dispense with the laws concerning ecclesiastical affairs.

Gentlemen, I do not remember, in any case in all our law (and I have taken some pains upon this occasion to look into it), that there is any such power in the king, and the case must turn upon that. In short, if there be no such dispensing power in the king, then that can be no libel which they presented to the king, which says, that the declaration, being founded upon such a pretended power, is illegal.

Now, gentlemen, this is a dispensation with a witness; it amounts to an abrogation and utter repeal of all the laws; for I can see no difference, nor know of none in law, between the king's power to dispense with laws ecclesiastical, and his power to dispense with any other laws whatsoever. If this be once allowed of, there will need no parliament; all the legislature will be in the king, which is a thing worth considering, and I leave the issue to God and your consciences.

Just. Allybone. The single question that falls to my share is, to give my sense of this petition, whether it shall be in construction of law a libel in itself, or a thing of great innocence. I shall endeavour to express myself in as plain terms as I can, and as much as I can, by way of proposition.

And I think, in the first place, that no man can take upon him to write against the actual exercise of the government, unless he have leave from the government, but he makes a libel, be what he writes true or false; for if once we come to impeach the government by way of argument, it is the argument that makes it the government or not the government. So that I lay down that, in the first place, the government ought not to be impeached by argument, nor the exercise of the government shaken by argument; because I can manage a proposition in itself doubtful, with a better pen than another man: this, say I, is a libel.

Then I lay down this for my next position, that no private man can take upon him to write concerning the government at all; for what has any private man to do with the government, if his interest be not stirred or shaken? It is the business of the government to manage matters relating to the government; it is the business of subjects to mind only their own properties and interests. If my interest is not shaken, what have I to do with matters of government? They are not within my sphere. If the government does come to shake my particular interest, the law is open for me, and I may redress myself by law: and when I intrude myself into other men's business that does not concern my particular interest, I am a libeller.

These I have laid down for plain propositions; now then let us consider further, whether, if I will take upon me to contradict the government, any specious pretence that I shall put upon it shall dress it up in another form, and give it a better denomination? And truly I think it is the worse, because it comes in a better dress; for by that rule, every man that can put on a good vizard, may be as mischievous as he will to the government at the bottom: so that whether it be in the form of a supplication, or an address, or a petition, if it be what it ought not to be, let us call it by its true name, and give it its right denomination—it is a libel.

Then, gentlemen, consider what this petition is: this is a petition relating to something that was done and ordered by the government. Whether the reasons of the petition be true or false, I will not examine that now, nor will I examine the prerogative of the crown, but only take notice that this relates to the act of the government. The government here has published such a declaration as this that has been read, relating to matters of government; and shall, or ought any body to come and impeach that as illegal, which the government has done? Truly, in my opinion, I do not think he should, or ought; for by this rule may every act of the government be shaken, when there is not a parliament de facto sitting.

I do agree, that every man may petition the government, or the king, in a matter that relates to his own private interest, but to meddle with a matter that relates to the government, I do not think my lords the bishops had any power to do more than any others. When the house of lords and commons are in being, it is a proper way of applying to the king: there is all the openness in the world for those that are members of parliament, to make what addresses they please to the government, for the rectifying, altering, regulating, and making of what law they please; but if every private man shall come and interpose his advice, I think there can never be an end of advising the government. I think there was an instance of this in king James's time, when by a solemn resolution it was declared to be a high misdemeanor, and next to treason, the king to put the penal laws in execution.

Just. Powell. Brother, I think you do mistake a little.

Just. Allybone. Brother I dare rely upon it that I am right: it was so declared by all the judges.

Sol. Gen. The Puritans presented a petition to that purpose, and in it they said, if it would not be granted, they would come with a great number.

Just. Powell. Aye, there it is.

Just. Allybone. I tell you, Mr. Solicitor, the resolution of the judges is, That such a petition is next door to treason, a very great misdemeanor.

Just. Powell. They accompanying it with threats of the people's being discontented.

Just. Allybone. As I remember, it is in the second part of the folio 35, or 37, where the resolution of the judges is, That to frame a petition to the king, to put the penal laws in execution, is next to treason; for, say they, no man ought to intermeddle with matters of government without leave of the government.

Serj. Pemberton. That was a petition against the penal laws.

Just. Allybone. Then I am quite mistaken indeed, in case it be so.

Serj. Trinder. That is not material at all which it was.

Mr. Pollexfen. They there threatened, unless their request were granted, several thousands of the king's subjects would be discontented.

Just. Powell. That is the reason of that judgment, I affirm it.

Just. Allybone. But then I'll tell you, brother, again, what is said in that case that you hinted at, and put Mr. Solicitor in mind of: for any man to raise a report that the king will or will not permit a toleration, if either of these be disagreeable to the people, whether he may or may not, it is against law; for we are not to measure things from any truth they have in themselves, but from that aspect they have upon the government; for there may be every tittle of a libel true, and yet it may be a libel still: so that I put no great stress upon that objection, that the matter of it is not false; and for sedition, it is that which every libel carries in itself; and as every trespass implies vi & armis, so every libel against the government carries in it sedition, and all the other epithets that are in the information. This is my opinion as to law in general. I will not debate the prerogatives of the king, nor the privileges of the subject; but as this fact is, I think these venerable bishops did meddle with that which did not belong to them: they took upon them, in a petitionary, to contradict the actual exercise of the government, which I think no particular persons, or singular body, may do.

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the jury, have you a mind to drink before you go?

Jury. Yes, my lord, if you please. [Wine was sent for for the jury.]

Juryman. My lord, we humbly pray that your lordship will be pleased to let us have the papers that have been given in evidence

L. C. J. What is that you would have, Sir?

Sol. Gen. He desires this, my lord, that you would be pleased to direct that the jury may have the use of such writings and statute-books as may be necessary for them to make use of.

L. C. J. The statute-book they shall have.

Sol. Gen. But they can have no papers but what are under seal.

Serj. Levinz. They may have them by consent, and they may have a copy of the information.

L. C. J. They shall have a copy of the information, and the declarations under seal.

Mr. Pollexfen. If they have those, and the libel, as they call it, they will not need a copy of the information.

Att. Gen. My lord, we pray that your lordship would be pleased to ascertain what it is they shall have.

L. C. J. They shall have a copy of the information, the libel, and the declarations under the great seal.

Sol. Gen. But not the Votes of the House of Commons, nor the Journals, for they are not evidence.

L. C. J. No, I don't intend they shall.

Sir R. Sawyer. My lord, we pray they may have the whole petition.

Just. Holloway. That is, with the direction and prayer, you mean.

Att. Gen. Yes, with all our hearts.

[Then the court arose, and the jury went together, to consider of their verdict, and stayed together all night, without fire or candle.]

On Saturday the 30th day of June, 1688, about ten o'clock in the morning, the archbishop, and the rest of the bishops, came again into the court, and immediately after the jury were brought to the bar.

Sir S. Astry. Crier, take the appearance of the jury. Sir Roger Langley.

Sir Roger Langley. Here.

Crier. Vous avez, &c. And so all the rest were called, and answered. Then proclamation for silence was made.

Sir S. Astry. Gentlemen, are you agreed on your verdict? Jury. Yes.

Sir S. Astry. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Foreman.

Sir S. Astry. Do you find the defendants, or any of them, guilty of the misdemeanor whereof they are impeached, or not guilty?

Foreman. Not guilty.

Sir S. Astry. Then hearken to your verdict, as the court hath recorded it.—You say, the defendants, and every of them, are not guilty of the misdemeanor whereof they are impeached; and so you say all?—Jury. Yes.

[At which there were several great shouts in court, and throughout the hall.]

Mr. Solicitor General taking notice of some persons in court that shouted, moved very earnestly that they might be committed: whereupon a gentleman of Gray's-Inn was laid hold of, but was soon after discharged. And after the shouting was over, the Lord Chief Justice reproving the gentleman, said;

L. C. J. I am as glad as you can be that my lords the bishops are acquitted; but your manner of rejoicing here in court is indecent, you might rejoice in your chamber, or elsewhere, and not here. [Then speaking to Mr. Attorney, he said:]

Have you any thing more to say to my lords the bishops, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. No, my lord. [Then the Court arose, and the bishops went away.]

After the revolution, complaint was made against the proceedings in this case, as in others.

I find in the Lords' Journal, that on May 1st, 1689, "The earl of Huntingdon made report from the committee of privileges, 'That the duke of Grafton, the lord Lovelace, the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops of St. Asaph, Bristol, Peterborough, Ely, Bath and Wells, and Chichester, having been desired by the lords of the committee to cause to be brought this day before their lordships, a relation in writing of the proceedings against their lordships, in the court of King's Bench, in prejudice to the privileges of the peers in general, as well as to their persons in particular; which having not been done by any of the said lords, that it is the opinion of the committee, that the House be moved to take some effectual order therein.'"

"Upon report from the lords committees for privileges, it is ordered, by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That Mr. Ince do attend their lordships, with an account, in writing, of the proceedings that were had, in the court of King's Bench, against the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of Bath and Wells, the bishop of St. Asaph, the bishop of Bristol, bishop of Ely, bishop of Chichester, and bishop of Peterborough, in Trinity term last."

But I have not discovered that any farther proceedings were had on the matter.

All the historians of this period relate the expressions of joy which this acquittal of the bishops called forth. Kennett writes as follows:

"There were immediately very loud acclamations through Westminster-hall, and the words 'Not guilty,' 'Not guilty,' went round with such shouts and huzzas, that the king's Solicitor moved very earnestly that such as had shouted in the court might be committed. But the shouts were carried on through the cities of Westminster and London, and flew presently to Hounslow-heath, where the soldiers in the camp echoed them so loud that it startled the king, who was that day entertained in the earl of Feversham's tent: insomuch that his majesty sent him out to know what was the matter. The earl came back and told the king, 'It was nothing but the soldiers shouting upon the news of the bishops being acquitted.' The king replied, 'And do you call that nothing? but so much the worse for them.' What his majesty meant by the last words he had not much time to interpret: he could only shew some indignation, that the bishops had escaped a legal penalty, and he threatened to deliver them up to the ecclesiastical commissioners. And for the two judges, Holloway and Powell, he immediately turned them out, and would have meditated some farther severity, if his following reign would have allowed it.

"This acquitment of the bishops encouraged the clergy in their honest resolutions of not reading the Declaration; but the ecclesiastical commissioners were instructed to call them to an account for it, for which purpose, on July 12, they met in the council-chamber and made an order, 'That whereas they had received information that divers rectors, vicars and curates, had omitted or neglected to read the said Declaration, to the manifest contempt of his majesty's authority-royal, they do hereby command and require all chancellors, archdeacons, commissaries and officials, to inquire strictly within their respective jurisdictions, in what churches and chapels his majesty's said Declaration was read, and in what churches and chapels the same was omitted, and to transmit an account thereof upon the 16th of August next.' The commissioners met again on that day, and finding that little or no inquiry had been made, they were much divided what to do in the matter. After a long consultation they were content to give longer time, and therefore published another order, 'Commanding all chancellors, archdeacons, commissaries, officials, and others having ecclesiastical jurisdiction, strictly to inquire of the church-wardens, as one of their articles of inquiry, at their respective visitations, (which visitations they were required to hold and keep before the 15th day of November next) in what churches and chapels his majesty's said Declaration was read, and in what the same was omitted, and to transmit an account thereof to them on the 6th day of December next.' But Providence prevented a return to this inquiry. The bishop of Rochester finding by this time the drift of the ecclesiastical commission, thought it inconsistent with his profession and character to act any longer in it, and therefore he wrote a letter to his colleagues, desiring to be excused from sitting amongst them."

It appears, that the 'Declaration' was not read in more than seven churches in London, and two hundred throughout England. See Kennett, Rapin, Burnet, and Hume.

May 20th, 1688, being the day appointed for reading the King's Declaration in London, it was only read in some few places, as at Westminster-abbey," [Sprat being Dean. See the Introduction to the Trials for the Rye-House Plot, vol. 9, p. 362], "at Serjeants'-Inn, in Fleet-street," [a chapel, I apprehend, belonging to the Judges and other Serjeants at Law], "Mr. Hall's in Wood-street, Mr. Elliott's at Duke's-place," and some few others.

"The bishops that were for reading the King's Declaration, and dispersed it into their bishoprics, were the bishops of Durham," [Crew: he absconded for some time, but returned and took the oaths to King William.* He was excepted out of the 'Bill of Indemnity and Free Pardon,' passed in 1690, but made his peace and retained his bishopric many years]. "Lincoln," [Barlow. He took the oaths to King William]. "Hereford," [Croft. He wrote 'The Naked Truth.' He was deprived for not taking the oaths to King William]. "Rochester," [Sprat, who was one of King James's privy councillors. See some account of him as above. He took the oaths to King William]. "Chester," [Cartwright. See some account of him, p. 27, of this Volume], and "St. David's," [Watson. He took the oaths to King William; but, in 1699, was deprived for simony. See his Case in this Collection]. Narcissus Luttrell's MS. "Brief Historical Relation," &c.

"It generally happened wherever it was read, that the congregation immediately left the church. One minister, before he began to read it, told his flock, 'that he could not refuse the order sent him to read the Declaration, but that he knew no order which obliged them to hear it.'" Rapin.

After the acquittal of the bishops on the prosecution for their petition, it appears that James entertained the design of proceeding before the ecclesiastical commissioners against them for not causing his 'Declaration' to be read. No such proceedings, however, were instituted; but the ecclesiastical commissioners endeavoured to enforce the reading of the Declaration by the compelled instrumentality of the archdeacons and chancellors, of whom some undisguisedly resisted the attempt, and some less resolutely excused their non-compliance. Narcissus Luttrell relates, that on October the 5th, the king declared in council that the ecclesiastical commission was dissolved.

The following Articles, extracted from Tanner's MSS. in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, give some curious particulars relating to this interesting transaction, and the persons concerned in it. See Gutch's Collectanea Curiosa.

Princess of Orange's Letter to Archbishop Sancroft.

Loon, Oct. 1, 1687.

Though I have not the advantage to know you, my lord of Canterbury, yet the reputation you have makes me resolve not to loose this opportunity of making myself more known to you, than I could have been yet. Dr. Stanly can assure you, that I take more interest in what concerns the church of England than myself, and that one of the greatest satisfactions I can have is to hear how all the clergy shew themselves as firm to their religion, as they have always been to their king, which makes me confident God will preserve his church, since he has so well provided it with able men. I have nothing more to say, but beg your prayers, and desire you'll do me the justice to believe, I shall be very glad of any occasion to shew the esteem and veneration I have for you.

MARIE.

To the Archbishop of Canterbury.

VOL. XII.

*Copy of the Archbishop's Answer: probably never sent.

May it please your royal highness,

The high and dear esteem you have of the church and holy religion established amongst us, which you are pleased so emphatically to

* This probability arises from the following letter written in the year 1715, by Dr. Stanley to Dr. Hicks, which is published by Mr. Gutch in the introduction to the first volume of his Collectanea:

"Sir; Amen Corner, May 26.

"I do not remember, that I ever heard, that the late good archbishop Sancroft was thought to have invited the prince of Orange over into England. If any one did charge him with it, I believe it was without grounds. All that I can say as to the matter is, that an. 1687, when I came into England out of Holland, I confess I did desire the archbishop to write to the then princesse of Orange, on whom I had the ho-declare in your *gracious letter with which you were lately pleased to honour me with, and the full assurance which farther Dr. St. gives ^{us} me that you hold this pious good affection towards [us] in common with that great and excellent prince in whose bosom you lie, are ^{mighty} such strong and rich consolations, which as we never needed more than now, ^{so} nor could they never come more seasonable or welcome to us. It hath seemed good to the infinite wisdom to exercise this poor Ch. with trials of all sorts and of all degrees. But the greatest calamity that ever

^{was} befell us is that it pleased God in his wise and just providence to permit wicked and ungodly men, after they had barbarously murdered the father, to drive out the sons from abiding in the inheritance of the Lord, ^{as if they} and as it were to say had said to them go and serve other Gods.

^{dreadfull} The dismall effects hereof we still feel every ^{must} moment but can not, nay we cannot particularly express. And though all this (were it yet much more) cannot in the least shake or alter our steady loyalty to our sovereign and the roial family in the legal succession of it, yet it im-bitters the very comforts that are left us; it blasts all our present joys and makes us sitt down with sorrow in dust and ashes. Blessed ^{night} be God who in so dark and dismal a time hath caused some dawn of light to break forth upon us from the Eastern shore, in the constancy and good affection of your roial highness and the excellent prince towards us, for if this should fail us too (which the God of Heaven and Earth forbid) our hearts must surely break. And as our thanksgivings for you both go up before God continually, so we all pray for you without ceasing, that God would crown you with all the blessings of Heaven and Earth. He hath inspired your R. Highness (with Marie in the Gospel) to chuse the better part, and I trust it shall never be taken from you. Be faithfull unto death and he will give you a crown of life. In the close of all your roial highnesses personal but most undeserved grace and fanour to attend, to encourage her still to give countenance to the church of England: but he ^{was} pleased not to write to her. And afterwards when we were come over into England, and a report being spread abroad, that some of the lords spiritual as well as temporal had invited the prince of Orange into England, in my discoursing with the archbishop, I remember he said to me, I am now glad I did not write to the princesse as you desired, for if I had written to her, they would have said, that I had sent to invite them over. This is true, and this is all that I can say of that affair.

I am, Sir, &c. WILL. STANLEY.

your to your poor unworthy servant must not be forgotten, whereby which you have put ^{a dying} ^{ready to} new life into an old man, who was ever sinking under double the burthen of age and sorrow,

^{so long as} but will while he holds his soul in life continue to be indeclinably to be what he is upon so many obligations. (May it please your roial highness) Your m. devoted faithful humble servant and daily Orator, at the throne of Grace.

Dr. Stanley's Letter to Archbishop Sancroft.

Hague, Jan. 24, (Febr. 3) 1687-8.

May it please your grace;

When I returned hither [from] England, I durst not make bold to trouble your grace so much, as to acquaint you how graciously and kindly the princess received your grace's letter, and the prince your humblest service, but desired my uncle Dr. Beveridge to do it for me, which I doubt not but he hath done. But I reckon myself bound in duty now to address myself immediately to your lordship by reason of something which hath lately happened here; with which, I think, I ought to acquaint your grace, who I know are so truly concerned for the good of our church, and so in some measure prevent the ill reports which may possibly be raised of our excellent princess.

I suppose your grace may have heard, that the king hath not been wanting to press his daughter here to be favourable to popery; but least you should have heard more than is trae, and that the papists should (as their way is) dishearten people, by representing her as inclined to them, I presume to acquaint your lordship with the sum of all that hath passed (her royal highness [being] pleased to make me privy to it, and giving me express leave to communicate it to your grace.) Whatever reports have been raised, the king hath scarcely ever spoken or written to our excellent princess to persuade her to popery till last Christmas: when the marquis d'Abbeville came hither the king sent to her a very long letter of two sheets of paper, written with his own hand, containing the motives of his own conversion to popery. This letter the marquis d'Abbeville gave to the princess on Christmas-day. The sum of the letter (for she shewed it me afterwards) was this; that he had been during his exile zealous for the Church of England, and was scarcely ever spoken to by any body, but one Nun, to turn papist. Nay he endeavoured to confirm his brother the duke of Gloucester in the Church of England; from which he was once thought to be warping. But he says, that the first thing that wrought with him, was, the holy and exemplary lives and constant devotion of those of the Church of Rome, the divisions among Protestants, with the necessity of an infallible judge to decide controversies, together with some promises which Christ made to his church in general, that the gates of Hell should not prevail against it, and some others made to St. Peter; and there being no person that pretends to infallibility but the bishop of Rome, he concluded this church and infallibility must needs be with them. Afterwards he is very severe against the Church of England for its cruelty towards dissenters; saying, that dissenters can give as good reasons for their separating from us, as we for our departure from Rome; nay, that any county in England can with as much reason separate from the rest, and choose officers and make laws for itself, as we could separate from the bishop of Rome, and from those that hold communion with him. This is the main of what I remember was in the king's letter. Our excellent princess seeing this letter written with the king's own hand, was resolved not only to write an answer, as the king desired, but to write it presently, and without consulting us, that he might see she was very ready to give an account of herself, and might be [able] truly to say it was her own answer. And therefore the very next day being post day, she made haste and wrote a letter of two sheets of paper (which she afterwards did read to me) which truly I can without flattery say, I think was one of the best letters that I ever saw, and as full to the case as I could desire, she treating him with that respect that was due to her father, and a king, and yet speaking her mind freely and openly as became the cause of religion; answering every objection so handsomely, that I confess [I] could [not] sufficiently admire it, and thank God for it. And in vindication of our church said, that as she had used all means to inform herself concerning religion, so she was well satisfied in what she had done, when she embraced the Church of England, and she hoped that God would give her grace to live and die in it. Besides much more which it would be too long to trouble your grace with. I confess I never was so fully satisfied in my life, as on this occasion with her, and though I knew she did understand her religion exceeding well, yet now me-thoughts she even outdid herself. And if ever I can procure a copy of her letter, I hope it may be with leave of communicating it to your grace and my lord of London, and I am sure you would be very well pleased with it.

After she had sent this letter to the king, his majesty was pleased to answer little or nothing, but would have had her discoursed with Father Morgan, who was rector of the jesuits college at Rome, and now lives with marq. d'Abbeville; but though she would willingly answer whatever the king shall write to her, she hath absolutely refused to admit this jesuit to discourse with her; for if she should allow of any such discourse, she is sensible how they would boast presently, that she listened to them, and was inclining towards them; which, I thank God, I think she is as far from, as I can desire. And besides she hath given me this assurance, that if ever there should be any objection or difficulty put to her, which she cannot clearly answer, she will not fail to command my advice and assistance in it. I make bold to acquaint your grace thus at large with this affair, that if the papists should raise any report of it, your grace may have somewhat wherewithall to satisfy yourself and others, so far as in your great prudence you think fit. Our excellent princess's reputation as to religion being of so great moment, I hope your grace will pardon my thus representing this matter between the king and her to you; for I know your grace's hearty concern for the church; but I dare not speak of it even here, or write of it to any body else for several reasons; only my lord of London knows somewhat of it.

And as I thus beg your lordship's pardon so I must humbly also beg your commands and directions as to my management either in this affair or in any thing else, in which the good of the church is concerned, which I can truly, and with a safe conscience, say, is much dearer to me than my life itself, or any thing else I have in this world; and therefore your grace may be sure, I will not fail (by the blessing of God) to make all the good impressions that I shall be able; but your grace's commands and assistance will enable me to do much more; and I know that any thing will be much the better taken also as coming from your grace. To this purpose I humbly crave leave to beg of your grace, that you will be pleased sometimes to write to her highness. I am from herself assured, that she will take it very well, and when your grace thinks fit to write to her, if you will please to give your letter to Dr. Tenison, he will frequently find a private hand by which to send it enclosed to me. And if your grace doth take some notice to her of her carriage in this affair, as I have related it, it will I believe, be very acceptable. I again most humbly beg your grace's pardon for this long letter, and for my bad writing, for the gentleman that is to carry it, is in so great haste that I have not time to transcribe it. I bless God their highnesses are in good health, and beg your grace's prayers to God for them, and your blessing on your grace's most humble and obedient servant,
WILL. STANLEY.

Another Letter from the same to the Archbishop.

Houslaerdyke, May 31 (June 10), 1688.

May it please your grace;

I hope your grace did pardon the trouble which I gave you of a letter since I returned hither out of England, and in confidence of that I having the opportunity of a friend going for London, whom I can trust, presume to acquaint your grace with how great satisfaction the news was received here of the petition, which your grace and your brethren the bishops presented to his majesty. All men here, that love the church or reformation, do rejoice in it, and thank God for it, as an act very prudent and resolute, and every way becoming your places and characters; but especially our excellent prince and princess were so very well pleased with it, (notwithstanding what the marquis of Abbeville, the king's envoy here, could say against it) that they have both vindicated it before him, and given me a command in their names to return your grace their hearty thanks for it; and at the same time to express their real concern for your grace and all your brethren, and for the good cause in which you are engaged; and, I dare say, they are not only highly satisfied with your grace's conduct, but reckon themselves particularly obliged by your grace's so steadily maintaining the church; and your refusing to comply with the king is by no means looked on by them as tending to disparage or depress the monarchy; for they reckon the monarchy to be really under-valued and injured by all unreasonable and illegal actions, though never so much pretending to enhance it. Indeed we have great reason to bless and thank God for their highnesses steadiness, in so good a cause, and their affection towards us. They do give us all the comfortable prospect that we ourselves can desire. And I pray God in his good time to answer and fulfill all these our hopes in them. I will not trouble your grace with news from hence; only I cannot but acquaint your grace here hath lately been discovered a great design against the life of the prince by poison. The person, who was to have done it, discovered it, and produced the poisons, but he could not produce the person that hired him; for he would never tell him his name, nor meet him in any house. He gave him some money in hand, and promised him more, if he would but first poison his landlord where he lodged, and then he should have much more for doing the same to the prince; and because this person delayed to do either, he was by an unknown hand stabbed here in the fair time, but is not dead. We discourse but little of it, but it is most true, that there was such a wicked design, which I thank God is defeated; and I pray God for ever to blast all designs against their highnesses, and to make them great and lasting blessings to our church and nation. To which purposes I humbly beg your grace's prayers to God for them, and your blessing on your grace's most humble and obedient servant,

WILL. STANLEY.

MATTER OF FACT: by the E. of CL——.

I. Concerning the King's Dispensing Power.

December 26th, 1662, king Charles 2 set forth a Declaration to all his loving subjects, containing an indulgence (though far less than hath been since granted) to dissenters; there being then no other test upon any sort of them, but the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. At the opening of the next session of parliament, February 18th, 1662, the king in his speech explained his meaning in his said declaration, lest (as he said) "some should mistake him therein." In that speech he used these words; "I could heartily wish, I had such a power of indulgence, &c.:" whereby it is manifest, that he knew he had no such power by his prerogative.

The house of commons coming to consider of that speech, fell upon the questioning the legality of that declaration: and after long debates, upon February 28th presented an address to the king, containing the several reasons against that indulgence; and averring positively, "that the laws of uniformity, then in force, could not be dispensed with, but by act of parliament." This address was received by his majesty very graciously; as appears by his answer, which is in print, with the address and reasons.

While this was doing in the house of commons, a bill was brought into the house of peers, intituled, "An Act concerning his majesty's power in ecclesiastical affairs." The scope of it was to enable the king to dispense with the act of uniformity, and to give indulgence to dissenters. The cause of the bill is thus laid down in the preamble: "considering that this indulgence, how necessary soever, cannot be dispensed by any certain rule, &c. and his majesty being the best judge, when, and to whom this indulgence is to be dispensed, and as may be most consistent with the public peace, and without just cause of offence to others, and to the end his majesty may be enabled to exercise it with universal satisfaction, be it enacted. &c.:" This bill was read the first time February 23d. It was after read a second time, and committed. But whosoever hath the curiosity to look into the journals of that house, will find, that though the committee sat several times, they made very little progress in it, and that at last it died away there, without any report made to the house. By this proceeding it seems very clear, both that the king had then by law no such dispensing power; and that the parliament were not then inclined to grant him any such power.

After this all things continued quiet for above nine years. But March 15th, 1671, the king set forth another Declaration of Indulgence, much fuller than the former. The parliament met not till February 4th, 1672, (which was near a year after the declaration was published.) The king, in his speech at the opening of that session, speaking, (among other things) of his declaration, was pleased to say: "Having said this I shall take it very ill to receive contradiction in what I have done; and I will deal plainly with you; I am resolved to stick to my declaration." The house of commons, February 19th, made an humble address to his majesty; wherein they inform him, "that penal laws in matters ecclesiastical cannot be suspended but by an act of parliament." The king returned an answer February 24th, in which he says, "that he is much troubled, that that declaration, which he put out for ends so necessary to the quiet of his kingdom (and especially in that conjuncture) should have proved the cause of disquiet in his house of commons, and given an occasion to the questioning of his power in ecclesiastics: which he finds not done in the reigns of any of his ancestors, &c." Neither doth he pretend to the right of suspending any laws, "where the properties, rights, or liberties of any of his subjects are concerned, &c." This answer of his majesty was not satisfactory. The house replied, February 27th, in another address, in which they say, "that the power to suspend penal laws in matters ecclesiastical was never claimed, nor exercised by any of his majesty's predecessors." It is fit here to observe, that in this debate in the house of commons (which lasted above eight hours) all the lawyers in the house (among whom were several of the king's counsel) were commanded to deliver their opinion, as to the legality of the declaration: which every one of them did distinctly by himself, and declared, that penal laws could not be suspended, but by act of parliament.

While these things were transacting in the house of commons, the king acquainted the house of peers, what had past between him and the commons. The lords did little more thereupon, than appoint a committee to consider of what his majesty had communicated unto them. For while they were considering of it, the house of commons, taking notice of the great concourse of papists to town, and that many of them were got into employments in the army, prepared an address to be presented to the king, against the growth of popery: which they sent up to the lords, March 4th, desiring their concurrence to it. Their lordships granted it; and March 7th both houses presented it to his majesty; and his majesty, March 8th, went to the house of peers, sent for the commons, and made a short speech to both houses; wherein he told them, "that he freely and readily agreed to the address, they presented to him the day before, and would take care to see it performed accordingly:" adding farther these words; "if there be any scruple yet remaining with you, concerning the suspension of penal laws, I faithfully promise you, that what hath been done in that particular, shall not for the future be drawn either into consequence or example." And after his majesty was gone out of the house of peers, the lord chancellor acquainted the lords (and Mr. secretary Coventry did the same in the house of commons) that the night before the king had caused the original declaration of indulgence under the great seal to be cancelled; of which he, and several other lords of the council were witnesses.

Thus ended this unhappy dispute between the king and his parliament, which occasioned many warm debates; and harsh and angry things were said on both sides, that had been much better avoided. This declaration, together with the impertinence of the Papists (to give it no worse name) gave occasion to the parliament in this very session to pass that act, wherein the first test was imposed on all persons who had any office, &c.

From what hath been said, it is (I think) very clear, that to this time the king had no power to dispense with penal laws in matters ecclesiastical. For in February, 1662, his majesty owned that he had no such power; and we all know, that the parliament have past no law since to enable him to exercise that power. How therefore the present judges came to be so far enlightened, as to give their opinions so positively, that the king may by law dispense with the act, whereby the last test is imposed (without which no man can sit in either house of parliament, or enjoy any office); and also with all other penal laws, even where the property of the subject is concerned (which his late majesty disclaimed the pretending to); I say, how these judges came to so fix a resolution in this great point, may be fit one day to inquire.

The Declarations, Speeches, Addresses, and Replies, above-mentioned, are all in print.

II. Concerning the Act imposing the Test, 1678.

The bishop of Oxford, in his late book, intitled, "Reasons for abrogating the Test," &c. in the very entrance of it, lays down this assertion; "That the test imposed upon all members of parliament, October 30th, 1678, ought to be repealed for several reasons."

First, "Because it doth not only diminish, but utterly destroy the natural right of peerage; and turns the birthright of the English nobility into a precarious title: so that, what was in all former ages only forfeited by treason, is now at the mercy of every faction, or every passion in parliament."

Answer. How the bishop handles the matters of transubstantiation and idolatry, I take not upon me to judge: but as to what concerns the house of peers, and the transactions there, I will venture to say, he is grossly mistaken in matters of fact; which shews at least want of care to be well informed. Had he looked into the printed statute-book he would have found, that the act he mentions, past November (not October) 30th, and had he been conversant in the journals of the house of peers (which he ought to have studied, before he had taken upon him to write of their affairs) he might have found, that lords have been deprived of their places in parliament, and the privilege of voting there for less crimes than treason; and that even by judgment of the house of peers only, without an act of parliament. The lord viscount St. Albans, lord chancellor, and the earl of Middlesex, lord treasurer, temp. Jac. 1. were not only deprived of their offices, and made incapable of ever holding any other, but also of ever sitting in parliament; and all this by the censure of the house of lords only: and in elder times, in the reign of Henry 4, the duke of Aumarle, and others. And to come nearer our own time; how often have the lords made orders, (scarce a session since 1660, in which they have not) that all the members of that house should take the oath of allegiance?

and accordingly all the peers, even the Roman Catholic, have taken that oath more than once since his late majesty's restoration; even his present majesty too, when duke of York. There is no question but that every court may prescribe rules to all the members of that court; much more the supreme court, the house of peers, who frequently have imprisoned and suspended their members from sitting and voting there, for no other offence than contempt: one eminent example whereof might be given, which happened a few years since, but that I am willing to avoid reflections upon passages which 'tis better to forget.

And if peers may be deprived of sitting and voting in parliament by judgment of the house of lords only; certainly he must be very audacious who presumes to question what the supreme authority of the nation (king, lords, and commons) have done by act of parliament: especially it being no more (after all) than to provide a security, that those who are of a different religion from that established by law, should not be in a capacity to destroy the religion of the country. If the bishop would but view the late edicts which have been published in France to suppress the reformed religion there, where the Protestant peers had as much right to sit in parliament as the Roman Catholic peers can pretend to here: or if he would have looked into the history of Sweden, and seen what security the legislative power of that kingdom hath provided for the maintaining of the religion there established, he would not have thought it so very strange, that our king and parliament should make new laws for the support of the religion of the country, when they find it like to be invaded, and disturbed by those who make it their constant business to undermine it.

'Tis very true (what he says) that in the act for the first test, 1673, the rights of peerage are secured to the lords by proviso. And if he had well minded that other act, 1678, with which he is so much displeased;

1. There is no right of peerage at all invaded, but that of sitting and voting in parliament, till they take the oaths, and subscribe the declaration: which so soon as any lord will perform, he may take his place in parliament, though discontinued for some time; for a writ is sent him every time a parliament is summoned. And that he looseth no other privilege of peerage, is, I think, very plain, by the trial of the late lord viscount Stafford; who, notwithstanding this act, was tried by his peers according to his undoubted right; which clearly shews what is and what is not taken away by this act. But

2. For that which is taken away, sc. the right to sit, and vote (which he calls the birth-right, and natural right of peerage), he should have considered the reason of doing so, given in the preamble of that act: viz. "Forasmuch as divers good laws have been made for preventing the increase and danger of Popery in this kingdom, which have not had the desired effects, by reason of the free access which Popish recusants have had to his majesty's court, and by reason of the liberty which of late some of the recusants have had, and take to sit, and vote in parliament, &c." Is it not plain hereby, that the wisdom of the nation thought it necessary for the security of religion, and the government, that Popish recusants should be debarred from coming to court, and sitting in parliament? And these are all the rights of their peerage, that are not so much taken away, as suspended, till they conform.

To confirm this first reason for abrogating the test, the bishop insists much upon a debate in the house of peers, 1675, when the test, or oath of loyalty (as he calls it) was brought in there, where he affirms several things.

First, "That the matter of the test itself (viz. that 'tis not lawful upon any pretence whatsoever to take up arms against the king, and by his authority, against his person) was such as nobody could except against; but the only debate was, Whether the proposing this as a qualification for a right to sit in parliament, did not intrench upon the privileges of that house, and the fundamental right of peerage? which (he saith) was thrown out by an unanimous vote of the house, April 21."

Secondly, He confesseth, "That the question being put, it was at first resolved in the negative: but that some lords (sc. 23 in all) did enter their dissent against this vote, as a thing unprecedented in former times; as the highest invasion of the liberties and privileges of the peerage; and most destructive of the freedom, they ought to enjoy, as members of parliament: because the privilege of sitting and voting in parliament is an honour they have by birth; and a right so inherent in them, and inseparable from them, that nothing can take it away, but what by the law of the land takes away their lives, and corrupts their blood."

Thirdly, "The debate, he saith, was kept up many days, but that it was at last resolved, April 30th, That no oath should be by this bill imposed." And,

Fourthly, "That a general order was past, nemine contradicente, to be added to the standing order of that house, That no oath shall be imposed by any bill, or otherwise upon the peers, with a penalty in case of refusal to lose their places, and votes in parliament, or liberty of debates therein."

Answer. This bill was intituled, "An Act to prevent the Dangers which may arise from Persons disaffected to the Government:" and the oath in it contained (beside the clause he mentions) another, obliging them to abjure all endeavours to alter the government in the church. It was brought in April 15th, and read the first time; and the second time April 20th; when, and for several days after, there was a very great and long debate, Whether the bill should be committed, or not; so that it was not committed till April 26th. In the mean time, April 21st, there was a collateral debate, Whether the very proposal of this oath with such a penalty were a breach of the fundamental right of peerage, and so the bill to be cast out: which was resolved in the negative by 87 lords; 23 dissenting, and entering the protestation, he mentions. So that there was nothing cast out by the unanimous vote of the house, April 21st, as the bishop grossly mistakes, for want of perusing the journals of the house. But the same day the peers resolved to proceed upon the main point, Whether the bill should be committed: and April 26, the question being put, it was committed to a committee of the whole house. Against this the former lords entered a second protestation, with a new reason, that it strikes at the very root of government; to which freedom of votes and debates is necessary in those that have power to make, or alter laws; whereas this bill obliges to abjure all endeavours to alter the church government, without regard to any thing, that prudence in government, Christian compassion to Protestant dissenters, or the necessity of affairs at any time may require. But the majority of the house were much dissatisfied with the proceedings of these dissenters: and therefore April 29th, the question being propounded, whether the reasons given in that protestation of April 26 did reflect upon the honour of the house, and were of dangerous consequence; it was resolved in the affirmative: against which several lords entered their dissents, asserting the right of protesting with reasons. For all this the committee of the whole house proceeded upon the bill April 30th, and May 3d; and past these two preliminary orders (to which the house agreed),

1. "That no oath shall be imposed by any bill, or otherwise upon the peers, with a penalty in case of refusal to lose their places, or votes in parliament, or liberty of debates therein; and that this be added to the standing orders of the house."

2. "That there shall be nothing in this bill, which shall deprive any member of either house of their just, ancient freedom, and privilege of debating any matter propounded, or touching the repeal or alteration of any old, or the preparing any new laws, &c. &c." Now the dissenters thought they had gained their point; but the business was brought about again; and the major part of the house (notwithstanding the unanimous laying aside the oath with the penalty in the bill mentioned) did upon the same May 3d (when the second preliminary order was made) pass the first enacting clause, "That all and every person, and persons, as well peers as commoners, that do, or shall hold, or enjoy any beneficial office, or employment, ecclesiastical, civil, or military; or be a privy councillor, or justice of peace; or (as they added the next day, May 4th) have or shall have right to sit and vote in either house of parliament, &c." Against this vote also several lords entered their dissent, as being contrary to the two orders abovementioned, which were past as previous directions to the committee of the whole house, to whom the said bill was committed; and insisted that the proviso in the late act (sc. 1673) for preventing dangers from Popish recusants, might be added to this bill, for the preserving the privileges of the peers, which the house had not been pleased to admit of. Thus it appears, that the peers had finally ordered, that an oath should be taken by the peers: but what the penalty should be in case of refusal (though there were many adjournments of the committee from hence till the 4th of June) was not determined: and though several penalties were moved at the committee, yet nothing was resolved on, nor any report made to the house after May 7th. And in the mean time, some unlucky disputes happening between the two houses about other matters, the parliament was prorogued June 9th till October, and so the bill fell, and was never resumed.

This is in short the narrative of the matter of fact, which past then in the house of peers upon this occasion out of their own journals. Whence it appears,

First, that it was then the sense of that house (23 only dissenting) that the imposing of an oath upon the lords, even with the penalty of losing their places and votes in parliament in case of refusal, is not a breach of the fundamental rights of peerage. How the two orders of April 30th, and May 3d (which lay aside the oath, and the penalty) came to be gained, and what was the project and intrigue of these transactions throughout, would carry me too far into the history of that time. It is enough against the bishop, that the oath and penalty were presently resumed, and proceeded upon. And,

Secondly, These very lords, or some of them, seem to have altered their opinion herein afterward; for the bill for the test 1678, (at which the bishop is so much offended) past almost unanimously: 7 lords only (besides the then duke of York) dissenting, and they all papists. And I cannot think the dissenting peers will be pleased, that his lordship should question or arraign them (as he doth p. 4th) for changing their opinion, and consenting to the test bill 1678; they being sufficient judges of their own rights and honours, without his lordship's assistance.

Thirdly, As to what was added to the standing orders of the house, it is in fine no more than an order; and the peers are masters of their own orders, and may observe, or set them aside, as they see good. One reason, which the 23 lords gave, why they dissented to the bill, was to preserve their ancient privilege of altering old, and making new laws: and shall the peers be denied the freedom to set aside their own orders? This very order (which the bishop takes to be so obligatory) was often urged in 1678, and yet almost unanimously set aside, and even by these very dissenting lords too.

II. The bishop's second reason for the repealing the test is, because of its "dishonourable birth and original; it being the first born of Oates his plot, &c."

Answer. Though Oates hath been since detected, and proved a most abominable cheat, and impostor; I could wish, that what hath happened since did not make several things, which he then related, look like truths now, which many good men did not then believe. Nay, though Oates had never been, doth it therefore follow, that there was no Popish plot? Certainly no man reads Mr. Coleman's Letters, but must be convinced, that there was a plot laid (before Oates appeared) to extirpate the northern heresy (as he called it), and that two of the French king's confessors at least were privy to it. Whoever looks into the transactions of parliament for 8 or 9 years before 1678 (and especially 73, 4 and 5) and sees how much time was spent in modelling laws for the security of the Protestant religion, and in contriving methods for the government, in the case of a Popish successor; will not sure impute the original of those endeavours to Oates's perjury. If the bishop would look into the Journals of the house of peers, he would find, that November 9th, 1675, a bill was brought from the house of commons, intituled, "An Act for hindering Popish recusants from sitting in either house of parliament," (certainly nothing akin to Oates, or his plot) which probably had past that session, but the parliament was in the same month prorogued to February 1676; and whether the proceedings upon that bill might not occasion that long prorogation, I leave to inquiry. What reasons induced the parliament 1673 to pass the first test act, it would not perhaps be very agreeable to inquire: but sure it had nothing to do with Oates's plot. They that knew the state of the court, and circumstances of affairs at that time, cannot doubt but that it was to keep those out of offices and employments, who by obtaining them would be in a capacity to suppress the Protestant, and introduce the Romish religion. And if the Papists had modestly submitted to that act, and not occasioned fresh jealousy by frequenting the court, and being too busy there, in all probability no new laws would have been made against them. Upon the whole, I do not see (for all the bishops' arguments) that the laws we are possess of, for the security of our religion, should be accounted odious, and repealed, because Oates is proved an impostor: for long before he was thought of, all papists were by several laws excluded from all offices in the government. And whether this be a proper time to give them power to destroy the Protestant religion, (for no man can doubt, if they had the power, and the laws were out of the way, they would think themselves bound to do it) a parliament (when the king thinks fit to call one) will be the best judge.

III. The bishop's next reason, why he would have the test abrogated, is because of the "incompetent authority, by which the law was enacted."

Answer. His lordship having as (he thinks) settled the ecclesiastical polity; sawcily takes upon himself to question the powers and authorities upon earth. He may as well pretend, that the parliament had not a competent authority to enact the oath of allegiance. For I have heard many Papists profess, that the main reason, why they cannot take the oath is, because the parliament hath not a competent authority to determine what is impious, or heretical; which that oath doth. Though I will not argue with his lordship's divine verities, yet I am satisfied in myself, that I may take the oaths, and make the subscriptions appointed by law, without intrenching upon the authority of the church. But, however, he who can content himself in his private station, without the ambition of making a figure in the state, incurs no penalty from either of the acts, nor is obliged to take the oaths, or tests. But he thinks he may say any thing, because no authority is like to question him, but a parliament: and therefore to that I leave him. When that shall sit, he may perhaps know, whether they will allow him to question their authority in the legislature: I am apt to think, that neither lords nor commons will sit down quietly under the severe and foul language he hath given them. He may then be taught, that though he may refuse all freedom in debates about any bills, which are preparing; yet when they are past into laws, (the royal assent being given them) it is dangerous to arraign them; the king's laws being the life of the government.

IV. His last reason for repealing the test is, "because of the uncertainty and falsehood of the matter contained in the declaration itself."

Answer. What is the true notion of transubstantiation, and idolatry, according to the church of England, I will leave to be debated with the bishop by abler persons, (who I doubt not) will take him to task in these particulars. However we will not learn this of him, who was born of fanatical parents, and was educated in their principles: and though he hath since for preferment swallowed all oaths, and tests, and hath written with great sharpness against popery, yet hath he not shewed himself to have the true principles of the church of England. But admitting this, I shall only shew him here some few more of his mistakes in matter of fact, and correct them: which was my main design.

1. He seems, p. 9th and 10th, to take little Archtophel (as he calls him, meaning the E. of Shaftsbury) to have been the infamous author of this test: but they who understand the affairs of that time much better than the bishop can pretend to do, know it was otherwise. The bill was sent up from the house of commons; being but the reviving of that before mentioned, which they sent up once before in November 1675; as thinking still, that it was necessary for the preservation of the government. If Shaftsbury concurred in it, it was only because it came from the house of commons; he being then very industrious in his courtship to that house.

2. As to what he saith p. 10th: "That the design of the test was to pursue, and hunt down the heir of the crown; and in order to that, to strip him of the guards of his most faithful friends; he forgets that, by particular proviso, nothing in that act was to extend to the duke of York; and if the guards of his most faithful friends (which he mentions) were not papists, the act meddled not with them; and if they were, he was stript of them by the test imposed 1673."

3. Who were the two fathers, or rather midwives (as he calls them p. 11th) of the first test in 1673, doth not appear by the journals of the house of commons; so that his lordship can only have been told, that they were "the two famous burgesses of Oxford." And in that he may have been misinformed in the whole, as I am sure he is in part. For the alderman, he mentions, was not then a member of parliament; and it can be made appear, that the recorder of Oxford, who was one of their burgesses, never opened his lips in that matter.

4. He tells us, what was objected against the "church of England by the Roman divines of Cologne in his majesty's presence; and that thereupon Dr. Cosins (then dean of the chapell) by his majesty's command wrote a discourse to vindicate the church of England, and to give account of its sense concerning the true real presence." But there are persons yet living, who know, that there never were any disputes before the king, while he resided at Cologne, by any of the Roman divines; that Dr. Cosins was never dean of the chapell royal, nor ever at Cologne (but remained at Paris, to take care of the queen mother's protestant servants), and that if the bishop had looked upon Dr. Cosins's history of transubstantiation (which I suppose is the discourse he means) he would have found that it was written at Paris, long before the king's being at Cologne.

Audacious attempts of Popish Seducers in King James's reign.

Books and pamphlets prejudicial to the church are sold on every stall, cryed about by hawkers in the streets as commonly as Gazetts, thrown or brought into houses, or sent by penny post bundles, such as, the Touchstone of the reformed Gospel: the Translation of the Mass: the Papist misrepresented: the Exposition of the Bishop of Meniv.

Papists bring papers into coffee houses and plead the cause out of them as out of so many briefs: thus did a new convert in a coffee house in Covent Garden. A priest discoursed publicly in such a house in a neighbouring parish about invocation of saints.

Some priests of foreign ministers catechise the children of the English in English, and by way of sermon expound an hour in an afternoon, and reflect upon our church.

VOL. XII.

Thus have done father Jacob and another father at the resident's of Florence.

When the churchmen come to dying persons they often find that priests or lay-papists have been tampering with them. This was the case of Mr. J. M.

Sometimes priests come in disguise, and under the pretext of administering physic. Thus did one nigh Charing Cross, who came to a man, now dead, with a glass of medicinal liquor.

Papists, both of the laity and clergy, offer arguments to the passengers in hackny coaches to Windsor, and other places, and perhaps Dr. B. may call to mind the beginning of his own unacceptable discourse to a military person in his coach from Islington.

Papists deal with children, and sometimes forbid them to read the Bible in our translation: so they dealt with the daughter-in-law of one Mrs. Hall about sixteen years old.

Sometimes they suggest great hopes of recovery to the sick, upon reconciling themselves to the Church of Rome: so they did in the case of a sick woman, not far from Somerset House, in great pain with the stone.

Some papists pretend kindred, where they are not akin; and under this cover make visits, and enter into discourse about religion, as in the case of a lady in Covent-Garden.

Priests and others offer to pregnant youths preferment at Doway, or St. Omers; as in the case of a student in King's college.

Some priests christen children, even where the parents are against it; ex. gr. Dan Maniato, servant to the resident of Florence, came with a priest to the house of Francis Herd, of Soho, (whose wife the said Daniel had abused) and he christened the said child, without any leave, and to the great grief of the said Francis Herd, and without any notice there taken of the said Maniato's violence and adultery. It is true, this is a last year's story, and heard of formerly, but not so confirmed to me as in this week.

I suppose you do not expect, that I should tell you of every thing that I have heard or known of this nature, especially of such relations as have been received under the seal of secrecy. Enough hath been said to satisfy you that our churchmen do not unnecessarily break silence. I am, &c. O. O.

The Case of reading the 'Declaration for Liberty of Conscience,' briefly stated in four Propositions: [by Mr. Jonas Proast, Chaplain of All Souls, and afterward Archdeacon of Berks.]

1. The intent of the Declaration itself is, that men may use such a liberty, in matters of religion, as cannot be used, without violating the laws of God and this kingdom.

2. The intent of the order for the clergy's reading the declaration is, that the declaration may have the fuller effect, in the more general use of that unlawful liberty.

3. Therefore, in the king's intention, and according to the most natural construction of the thing itself, the clergy's reading the declaration is a direct promoting the use of that unlawful liberty.

4. Therefore the clergy cannot lawfully obey the order for their reading the declaration.

Copy of a Letter in Archbishop Sancroft's own hand.

My lord; This is only in my own name, and in the name of some of our brethren now here upon the place, earnestly to desire you, immediately upon the receipt of this letter, to come hither with what convenient speed you can, not taking notice to any that you are sent for. Wishing you a prosperous journey and us all a happy meeting,

I remain your very loving brother.

Two Letters to the Archbishop from the Bishop of Winchester [MEWS.]

May it please your Grace;

Though I was to-morrow to begin a course of phys, yet I shall, God willing, come part of the way towards you: and am your obedient son and servant,

P. WINCHESTER.

Farnham Castle, May 13, 1688.

May it please your Grace;

The wounds in my hand, which have of late been uneasy to me, have this night afflicted me to that degree, that I am forced to let blood, and so am made at present incapable for to bear the motion of a coach. What ease I may receive by this I cannot yet tell, though it hath formerly been successful. But it is very uneasy to me that I am disappointed in my intentions of waiting on you. I beg your pardon and prayers for your obedient son and servant,

P. WINCHESTER.

Letter to Archbishop Sancroft from John Tillotson, D. D. Dean of Canterbury.

May it please your Grace;

Though I am very sensible, how unfit I am to advise in difficult cases, yet I could never forgive myself, if I should be wanting to our religion and church in any thing, wherein your grace shall think I may be in the least serviceable; and therefore I shall not fail, God willing, to wait upon your grace to-morrow morning at the hour appointed. I humbly beg your grace's blessing, and remain, my lord, your grace's, &c.

J. TILLOTSON.

Letter to the Archbishop from the Bishop of Landaff [BEAW.]

May 27, 1688.

May it please your Grace;

There came to my hands from my brother of Gloucester, Friday night last, a copy of a petition, delivered to his majesty by six bishops of your province, on behalf of your graces themselves, and of others their absent brethren.

My lord, I was one of those absent; but I was absent in body only, my soul went along with them. I wholly concurred with them with my heart, and I now send my hand to bear testimony thereto.

Because I find I cannot be back soon enough in my diocese (whither I am hastening) to give a stop to the distributions myself, I have ordered a messenger to be dispatched with all speed to my chancellor (who is upon the place) with my commands to him, to detain what declarations shall be sent, and I make no doubt but to be obeyed.

God preserve your grace; grant us all to be of one mind; and to dare to do well in evil times. This is the prayer of your grace's most humble and dutiful servant,

W. LANDAFF.

Letter from the Bishop of Worcester [THOMAS.]

Worcester, June 3d. —88.

Worthy Sir;

I thank you for your congratulating my recovery, which as yet is so very infirm I rather creep than go. I pray present my dutifully devoted observance to my lord's grace of Canterbury. I pray God direct and prosper his steerage of the church of England in these tempestuous times. In a cordial compliance with his grace's pious conduct in the late petition presented to the king, I have retained in my custody the packet of the printed copies of the royal declaration of indulgence, which I could not transmit to the clergy of my diocese committed to my pastoral charge (salva conscientia, salvo honore ecclesiae Anglicanae). It is a piercing, wounding affliction to me to incur his majesty's displeasure, to be misinterpreted guilty of the least degree of disloyalty or ingratitude (which my soul abhors) towards my inexpressibly obliging master and benefactor, patron and sovereign, whose special mandate I have received in the concern of the indulgence imparted to me by the lord bishop of St. David's; wherein nothing could divert or slacken my intire submission and utmost conformity, but my dread of the indignation of the King of Kings, to whom, being near the brink of the grave, I must shortly give an account of my managing of the episcopal station (wherein God be merciful to me), I apprehend it a duty incumbent on me, indispensibly strict, to be a skreen to my clergy, to endeavour to secure them from sins and perils, not to lay trains for either, by recommending the publication of that to their parishioners, wherein my own judgment is abundantly dissatisfied, and theirs also.

I resolve by God's gracious assistance to suffer the greatest temporal evil of distress rather than to act or promote the least spiritual evil of guilt: I rest your faithful friend to serve you,

W. WORCESTER.

Letter from the Bishop of Carlisle [SMITH] to the Bishop of Ely [TURNER.]

Rose Castle, June 4, 1688.

My very good Lord,

Your kind letter of the 26th past came safe to my hands on the 31st, for which I return your lordship my most humble thanks, and do account myself very much obliged to you for it; it having acquainted me with many particulars whereof till then I was wholly ignorant. The petition itself had been sent me some few days before, with which I was so very much pleased and satisfied, that I immediately resolved to take the first opportunity of declaring my assent to it, and my very hearty concurrence with your lordships in it. I desire you will be pleased to let me know in what form you would have me do it, for at present I am at a loss, in regard to the title of your petition (running for the province of Canterbury only) seems to have shut me out, at which I must confess I did (at the first reading of it) somewhat repine. With all this, my lord, I beg you will please to acquaint my lord's grace, to whom I present my most humble duty, and my very humble service to yourself, and the rest of the seven, remaining ever (my very good lord) your lordship's most affectionate brother and most faithful servant,

THO. CARLIOL.

My lord, I have disposed of your letter, so as your lordship directed, no eye having seen the inside of it but my own.

Yesterday, your lordship knows, was the day appointed for the first reading of the declaration, but I do not believe it was read by any one man of this diocese.

When your lordship shall give me the honour of another letter, be pleased to put it under a cover, directed to Mr. John Nicholson, at Rose Castle, near Carlisle, Cumberland.

The PETITION of some of the Bishops to his Majesty [K. JAMES 2.] against distributing and reading his Declaration for Liberty of Conscience; with some proceedings thereupon.

On Friday, May 18th, 1688, a Petition to the king was formed at Lambeth, by William lord archbishop of Canterbury, and several suffragan bishops of that province; (viz. Henry lord bishop of London, William of St. Asaph, Francis of Ely, John of Chichester, Thomas of Bath and Wells, Thomas of Peterborough, and Jonathan of Bristol;) in the presence, and with the consent of John Tillotson, D. D. dean of Canterbury, Edward Stillingfleet, D. D. dean of St. Paul's, Simon Patrick, D. D. dean of Peterborough, Thomas Tenison, D. D. vicar of St. Martin's in the fields, Robert Grove, D. D. rector of St. Andrew's Undershaft, and William Sherlock, D. D. master of the Temple. The tenor of the Petition was as followeth:

[Here follows the Petition, see p. 239.]

In the evening of the same day, the petition being finished, all the subscribers (except the archbishop, who had been forbidden the court almost two years before,) went over to Whitehall to deliver it to the king. In order thereto the bishop of St. Asaph went first to the earl of Middleton, (principal secretary) in the name of all the rest, to desire his assistance for the introducing them to his majesty: but he had been sick for a fortnight before, and so confined to his chamber. Then St. Asaph (his brethren staying at the earl of Dartmouth's house) went, and made the like application to the earl of Sunderland, desiring him to peruse the petition, and acquaint his majesty with it, that he might not be surprised at the delivery of it; and withal to beseech his majesty to assign the time and place, when and where they might all attend him, and present their petition. The earl refused to inspect the petition, but went immediately, and acquainted the king with their desire; and they were presently thereupon brought to the king in his closet within his bed-chamber; where the bishop of St. Asaph with the rest, (all being upon their knees,) delivered their petition to his majesty. The king was pleased (at first) to receive the petitioners and their petition graciously, and upon the first opening of it to say, this is my Lord of Canterbury's own hand: to which the bishops replied, yes, Sir, it is his own hand. But the king, having read it over, and then folding it up, said thus, or to this effect.*

King. This is a great surprise to me: here are strange words. I did not expect this from you. This is a standard of rebellion.

St. Asaph (and some of the rest) replied, that they had adventured their lives for his majesty; and would lose the last drop of their blood, rather than lift up a finger against him.

King. I tell you this is a standard of rebellion: I never saw such an address!

Bristol (falling down on his knees) said, Rebellion! Sir, I beseech your majesty, do not say so hard a thing of us. For God's sake do not believe, we are, or can be guilty of a rebellion. It is impossible, that I or any of my family should be so. Your majesty cannot but remember, that you sent me down into Cornwall to quell Monmouth's rebellion; and

* The account commonly reported of what passed between the king and the bishops upon their delivery of the Petition is that given by Kennet, as follows:

"Upon the reading of it the king startled, and shewed himself to be very much incensed, and made this answer in a very angry manner: I have heard of this before, but did not believe it. I did not expect this from the church of England, especially from some of you. If I change my mind, you shall hear from me; if not, I expect my command shall be obeyed. The bishops replied, We resign ourselves to the will of God; and then immediately retired."

I am as ready to do what I can to quell another, if there were occasion.

Chichester. Sir, we have quelled one rebellion, and will not raise another.

Ely. We rebel, Sir! we are ready to die at your feet.

Bath and Wells. Sir, I hope you will give that liberty to us, which you allow to all mankind.

Peterburgh. Sir, you allow liberty of conscience to all mankind: the reading this declaration is against our conscience.

King. I will keep this paper. It is the strangest address which I ever saw: it tends to rebellion. Do you question my dispensing power? Some of you here have printed, and preached for it, when it was for your purpose.

Peterburgh. Sir, what we say of the dispensing power refers only to what was declared in parliament.

King. The dispensing power was never questioned by the men of the church of England.

St. Asaph. It was declared against in the first parliament called by his late majesty, and by that which was called by your majesty.

The King (insisting upon the tendency of the petition to rebellion) said, he would have his declaration published.

Bath and Wells. We are bound to fear God, and honour the king. We desire to do both: we will honour you; we must fear God.

King. Is this what I have deserved, who have supported the Church of England, and will support it? I will remember you that have signed this paper. I will keep this paper; I will not part with it. I did not expect this from you; especially from some of you. I will be obeyed in publishing my declaration.

Bath and Wells. God's will be done.

King. What's that?

Bath and Wells. God's will be done, and so said Peterburgh.

King. If I think fit to alter my mind, I will send to you. God hath given me this dispensing power, and I will maintain it. I tell you, there are seven thousand men, and of the Church of England too, that have not bowed the knee to Baal.

This is the sum of what passed, as far as the bishops could recollect it; and, this being said, they were dismissed.

The petition was after approved and subscribed by divers of the absent bishops: sc. by Henry London, May 23rd, Will. Norwich, May 23rd, Robert Gloucester, May 21st, Seth Sarum, May 26th, William Landaff, May 27th, William Worcester, June 3rd, Peter Winchester, May —, Tho. Exon, May 29th.

Thus things remained for some time after: and though in the mean while many, and very different methods of severity intended against us were spoken of in the talk of the town, yet nothing seems to have been resolved on;

at least nothing was done till Sunday May 27th. Late in the evening that day one of his majesty's messengers served the archbishop of Canterbury with the following summons.

"Locus Sigilli. Robert earl of Sunderland, baron Spencer of Wormleighton, president of his majesty's most honourable privy council, principal secretary of state, and knight of the most noble order of the garter, &c.

"These are in his majesty's name to require William lord archbishop of Canterbury, to appear personally before his majesty in council upon the eighth day of June next, at five in the afternoon, to answer to such matters of misdemeanor, as on his majesty's behalf shall then and there be objected against him: and you are hereby required to summon the said William lord archbishop of Canterbury to appear accordingly: and for so doing this shall be your warrant. Given at the court at Whitehall the 27th day of May 1688.

"To sir John Taylor, one of his Majesty's Messengers in ordinary."

So many of the petitioners as were in town, (viz. the bishops of Ely, Chichester, and Peterburgh) were at the same time served with the like summons by other of the king's messengers; and the like sent after the rest, who were gone home into their dioceses.

Letter to the Archbishop from the Bishop of Norwich [LLOYD.]

May it please your Grace; June 1, 1688.

I should have waited upon your grace had I not been harrassed with the new distemper (as its called) and thereby been confined to my chamber for these two days last past.

I was last Wednesday with Mr. Henry Pollexphen, who promised to appear for your grace, and the rest of my lords the bishops, if desired so to do. I asked of him, whether I might acquaint your grace with what he promised? His answer was, I pray give my duty to his grace, and assure him, that I will faithfully serve him, as far as my skill in my profession will enable me.

I have sent your grace the papers that your grace was pleased to communicate unto me, which with my due thanks and humble duty tendered is all at present. From your grace's most obliged servant, to command,

WILLIAM NORWICH.

Letter to the Archbishop from the Bishop of London [COMPTON.]

My Lord;

Friday.

I was yesterday in town, but had not time to wait upon you. I thought it therefore my duty to give you the best intelligence I could meet with, which was this; they were resolved before the time of your appearing to make all the clerks of the council justices of the peace. He that discovered this seemed likewise to hint, that it was done to capacitate them to take your several recognizances. What use this may be to you, I know not; but I thought it my duty to impart so much from, my lord, your grace's most faithful servant,

H. LONDON.

Letter to the Archbishop from the Bishop of Ely: with two Papers.

Ely House, Friday Morn.

May it please your Grace;

We spent much time yesternight with our ablest and kindest advisers, who are unanimous in this opinion, that we should by no means answer particular questions, but keep to the general; what are the matters of misdemeanor against us; and desire a copy of our charge. Two of our number had a long discourse (even till past eleven at night) with sir R. Sawyer, from whom we received more instruction than from all the rest. That conference is summed up in the inclosed half sheet of paper [N^o I.] and our measures of answering are set down to us. The other paper (the sheet) [N^o II.] are the minutes out of the counsel book on my lord Lovelace's case. All our wise friends are of the mind that we should give no recognizances. We shall attend your grace between two and three (cum Deo) Your grace's most obedient servant,

FRA. ELY.

N^o I.

Our appearance before the Council.

Q. Whether the privy council, being no court of record, can require us to enter into recognizances for appearance in any case, where they are not particularly authorised so to do by act of parliament?—A. Never done.

It does not appear that any of the House of Lords ever gave recognizances for misdemeanor.

The privy council have not committed for misdemeanor.

If no recognizances be given, their proceedings with us must be by subpoena out of the King's Bench; and then we may imparle till the term after.

Q. My lords, do you own this petition to be yours? And are these your subscriptions?

A. The petition was delivered to the king personally: his majesty knows what we delivered. Therefore before we make answer to this question, which may accuse ourselves, we humbly desire to know, whether the king requires it of us?

[The following paragraph in the archbishop's hand:]

We are not bound to accuse ourselves. Notwithstanding, if the king requires it, we will declare the true matter of fact; trusting in his majesty's justice and generosity, that it shall not be turned to our prejudice.*

* Tindal, in a Note to his translation of Rapin, says,

"It seems as the bishops were going to the

May it please your Majesty;

We are summoned here to answer to matters of misdemeanor which shall be objected against us; which objections we are ready to receive; and when we have received them we shall humbly beg, that we may be allowed some convenient time to advise what answer to make.

We are here, in obedience to his majesty's commands, to receive our charge, if there be any against us: but we humbly desire, that we may be excused from answering questions from whence occasion may be taken against us.

Whatever we did, we did it not out of any factious or seditious design, but out of a sense of our duty, both as prelates of the church and peers of the realm, to lay before your majesty the obligation that lies upon us to preserve the laws of the land, and our religion according to the reformation. And we should not have interposed herein, had not your majesty's order for publishing the declaration in our churches made it necessary for us to apply to your majesty.

N^o II.

The lord Lovelace gave no positive answers to the affidavits of words spoken by him;

But desired copies of them, that he might advise with counsel, and have time to give his answer: which copies were not granted.

It was told him it was matter of fact.

His answer was, He had not skill in the laws, but perhaps matter of law might arise upon perusal of those affidavits.

And his lordship asked, What reparation he was to expect, in case those who had sworn to the affidavits should be proved perjured?

The attorney was ordered to bring an information against his lordship, in the King's Bench, the next term.

But there was not any recognizance tendered to his lordship for his appearing.

Nor can it be remembered, that any such council, they were advised to remember, that no man was obliged by the law to accuse himself. Accordingly when the king in council, holding the petition in his hand, asked them whether they had signed that paper? They made a low bow and said nothing. What! says the king. Do you deny your own hands? Upon which they silently bowed again. Then the king told them, If they would own it to be their hands, upon his royal word not a hair of their head should be touched: whereupon the archbishop says, Relying on your majesty's word, I confess it to be my hand. And so said all the rest. Then being ordered to withdraw, when they were called in again, they found the king vanished, and Jefferies in the chair, who using them very roughly, sent them to the Tower. The translator had these particulars from the late bishop of Durham's own mouth." Rapin's History of England, vol. 2, p. 763, Note, 3rd edition.

recognizance hath been tendered to any peer of the realm for the like appearance.

The Bishops appear again.

On Friday, June 8th, at five in the afternoon, his majesty came into the privy council. About half an hour after, the archbishop and six bishops, who were attending in the next room, were called into the council chamber, and graciously received by his majesty.

The lord chancellor took a paper then lying on the table, and shewing it to the archbishop, asked him in words to this effect—

Is this the Petition, that was written and signed by your grace, and which these bishops presented to his majesty?

The archbishop received the paper from the lord chancellor, and addressing himself to his majesty, said to this purpose—

Sir, I am called hither as a criminal; which I never was before in my life, and little thought I ever should be, especially before your majesty: but, since it is my unhappiness to be so at this time, I hope your majesty will not be offended, that I am cautious of answering questions. No man is obliged to answer questions, that may tend to the accusing of himself.

His majesty called this chicanery, and hoped he would not deny his hand.

The archbishop still insisted upon it, that there could be no other end of this question, but to draw such an answer from him, as might afford ground for an accusation; and therefore desired, there might be no answer required of him. St. A—— said, all divines of all Christian churches agree in this, that no man in our circumstances is obliged to answer any such question. The king still pressing for an answer with some seeming impatience, the archbishop said, Sir, though we are not obliged to give any answer to this question, yet, if your majesty lays your commands upon us, we shall answer it, in trust upon your majesty's justice and generosity, that we shall not suffer for our obedience, as we must, if our answer should be brought in evidence against us. His majesty said, no; I will not command you: if you will deny your own hands, I know not what to say to you, &c. The lord chancellor said, withdraw. After about half a quarter of an hour they were called in again: then the lord chancellor said, his majesty has commanded me to require you to answer this question—Whether these be your hands that are set to this Petition? His majesty himself also said, I command you to answer this question. Then the archbishop took the Petition, and having read it over, said, I own, that I writ this petition, and that this is my hand. Then the lord chancellor asked each of the bishops; and they all acknowledged their hands, and that they delivered this Petition. Then they were commanded to withdraw. After a while they were called in a third time. Then the lord chancellor told them, it is his majesty's pleasure to have you proceeded against for this Petition; but it shall be with all fairness in Westminster-hall: there will be an information against you, which you are to answer; and in order to that you are to enter into a recognizance. The archbishop said, that without a recognizance they should be ready to appear and to answer, whensoever they were called. One of the bishops said, the lord Lovelace had been called before the council to answer to a complaint that was brought in against him, and that he was allowed to answer it in Westminster-hall without entering into any recognizance; and that they hoped, they might be allowed to answer in like nature. The lord chancellor said, the lord Lovelace had affronted his majesty, and had behaved himself very rudely before them; and therefore his majesty would have him proceeded against the common way; but, for the bishops there present, his majesty was pleased to treat them with all favour in respect of their character; and therefore he would have them enter into recognizance. His majesty was pleased to say, I offer you this as a favour, and I would not have you refuse it. St. A—— said, whatsoever favour your majesty vouchsafes to offer to any person, you are pleased to leave it to him whether he will accept it, or no; and you do not expect he should accept it to his own prejudice. We conceive, that this entering into recognizance may be prejudicial to us; and therefore we hope your majesty will not be offended at our declining it. Then the lord chancellor said, there are but three ways to proceed in matters of this kind; it must be either by commitment, or by recognizance, or by subpoena out of the King's-Bench. His majesty was not willing to take the common way in proceeding against you, but he would give you leave to enter into recognizance; and his lordship again advised them to accept it. Some of the bishops said, they were informed, that no man was obliged to enter into recognizance, unless there were special matter against him, and that there was oath of it made against that person: this they said not considering, that now the Petition was made special matter, and that their confessing it was as good as an oath. But at last they insisted on this, that there was no precedent for it, that any member of the House of Peers should be bound in recognizance for misdemeanor. The lord chancellor said there were precedents for it; but, being desired to name one, he named none. The bishops desired to be proceeded against the common way; but that was not allowed, and they were a third time commanded to withdraw.

Awhile after they were called in a fourth time, and asked, whether they had considered of it better? and, whether they would accept his majesty's favour? The archbishop said, he had the advice of the best counsel in town; and they had warned him of this, assuring him, it would be to his prejudice; and therefore he desired, that it might not be required, offering his promise again to appear and to answer, whensoever he should be called. But his majesty seemed to be displeased, and said, you will believe others before you will believe me: so they were the fourth time commanded to withdraw.

A good while after this the earl of Berkeley came forth to the bishops, and endeavoured first to persuade the archbishop to enter into recognizance, which he thought had been agreed between them over night; for on Thursday night, almost at bed time, his lordship came to the archbishop at Lambeth, and after half an hour's discourse at last came to speak of his appearing at council the next day, and then advised his grace to offer a recognizance: his grace said, I am advised to that way: his lordship said, that is well, and soon after took his leave. Now he seemed to look upon it as something strange, that his grace should refuse to enter into recognizance: but, finding him fixed, he endeavoured to persuade the other bishops. He told them, he would do it, if he were in their case; but, finding them all of a mind, he went outward from the council, but soon after returned that way into the council chamber again: from whence about half an hour after came forth Mr. Riley, a serjeant at arms, with the warrant, signed with fourteen hands, to carry the seven bishops to the Tower; and another warrant, with nineteen hands and seals, for the lieutenant of the Tower to keep them in safe custody.

Dialogue between the King and Bishops after the third or fourth coming in.

A. Sir, we appear before you this day by virtue of your summons as criminals; the first time that ever I stood as a criminal before any man, and I am sorry that it happens to be before my sovereign lord. We are advised, Sir, that they, who are in this condition of criminals, are not obliged to answer to questions, which may be to their prejudice: notwithstanding, if your majesty requires it of us, we will tell you the true matter of fact, trusting in your majesty's justice and generosity, that no advantage shall be taken against us from our confession.

Q. Is this your petition?

R. Pray, Sir, give us leave to see it; and, if upon perusal it appears to be the same——yes, Sir; this is our petition, and these are our subscriptions.

Q. Who were present at the forming of it?

R. All we, who have subscribed it.

Q. Were no other persons present?

R. 'Tis our great infelicity, that we are here as criminals; and your majesty is so just and generous, that you will not require us to accuse either ourselves or others.

Q. Upon what occasion came you to London?

R. I received an intimation from the archbishop, that my advice and assistance was required in the affairs of the church.

Q. What were the affairs which you consulted of?—R. The matter of the Petition.

Q. What is the temper you are ready to come to with the dissenters?

R. We refer ourselves to the Petition.

Q. What mean you by the dispensing power being declared illegal in parliament?

R. The words are so plain, that we cannot use any plainer.

Q. What want of prudence or honour is there in obeying the king?

R. What is against conscience is against prudence, and honour too; especially in persons of our character.

Q. Why is it against your conscience?

R. Because our consciences oblige us (as far as we are able) to preserve our laws and religion according to the reformation.

Q. Is the dispensing power then against law?—R. We refer ourselves to the Petition.

Q. How could the distributing and reading the declaration make you parties to it?

R. We refer ourselves to our Petition, whether the common and reasonable construction of mankind would not make it so.

Q. Did you disperse a printed letter in the country, or otherwise dissuade any of the clergy from reading it?

R. If this be one of the articles of misdemeanor against us, we desire to answer it with the rest.

General. We acknowledge the Petition: we are summoned to appear here to answer such matters of misdemeanor, as should be objected; we therefore humbly desire a copy of our charge, and that time convenient may be allowed us to advise about it, and answer it. We are here in obedience to his majesty's command to receive our charge, but humbly desire, we may be excused from answering questions, from whence occasion may be taken against us.

Warrant of Commitment of the Bishops to the Tower.

Letter to the Archbishop from the Bishop of London.

My Lord;

Saturday.

This comes to bring that service to you, which by the help of God shall be never wanting. I am sorry with all my heart, that his majesty has no more confidence in his best friends. I pray God give you your health during your continuance in this place, which will, I hope, be but a very short time. How long I shall be from you I cannot tell: but you may be assured my heart shall be ever with you. And whilst I am at liberty, I beseech you not to spare me in any thing I am able to perform. It is not now a time of ceremony; and therefore I should hate myself, if I had the least regret in undergoing any duty, whereby I might most express myself, my lord, your grace's, &c.

I forgot when I waited upon you yesterday to mention sir John Holt of Grayes Inne. Indeed you ought to take him in for many reasons: and I know he has a hearty desire, as well as skill, to serve you. If you have any commands for me, I beseech you send them by the bearer to, My lord, your grace's, &c.

Letter to the Archbishop from the Bishop of Norwich: with one enclosed from Sir Thomas Clarges.

May it please your Grace; 8 o'clock.

When I returned from your grace I found the enclosed left at my lodgings by sir Thomas Clarges. I would not have troubled your grace with it but for the last line of it.

I do believe your grace nor my lords will be sent for to Westminster to-morrow: not only upon the authority of the enclosed, but from other hands, I find, that its not thought fit to bring you to Westminster to-morrow: the reasons I shall respite till to-morrow betimes in the morning: in the mean time I heartily pray for your grace his happiness and the rest of my lords at the Tower, and am Your grace's most obliged servant, to command,

WILLIAM NORWICH.

My Lord;

At Mr. Finch his chamber I met my lord of Nottingham, whose opinion was, That it is best for the lords to plead the generall issue: because upon a tryall they could say more, and give more in evidence, than could be expressed in a plea. Mr. Finch was not thoroughly convinced, but said, if the information were so penn'd that the petition would be at large included in it, he should think it might be best to plead the general issue, yet he would conclude nothing thereof, till he should advize with the rest of their lordships' counsel. I went from him to Mr. Grang the attorney, and he agreed, That if the matter was fully mentioned in the information he believed the counsel must advize to plead the general issue. It is said the master of the office will stick the jury, and will name eight and forty, whereof the attorney for the king would put out 12, and the attorney for the lords as many: and it may be hoped, in so many, there may be a competent number of good men. My lord of Nottingham is gone to the Tower. There will be about twenty peers at Westminster to-morrow to serve the lords, if need be: but I am told by a friend, the king's attorney will not be ready till Saturday or Monday. I am your lordship's, &c.

THO. CLARGES.

Letter to Mrs. Nalson from Dr. Nalson.

I might tell you, to excuse my silence, that I have been ill, but all privet concern and thought of ceremony must give place to that extreme trouble we must needs all of us be in whilst our spirituall fathers are under confinement; a triall of patience so great that it were cruelty to expect we should not bemoan ourselves; but if it be a crime to lament (what the higher powers here below command so severely) innumerable are the transgressors; for ever since the black Friday sentence the nobles of both sexes keep their constant court at the Tower, where every day vast multitudes of all conditions run perpetually, all in tears, to beg the holy men's blessings: the soldiers wait as mourners, and become so devout, that though the scene be truly sad, the end I hope will be the saving of many, and a most glorious confirmation of the truth, and the sacredness of our religion, which seems to be now brought on a public stage, that all the world may see more clearly her conformity to what the first confessors embraced and recommended so very tenderly to mankind's care and affection. Thanks be to God, who gives us pastors that will not (nor, by a criminall silence, give others encouragement to) lead us astray. I need not tell you how much this integrity of the bishops has served to convince their censurers of rash and uncharitable conceits, nor how sensible people grow of the fatal consequences of weakening the established church by a humoursome dread of her severity. I am willing to hope that the storm that's grown so loud, and seems still to denounce terrible things, will end in a glorious calm: it will do so to all that are wise and true of heart. Let's, dear friend, pray and endeavour to love God more, and with sincere humility set ourselves to the practice of all Christian virtues.

fessors will be sent for to Westminster; they will not be solitaires there. God Almighty overrule the hearts of the children of men, and, if it be his blessed will, deliver our saints from all that wish them evil.

June the 14th, 1688.

My service to your good neighbours, who I dare say pray for us.

Some heads to discourse on and consider.

1. Each counsel to have ten guineas sent them to-day.
2. Some one hand ought to give all fees: because when two pay it breeds confusion, and may cause both to pay for the same thing.
3. Those who are to act as attornies must unite in temper and affection, and go to counsel together, not apart, that both equally knowing the result of advices may follow them accordingly.
4. That three of the lords may act and direct for all the rest.
5. That the officers of the Tower be considered as shall be thought fit.
6. And the warders who come up to attend your lordships gratified in like manner.

[The following in the archbishop's hand.]

7. To correct and supply the narrative of what past between the king and the bishops at the delivery of the petition.
8. To set down an exact narrative of what past in the council-chamber, June 8th, between the king, the lord chancellor, and the bishops.

Letter to the Archbishop from the Bishop of Winchester.

May it please your Grace;

This waits upon you with a tender of my most humble duty; and though I cannot by this way express the deep sense I have of your grace's and my brethren's sufferings, yet I beseech you be assured, that as I am not wanting in my prayers for you and them, so I shall never sacrifice the honour of our zealously loyal mother the church to any interest whatsoever. Minutes for his Grace of Canterbury: Prepared by Mr. Hanses, to have been spoken at the Trial.

That it is a very sensible affliction, both with respect to the church of England and to himself, to appear in a court of justice as a criminal; but as the loyalty of the church, as well in her principles as constant practices, have been so conspicuous; and his grace having in the whole course of his life approved himself a true son of that church, in the point of duty and obedience as in all other particulars, so he doth not doubt so to make his innocence and integrity appear on this occasion, as not only to acquit himself to the court and to the world from all sedition, malice, faction and libelling, great crimes in themselves, and which he has in the utmost detestation, but effectually to prevent any imputation to the church of England on this occasion.

That it has pleased God to call him to the great dignity, office and authority, of an archbishop in this church; whereby he has the honour to be primus par Angliæ; and as the charge committed to him is greater, so he thought it more incumbent upon him to take an exact care, to discharge a good conscience in the exercise of that great dignity, and the more carefully to watch over that flock God had committed to him: and this God, this nation, and the world required of him.

That he always esteemed it his duty, as a prelate, not only to do his utmost endeavour to conserve the profession of the reformed religion amongst us, but to promote the honour and interest of the church, and to oppose, as far as lawfully he could, all that tended to her ruin, and struck at her safety (for which glorious ends he was always ready even to lay down his life, if ever it should please God to call him to it.) And as a peer of the realm he thought himself likewise under very great obligations, not only not to betray the laws himself, but also to endeavour to transmit them to posterity, that the ages to come might have no reason to curse his memory.

That as all his brethren, the bishops of this church, so he more eminently, were counsellors to the king by their office, in matters ecclesiastical, as the temporal peers were of his counsel in lay matters, and his judges in matters of law: that the reformed bishops had always shewed themselves honest counsellors, and faithful servants to the crown.

That his majesty having thought fit to publish his Declaration for liberty of conscience, where at once he had suspended all ecclesiastical laws whatsoever, it was obvious to observe, how fatal this must needs prove both to the church and religion established, and the laws of the land.

But being unwilling to intermeddle, till there was absolute necessity for it, in a matter that might possibly give offence to the king, whose good opinion and favour we are ambitious to preserve, so far as it can be done without a violation of our consciences, or betraying the trust by God and the laws reposed in us: till the matter was brought home to our own doors, by an order published in the Gazette for the reading of the last Declaration, &c. he was loath to reflect so much upon it, as he has found himself obliged to do since.

Then he apprehended it was high time to consider what would become him to do with regard to God, the king, and his own conscience; and therefore seriously considering the said Declaration, and how far he could comply with the king's command for the reading of it, if it should be legally sent to him, which he apprehends it has not yet been, a publication in a Gazette not being such a due notice as he was obliged to have any regard to: however, having attentively considered it, he soon found how it shook the force of all our laws, and the very foundation of the reformed church of England, and in that the whole Protestant religion; that it seemed to alter the whole frame of the government, and introduce a new constitution; and with respect to ecclesiastical affairs, which was more his concern, he found all the statutes of provisors, for maintaining of which our Popish ancestors in all ages had so zealously contended, set aside; all the laws for asserting the rights and liberties of this church, and all that supremacy and superiority in matters, and over persons ecclesiastical, which our church justly attributes to the king, and which all good Christian kings have ever exercised, &c. in opposition to the groundless and unjust usurpations of the pope and church of Rome, suspended, and in effect abolished. That it was apparent, that if the king had that power, which in those declarations he had exercised, the reformation itself was become arbitrary, and that the church of England, as it was the religion of the state, had no other subsistence, but by the king's mere favour. Whereas he did humbly hope he might say, it was founded upon a much firmer basis, if all the laws made against Popery, and for the establishment and security of the Protestant religion, were in being and full force; all which, by virtue of this supposed power of the king, were laid asleep and set aside. That for such laws as punished men for the exercise of their religion, or their dissent from the church, he was no otherwise concerned, than as they were laws of the land; and as such, he humbly conceives, cannot be suspended by a less authority than that which first made them, they being only laws of state, and always so considered by him and the church. [And here may be said what shall be judged convenient about taking off penal laws against Dissenters.]

But that which more nearly touched him, was, that thereby all those laws, by which the church has its legal establishment, and by which she is fenced and guarded against the sworn enemies of her peace, are vacated and made useless; that all the acts of uniformity, and all the acts for taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and the tests, are suspended and dispensed with; all which laws are so much the fences, the mounds and the bulwarks of the Protestant religion and the church of England, that no man can concur to the weakening or destroying of them, without betraying at once his religion and the laws of the land.

These were the consequences and effects of that power, and these we were commanded to make ourselves parties to in publishing and teaching them to our people.

That seemed apparently to tend to the introducing of Popery again, and the destruction of the church of England and the Protestant religion amongst us, which so many of our predecessors had sealed with their blood.

That he could not but think himself under the highest obligations to lay these things to heart, and to bethink himself, how to do his duty on this great occasion; that he might neither lie under the imputation of want of zeal for his religion, or be thought wilfully disobedient to the king; for he clearly saw he could not in prudence, honour, or conscience, obey him.

He called to mind what his predecessors had done on the like occasions. He remembered that archbishop Abbot wrote a very bold and a very honest letter to king James 1, in the 21st year of his reign, on this very subject of dispensing with the laws in matters of religion; at which that king took no offence: wherein he told him, that he thought it the duty of his place, to let him know, that the "toleration he [endeavoured] to set up by proclamation could not be done without a parliament, unless his majesty would let his subjects see, that he would take unto himself ability to throw down the laws of the land at his pleasure." Rushworth, vol. 1, p. 85.

He remembered what king James 1. himself, during the treaty of the Spanish match, had replied to a demand of the king of Spain about a general toleration; "that he, of his own authority, could not grant a general liberty of exercising the Roman religion." Rushworth, vol. 1, p. 67.

That, in the same king's time, a prohibition to the judges and bishops to execute the laws against Papists was laid aside, and this reason given for it by the lord keeper Williams: "Because to forbid the judges and justices of a peace against their oaths was a thing unprecedented in this kingdom." Rushworth, vol. 1, fol. 101.

And that, 2 Charles 1, by the king's command the earl of Bristol was impeached in the Lords House for having but presumed to counsel the king against law, "to grant a free toleration and silencing of all the laws made and standing in force against the Papists." Rushworth, p. 251.

And that in parliament in 1662 and 1672, and the last parliament, this power had been questioned and declared illegal, &c.

That thereupon he thought it his duty to attend his majesty, in hopes, if not to move his majesty from the main point, yet humbly to lay his reasons before him, why he could not comply with his majesty, and prevail of him to revoke his command as to the reading of it, &c.

And this being a thing of the greatest importance, he was unwilling to be alone in it; especially considering that it was the common cause of the whole church, he was willing to have the advice and assistance of all his brethren that were in and near the town.

That being met, and the whole matter laid before them, and all having an equal zeal for the Protestant religion, and concern for the laws of the land, and clearly seeing he had not made a false judgment of this matter, and concurring in opinion with him, they all concluded to make an humble address to the king; and having conceived it in the most soft and modest terms that could be, without affixing any thing directly in derogation of the king's power, but laying only before him what had been done and declared before that time, and letting him know with the greatest decency, that in conscience they could not comply with his commands, and humbly begging him to be so gracious, as not to insist upon his command, and hoping that when all his majesty's subjects had liberty of conscience, those who had most pretence to it should not be the only persons to whom it is denied: and therefore presumed with greater confidence to wait on the king, which yet they did not do, till leave had been obtained from the king, and that they were introduced into the king's closet, where they privately and humbly laid themselves and their address at his feet.

That this being the fact, and these the inducements; that in all this they having done nothing but what became them both as prelates and peers in the discharge of their duties, and that in the most humble and secret way that could be; that it being the right of every subject in England to petition, and their petition being delivered with the king's leave, and the matter of it so modest and inoffensive, and the terms so dutiful and respectful; he cannot believe he need use many words to persuade men of conscience, integrity, and understanding, how strange a thing it would be to turn such a petition into a libel, and the honest discharge of their conscience and duty into an offence.

*A Speech prepared by the Bishop of St. Asaph, to have been spoken at * our Trial.*

My Lords, and you Gentlemen of the Jury; We are here before you under a load of accusation, such as was never laid before upon so many of our order (I think) in this, or any other kingdom. It is a load, that we should sink under, considering from whence it cometh, if we were not supported with (give me leave to say) a good conscience, and testimony of Him that is greater than our conscience, and knoweth all things. Without this it would overwhelm us to think, that our gracious prince, of whose favour and bounty we have had so much and so long experience; that he should at last look upon us, as so undutiful, so ungrateful, as we are set forth in this information; nay, as we must acknowledge ourselves to be, if we had given any colour to this information: we had been monsters indeed, if we had given any just grounds for it. We to conspire against the king!—to undermine his government by making and publishing seditious libels! What strange kind of men would they make of us! We, that not only by past obligations, but by our present interests, and all our hopes of this life and the future, have not only the strongest, but all possible motives to hold us to obedience and loyalty! In a word, we, whose holy religion teaches us, under pain of damnation, not to rebel against our king, though he be of another religion; nay, though he should be an enemy to our religion! This is the Christian doctrine, which we profess, and which we constantly teach; in which we have always lived, and by the grace of God we will die. Let them say so, if they can, who put you and us to all this trouble, by persuading his majesty otherwise of us.

God be thanked, we have so behaved ourselves not only in former reigns, but even in the reign of his present majesty (whom God long preserve), that they cannot charge us justly with any thing; and least of all with this crime of sedition. They can pretend no other colour for this charge, but what they draw out of a petition, that we lately presented to his majesty. But what is there so criminal in this? For our parts we do not see it: we do not see, that we have transgressed the bounds of our duty. They cannot say we did so much as petition, till we were forced to it. We knew of his majesty's declaration a twelve-month before. We saw, it assumed such a power as we did not understand. We saw, it contained a toleration that we could not approve; that actually took away all the legal establishment of our church, and tended, as far as we could judge, to the bringing in of popery. This we saw with sad hearts: yet all that twelve-month we were silent; we laid our hands on our mouths, which perhaps was a fault in us, but surely deserved another name than sedition. But at last, after a full twelve-month, when this declaration came forth with an order annexed, that we must be parties to it, we were at least to be the instruments for the publishing of it; nay, we must bring in this, as a parenthesis, into the worship of God: this was enough to make the dumb to speak: they would have spoke, they would have roared at it in any church of the Roman communion: they may excuse us, if we could hold silence no longer.

But yet we did not break it neither seditiously; but on the contrary with all the duty in the world. The archbishop of Canterbury, who by his place is counsellor to his majesty, and who ought to be advised with in all things belonging to the church, was so far from being advised with in this, that he knew nothing of it, till he saw it in the Gazette. When he saw this strange thing there, he was at the present surprised with it; he saw what the consequence of it would be; he saw, he must do something to prevent such things as have since happened, or worse: but yet he would do nothing without the advice of his suffragans. He therefore sent for as many as were within call; and with their advice, he resolved to petition his majesty.

The effect of our petition was, as you have heard, to beseech his majesty, that he would not impose this hardship upon us; that he would not lay this burthen on our consciences; that he would give us leave to worship God in quiet, and to enjoy that liberty which the law had given us, and which he was giving to the rest of his people. We do not see that the matter of our petition was seditious. But for that it hath been sufficiently cleared by our counsel.

And for the manner of presenting our petition; this was surely so far from being seditious, that it was with the greatest humility and submission in the world. Before we came to his majesty, we acquainted his principal secretary of state, the lord president of the council; who, if he were present, we presume, would witness for us, that we did what we thought would have secured us from ever having this charge brought in against us. We offered, and desired, that he himself would receive our petition, and shew it his majesty, before we appeared to deliver it; or at least, that he would be informed of the contents, to the end that it might be no surprise to his majesty. I spoke these words, as the bishop of Chichester knows; for he was present there with me. This, we thought, was the dutifullest way we could take to present our petition. If we had known any way more dutiful, we would have taken that; but we knew of no better. And when this was refused by his majesty's secretary, what could we do more? We must follow him, the way he would go. He went and acquainted his majesty; he brought us word, that we had leave to present our petition. We did present it to his majesty alone in his closet. If there was any fault in our petition, his majesty might have covered it; he might have suppress our petition: and if it had pleased his majesty to have done so; if he had but declared that such was his pleasure, there had been no copy of it now remaining in the world.

This is a short account of that seditious libel, as they call it, and of our seditious publishing of it in the presence of his majesty. We know his majesty can do no wrong, but they may that act for him; and do it, in thus charging us and our petition. It is easy to give evil words and hard names to the most innocent persons, and to the best things in the world; but we trust you have the prudence to distinguish, and in that trust we leave our cause in your hands.

Only this we have to say farther; and we have heard our counsel say it, who are better able to judge: they say, this is the greatest cause that ever came to this bar. It is not the proper concern of six or seven bishops: what are they to the great consequence of this cause? The consequence of it extends to the whole church and kingdom; it extends to the Protestant religion, and all the laws of England: the happiness of this and future ages depends upon it. Surely, if ever there was any cause that required mature deliberation, there ought to be the greatest deliberation in the judging of this. We beseech you therefore not to look at all upon us, but upon our cause. And we beseech God to bless his sacred majesty, and to incline his royal heart towards us. We beseech God to forgive them, that have set him against us. We beseech God to direct and govern your councils; that whatsoever becomes of us, the glory of God may be promoted, and that you yourselves may rejoice, and the whole nation may bless God with you, for your wise and righteous verdict.

Letter to the Archbishop from Mr. Ince.

May it please your Grace;

We have watched the jury all night carefully, attending without the door on the stair-head.

They have by order been kept all night without fire or candle, bread, drink, tobacco, or any other refreshment whatever, save only some basons of water and towels this morning about four.

The officers, and our own servants, and others hired by us to watch the officers, have and shall constantly attend, but must be supplied with fresh men to relieve our guards, if need be.

I am informed by my servant and Mr. Grange's, that about midnight they were very loud one among another; and the like happened about three this morning; which makes me collect they are not yet agreed: they beg for a candle to light their pipes, but are denied.

In case a verdict pass for us (which God grant in his own best time) the present consideration will be how the jury shall be treated.*

* Mr. Barrington (Observations on 34 and 35 H. 8), notices that "the 26 H. 8, c. 4, (of which he speaks as introductory of a thorough union of laws between England and Wales) enjoins, that jurors in Wales should not, without leave of the court, be permitted to have either meat or drink." To which he adds, by way of Note, "The ill effects of a bribe to a jury, by their being better feasted perhaps by the plaintiff than the defendant, are not now apprehended, though I am persuaded this was the cause of this injunction; as sir Thomas Smith mentions, that in his time it was usual for the party, who obtained the verdict, to give the jury a dinner. (Commonwealth, p. 74.) I must admit, however, that sir Henry Spelman derives this restraint from an ancient canon, 'quod de nocte non est honestum iudicium exercere.' Rel. Spelm. p. 89, which at the same time accounts for the jury being denied candles, if the leave of the court is not obtained. We now think the regulation a wise one, and adhered to it, because it contributes to the greater dispatch of business; causes at this time, however, did not 'hang' as they do at present: one reason for which (amongst many others) arose from all witnesses in civil causes being examined by the judge, as is still the practice at the crown bar. This informa-

The course is usually each man so many guineas, and a common dinner for them all.

The quantum is at your grace's and my lords' direction.

But it seems to my poor understanding, that the dinner might be spared, least our watchful enemies interpret our entertainment of the jury for a public exultation and a seditious meeting: and so it may be ordered thus:

Each man guineas for his trouble.

And each man a guinea over for his own desire: with my lords order, that I or some other tion with regard to the ancient practice, I remember to have heard from an aged and eminent serjeant, who likewise believed the first precedent for an adjournment to have been within these forty years. Adjournments are, by the great diligence and spirit of the present bench, avoided as much as possible: if a cause, however, lasts more than sixteen hours, it is ridiculous to call it a decision, as attention to the evidence cannot be longer expected.

"Stiernhook expresses himself in the following manner, with regard to the confinement of an English jury: 'Ad absolvendum verò vel condemnandum, in Angliâ, necessitate compelluntur, atque eousque famelici et quasi captivi includuntur, nemine intromisso, donec absolverint seu condemnaverint.' De Jure Sueonum et Gothorum vetusto, Holmiæ, 1672, cap. iv. p. 59."

The passage to which I suppose Mr. Barrington to refer, I find in Smith's Commonwealth, book 2, chap. 18, as follows:

"Then there is a bailiff charged with them to keep them in a chamber not far off, without bread, drink, light, or fire, until they be agreed; that is, till they all agree upon one verdict concerning the same issue, and upon one among them who shall speak for them all when they be agreed: for it goeth not by the most part, but each man must agree. They return, and in so few words as may be, they give their determination: few I call six, or seven, or eight words at the most (for commonly the issue is brought so narrow, that such number of words may be enough to affirm or to deny it), which done, they are dismissed to go whither they will. The party with whom they have given their sentence, giveth the inquest their dinner that day most commonly, and this is all they have for their labour, notwithstanding that they come, some twenty, some thirty, or forty miles or more, to the place where they gave their verdict, all the rest is of their own charge."

As to adjournment in criminal cases, see, moreover, the Trials for Treason in the year 1794; and Stone's Case, A. D. 1796. See, also, vol. 8, p. 730, difference of opinion in an Assize. intreat them, in your names, not to dine together, for the reasons aforesaid.

I conceive my lords the bishops will resolve how to direct me in this point, before they come into court.

There were 22 of the jury appeared, and no more.

And they that did not serve will expect a reward as well as those who did.

I beg your grace's pardon for this trouble: 'tis only to enable my lords to consult what is fit to do decently on our part, and all is entirely submitted to your grace's and my lords judgment by, my lord, your grace's most humble servant,
JO. INCE.

Six o'clock in the morning, June 30, 1688,*
at the Bell Tavern, King-street.

Just now the officer brings me word they are all agreed, and are sending to my lord chief justice to know, where he pleases to take their verdict.

There must be 150 or 200 guineas provided.

An Account of the Proceedings at Westminster-hall on the 29th and 30th of June, 1688; relating to the Trial and Discharge of the Archbishop of CANTERBURY, the Bishop of ST. ASAPH, Bishop of CHICHESTER, Bishop of ELY, Bishop of BATH AND WELLS, Bishop of PETERBOROUGH, and the Bishop of BRISTOL.

The Indictment, when read, was very much excepted against, on the account of its form, in that it did not mention all the petition they were indicted for; there was not either the title of it expressing to whom it was directed (viz. "To the king's most excellent majesty," was omitted,) and the prayer afterwards ("We therefore pray," &c.) was not there; which, being closely pursued by the bishops counsel, seemed to invalidate the whole business. Then it was not and could not be proved by the king's counsel, that the bishops presented the petition to the king. They had in the court the original, and subpoena'd some of the archbishop's and bishops' chaplains, servants, and others, to prove their hands, which was not done very clearly upon most of them; all the proof the king's counsel had for the presenting the petition to his majesty, did not directly prove it upon them; the most it amounted to was, either that the king told them he had it from the bishops, or, that my lord chancellor did ask them if it were theirs (when they were summoned before the king and council), and that they then expressed an averseness to own

* A letter of this date from Ince to the archbishop, agreeing almost word for word, so far as it goes, with this, is given in Macpherson's Original Papers, vol. 1, p. 152, purporting to be extracted from Tanner's Collection, in the Bodleian; but several passages in the letter as here given are there omitted. As to Macpherson's authenticity, see before in this Collection, vol. 6.

it; saying before the king, that if his majesty did insist on it, and that it should not be improved to their disadvantage, or produced in evidence against them, that they would be plain, and leave it to his majesty. Upon this the bishops counsel had some reflections which my lord chief justice told them he must not hear. But this did not amount to a full proof of the point.

Then the bishops counsel did greatly insist upon the indictment being laid in a wrong county; for it was proved upon oath, that the archbishop was not out of his house for a very considerable time before he was summoned to the king in council. Now what was alleged against them was done at Lambeth, and therefore in Surrey the indictment ought to have been laid, which seemed much to affect them.

After this, the bishops' counsel objected against the term 'publishing;' whereas what was said to be done by them, was in the privatest way that could be, and given only to the king; which caused a long debate between both parties, of things requisite to denominate a 'publication.'

And here things were going to a conclusion, and the judge was entered upon summing up the evidence; but Mr. Finch (one of the bishops' counsel) interrupted my lord chief justice, saying, there was one material evidence remaining. Whereupon my lord desisted, though with some seeming dissatisfaction to the rest of the bishops' counsel: for the judge was going on very favourably for the bishops' cause: some of the bishops importuned my lord chief justice to proceed, but he would not: and so it brought on more discourse about the former subjects, and occasioned the sending for my lord president, who came into court after it had stayed an hour for him: the evidence, that he gave upon oath, could not fully prove the delivery of the petition to the king by the bishops. When before, for the proof of this the solicitor did very greatly importune some witness for the king, (that had upon oath delivered what they knew about this matter, which was as aforesaid) by putting to them very intricate questions; my lord chief justice reproved him, saying, it was not to be suffered; adding, that if he went on thus, he would let the bishops counsel loose on him.

After these things, my lord chief justice asked the bishops' counsel, what else they had to plead? whereupon they proceeded to that part of the indictment that called the bishops' petition 'a scandalous, seditious libel, &c.' which occasioned very great, solemn, and most pleasing debates: for, hereupon they entered into and discussed the lawfulness of the declaration and the dispensing power, which were harangued by every one of the bishops' counsel in most brisk, home and admirable speeches, for the space of three hours, shewing the declaration to be against and contrary to law, which no power could dispense with or abrogate, but that which made it, (viz. a parliament) and that the ecclesiastical laws had the same foundation as the civil, and could be therefore no more dispensed with. That the declaration did evacuate the laws for Sabbath-breaking, fornication, &c. and let loose the reins to the most extravagant sects and licentious practices; and that all laws might be dispensed with, as well as some: That the bishops were sworn to maintain the ecclesiastical laws; and in representing the case thus to his majesty, they had done as the law directed them, and according to prudence, honour, and conscience. There were hereupon publicly read several acts of parliament, records of the Tower, and parliament records; among which, one act of parliament was observable, that gave the king power to dispense with a law for a stated time: so that what dispensing power he ever had, was both given and bounded by parliament. From what they produced out of the parliament records and otherwise, they greatly confirmed what was said in the petition, of the dispensing power having been often declared illegal in parliament, and particularly in the years 62 and 72; and in the beginning of his majesty's reign, which was in 85, when the parliament declared the popish officers could not be dispensed with, but that it was contrary to law to do so, though they were willing by act of parliament to indemnify such as his majesty should nominate, &c. And they shewed how the like dispensing power upon the same occasion was accounted illegal in 62 and 72, both by parliament and the king himself, who suffered the seal to be tore off, and gave the testimony of his disowning such a dispensing power. To which the solicitor's chief answer was, that the king then lacked money, and that such acts as aforesaid (whatever they might say) did confirm, not give the king's dispensing power. In short, the bishop's counsel behaved themselves in this weighty matter with a great deal of gallantry and plainness, no wise inferior to most men's expectations and desires.

The chief of the managers for the king was the solicitor, William Williams, who, as was apprehended, did no great wonders for invalidating the foregoing arguments. He was very hot and earnest (if not passionate) in proving it a libel; saying, it would be so, though it were done by them to redress a certain grievance: whereupon, my lord chief justice, asking what course then they should take, or what they should do in such circumstances, he answered, acquiesce, (which occasioned a very great hiss over the court): He added farther, to prove it libellous, the insinuating expressions of gaining the populace, by saying, "It was not for want of due tenderness to dissenters, in relation to whom we are willing to come to such a temper as shall be thought fit, when that matter shall be considered and settled in parliament and convocation." In convocation, said he, what's the meaning of that? But here my lord chief justice gave him a check, and restrained what he seemed greatly disposed to vent against it. There was not very much said by the rest of the king's counsel, at least nothing more considerable than his. The king's attorney general was pretty moderate.

Sir Bartholomew Shores spoke a little, but was presently silenced; (in the vacancy of stay for my lord president, my lord chief justice said to sir Barth. Shores, now sir Bartholomew, we have time to hear your speeches.)

Serjeant Baldock's argument against the bishops was chiefly upon their refusing, the king requiring such a slender matter so easily to be done; for they were not enjoined to read, but only to send about and disperse it: yet this they would not do. It concluded with the king's counsel.

Then my lord chief justice summing up the business, was favourable to the bishops in the former part of the trial, and could not say the matter of fact was fully proved upon them, but was inclined to make the petition a libel; because of its accusing the king of flaws in government. He said but little to oppose what had been brought by the bishops' counsel against the declaration and dispensing power.

After him spoke judge Holloway, and very much in the bishops behalf, giving it as his judgment, that it could not be a libel, being done from a conviction of conscience by such persons in such an humble, modest manner.

Then judge Powell spoke to the same effect, giving it as his opinion, that it could not be a libel, being the only way to redress themselves. He had also some smart expressions to confirm what the bishops' counsel had urged against the declaration and dispensing power: so that judge Powell gave his opinion also in favour of the bishops.

Then judge Allibon standing up, professed he would not meddle with the dispensing power (though it had been so much canvassed against) but would only speak to the business of the paper being a libel; and he did accordingly, urging it to be so, not barely because it was a petition: for, said he, any one under grievance may petition his majesty, but not about affairs of government, for that would tend to very bad consequences, and promote discontents or worse in the nation. Nor (as he added) can the pretended fairness, as to the manner of it, be an excuse; for the more it hath that way, so much the worse; and so concluded it in his sense a libel. But urging a precedent to confirm what he had said, he was partly mistaken in it, as judge Powell and the bishops' counsel shewed him.

Then the court broke up, the jury went together, and the bishops, with all the privacy they could, to their respective abodes; but wherever the people met with them, they huzza'd and humm'd them in great abundance. There was a prodigious full court and hall, a very great many of the peers and nobility present; and also the bishop of Chester, of whom they took no kind of notice: the bishop of Rochester did not meet with much better regard.

The jury sate up all night, though they were very soon unanimous in their verdict, which they prudently resolved to give in open court; and accordingly next day about nine or ten they brought them in Not Guilty.

Letter to the Archbishop from the Bishop of Norwich.

Nor. July 2, 1688.

May it please your Grace;

To give me leave, among the thousands in these parts, heartily to congratulate with you, and your late companions in trouble, for the most joyful and most acceptable news we had this day by the post; namely, your acquittal from the crime endeavoured to be fixed upon you. I do assure your grace it hath mightily revived our drooping spirits; and I beseech God to make us all truly sensible of and sincerely thankful for so great a mercy. I know your grace hath now work enough upon your hands; and therefore it would be the greatest impertinency to interrupt you in those great affairs: wherefore I heartily bless God for your safety, and thereby for his great and singular mercies vouchsafed to his church, and am as in duty bound, Your grace's most obedient servant to command,

WILLIAM NORWICH.

Letter to the Archbishop from sir George Mackenzie.

May it please your Grace;

It will doubtless be strange news to hear that the bishops of England are in great veneration amongst the Presbyterians of Scotland, and I am glad that reason has retained so much of its old empire amongst men. But I hope it will be no news to your grace to hear, that no man was more concerned in the safety of your consciences and persons than may it please your grace your grace's most humble servant,

GEO. MACKENZIE.

The bearers will give you a just account of our affairs.

THE ARTICLES recommended by the Archbishop of Canterbury to all the Bishops within his Metropolitan Jurisdiction, the 16th July, 1688.

Sir; Yesterday the archbishop of Canterbury delivered the articles which I send you inclosed, to those bishops who are present in this place; and ordered copies of them to be likewise sent in his name to the absent bishops. By the contents of them, you will see that the storm in which he is, does not frighten him from doing his duty; but rather awakens him to do it with so much the more vigour: and indeed, the zeal that he expresses in these articles, both against the corruptions of the Church of Rome on the one hand, and the unhappy differences that are among Protestants on the other, are such apostolical things, that all good men rejoice to see so great a prelate at the head of our church, who in this critical time has had the courage to do his duty in so signal a manner. I am, Sir, yours.

London, July 27, 1688.

Some HEADS of things to be more fully insisted upon by the Bishops in their Addresses to the Clergy and People of their respective Dioceses.

I. That the clergy often read over the forms of their ordination; and seriously consider, what solemn vows and professions they made therein to God and his Church, together with the several oaths and subscriptions they have taken and made upon divers occasions.

II. That in compliance with those and other obligations, they be active and zealous in all the parts and instances of their duty, and especially strict and exact in all holy converse—tion, that so they may become examples to the flock.

III. To this end, that they be constantly resident upon their cures in their incumbent houses; and keep sober hospitality there according to their ability.

IV. That they diligently catechise the children and youth of their parishes (as the rubrick of the Common Prayer-Book, and the 59th Canon injoin) and so prepare them to be brought in due time to Confirmation, when there shall be opportunity: and that they also at the same time expound the grounds of religion and the common Christianity, in the method of the Catechism, for the instruction and benefit of the whole parish, teaching them what they are to believe, and what to do, and what to pray for; and particularly often and earnestly inculcating upon them the importance and obligation of their baptismal vows.

V. That they perform the daily office publicly (with all decency, affection, and gravity) in all market and other great towns, and even in villages, and less populous places, bring people to public prayers as frequently as may be; especially on such days and at such times as the Rubrick and Canons appoint; on Holy Days, and their Eves, on Ember and Rogation Days, on Wednesdays and Fridays in each week, especially in Advent and Lent.

VI. That they use their utmost endeavour, both in their Sermons, and by private applications, to prevail with such of their flock as are of competent age, to receive frequently the Holy Communion: and to this end, that they administer it in the greater towns once in every month, and even in the lesser too, if Communicants may be procured, or however as often as they may: and that they take all due care, both by preaching and otherwise, to prepare all for the worthy receiving of it.

VII. That in their Sermons they teach and inform their people (four times a year at the least, as the first Canon requires) that all usurped and foreign jurisdiction is for most just causes taken away and abolished in this realm, and no manner of obedience or subjection due to the same, or to any that pretend to act by virtue of it: but that the king's power being in his dominions highest under God, they upon all occasions persuade the people to loyalty and obedience to his majesty in all things lawful, and to patient submission in the rest; promoting (as far as in them lies) the public peace and quiet of the world.

VIII. That they maintain fair correspondence (full of the kindest respects of all sorts) with the gentry and persons of quality in their neighbourhood, as being sensible what seasonable assistance and countenance this poor church hath received from them in her necessities.

IX. That they often exhort all those of our communion, to continue stedfast to the end in their most Holy Faith, and constant to their profession; and to that end, to take heed of all seducers, and especially of Popish Emissaries, who are now in great numbers gone forth amongst them, and more busy and active than ever. And that they take all occasions to convince our own, that it is not enough for them to be members of an excellent church, rightly and duly reformed, both in faith and worship, unless they do also reform and amend their own lives, and so order their conversation in all things as becomes the gospel of Christ.

X. And forasmuch as those Romish Emissaries, like the old serpent, insidiantur Calca-neo, are wont to be most busy and troublesome to our people at the end of their lives, labouring to unsettle and perplex them in time of sickness, and at the hour of death; that therefore all who have the cure of souls, be more especially vigilant over them at that dangerous season; that they stay not till they be sent for, but inquire out the sick in their respective parishes, and visit them frequently: that they examine them particularly concerning the state of their souls, and instruct them in their duties, and settle them in their doubts, and comfort them in their sorrows and sufferings, and pray often with them and for them; and by all the methods which our Church prescribes, prepare them for the due and worthy receiving of the Holy Eucharist, the pledge of their happy resurrection: thus with their utmost diligence watching over every sheep within their fold (especially in that critical moment) lest those evening wolves devour them.

XI. That they also walk in wisdom towards those that are not of our communion: and if there be in their parishes any such, that they neglect not frequently to confer with them in the spirit of meekness, seeking by all good ways and means to gain and win them over to our communion: more especially that they have a very tender regard to our brethren the Protestant Dissenters; that upon occasion offered, they visit them at their houses, and receive them kindly at their own, and treat them fairly wherever they meet them, discoursing calmly and civilly with them; persuading them (if it may be) to a full compliance with our Church, or at least, that 'whereto we have already attained, we may all walk by the same rule, and mind the same thing.' And in order hereunto that they take all opportunities of assuring and convincing them, that the bishops of this church are really and sincerely irreconcilable enemies to the errors, superstitions, idolatries, and tyrannies of the Church of Rome; and that the very unkind jealousies, which some have had of us to the contrary, were altogether groundless.

And in the last place, that they warmly and most affectionately exhort them, to join with us in daily fervent prayer to the God of peace, for an universal blessed union of all Reformed Churches, both at home and abroad, against our common enemies; that all they who do confess the holy name of our dear Lord, and do agree in the truth of his holy word, may also meet in one holy communion; and live in perfect unity and godly love.

Mr. Maurice's Draught of an Answer to the four titular Bishops.

1. Forasmuch as it is the duty of a watchman, as soon as the enemy begins to appear, to give notice, and alarm those, whose safety is committed to his charge: I cannot but hold myself indispensably obliged (considering the station in which it hath pleased God to place me in this church, and the circumstances of the present time) to give warning to all those, who belong to my care, that many deceivers are gone forth amongst them; and are no longer content, as heretofore, to creep secretly into houses, and to lead captive silly people, laden with sins, and by the corruptness of their minds, or the wickedness of their lives, fitted and prepared for such seduction; but begin now to take the confidence of publicly owning themselves, and their ungodly designs, in the face of the world, and to the amazement of this whole nation. It is time for every true shepherd, when he sees the wolves breaking in upon the flock, to be ready, after the example of our great pastor, to oppose and withstand them, and even to lay down his life for the sheep. He is but a hireling, and betrays himself to be such, who has so little concern for his flock, that he flies from danger, when it comes, and prefers even life itself to their safety and preservation.

2. Among these deceivers there are four persons, exceeding all the rest in confidence, who assume to themselves the titles of bishops of remote places,* where they have no flocks; and under the pretence of being the pope's vicars in this realm, address themselves to a party of men, styled by them Lay-Catholics; who separate themselves indeed from our communion, but yet in right, and according to the laws of this land, and the discipline of the primitive church, belong to our care: these four (I say) under the pretence of Papal auctority, justly and legally abolished in this kingdom, take upon them now to confirm, and harden those mistaken men in their errors; and to that purpose having (it seems) divided the whole kingdom betwixt themselves "before they separate themselves to enter upon their respective provinces" (as they speak) have thought fit to print and publish a writing, under the title of a Pastoral Letter; with directions to those of their party, not only to continue in their former mistakes, but also to use all means for the seducing of others. So that there lies an absolute necessity upon us, to warn and admonish all the people of this land, who either of due right, or actual communion, appertain to us, that they have no fellowship with these deceivers and corrupters of the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, that they pay them no subjection, no not for an hour; seeing they have no auctority over any persons here, either from our Lord Christ, or his apostles, or from any order of the primitive church; and stand condemned by the laws of this kingdom, as enemies to the supreme power of the king, to the ancient liberties of the Britannic church, and to the peace and welfare of the nation.

* Names of the four bishops: John bishop of Adramite: V. A. Bonaventure bishop of Madaura: V. A. Philip bishop of Aureliople: V. A. John bishop of Callipoli: V. A.

[Thus far in the Archbishop's hand.]

3. Those therefore to whom they address themselves under the style of Lay-Catholics, in the first place I exhort and beseech in the Lord Jesus, and in the bowels and tenderness of a fatherly affection, that they would examine themselves, whether they be in the faith; that they would search diligently into the fountains of life, and read and study the holy scriptures, that can make us wise unto salvation; that they would compare with these the pretended auctority, and the doctrine of these Papal vicars; and lastly, that they would impartially use such assistances for the discovering of the truth, as the grace of God offers them at this time, in so many excellent treatises upon the points in dispute between the Roman Church and us. My dear brethren, be not deceived; God is not mocked. He will require at your hands all those opportunities of knowledge, he will exact an account of all those advantages, which his goodness has offered to you: it is not with you as with those of their persuasion in Spain or Italy: they have excuses for their ignorance or mistakes, which you cannot pretend: but you whom God has placed in the midst of so great light are utterly inexcusable, if you love darkness better than light. Or if you will not hearken to my voice, I will direct it to God on your behalf, beseeching him, through the intercession of our dear and common Lord, that he would remove your prejudices; that he would open your eyes, and bless you with the knowledge of the truth, as it is in Jesus; that ye may be knit in one fellowship with us: and truly our fellowship is with the Father and his son Jesus Christ.

4. But to those who profess the same common faith with us I apply myself with greater assurance. I have that confidence in you all, that, at this time especially, you will hearken to the voice of your shepherd; whose concern for you is more strong and affectionate than for life itself. I account nothing dear to me in comparison of your salvation; and this is my joy, this is my greatest dignity, if you stand fast in the faith, once delivered to the saints, and now professed by you. Beware of deceivers who are gone abroad, and proclaim to the world their design to shake you from your steadfastness. In order to stand firm against all the arts of these seducers, take to you the "whole armour of God," recommended to you by St. Paul, the great archbishop of the Gentiles; take "the sword of the spirit which is the word of God ;" this will easily cut asunder all the knots of sophistry ; this will overcome and bear down all the subtilty and fallacy of seducers : let not the Holy Bible depart out of your hands, nor out of your minds ; " hear, read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest it." So shall ye be free from all infection of error, and remain firm and unshaken amidst all the contrary winds of vain and false doctrine: make use of those great advantages of knowledge which the divine goodness has put into your hands: attend to the preaching and writing of those who are over you in the Lord: attend diligently upon public prayer, and be earnest suppliants to God, that he would preserve his church and household here continually in the true religion. And though we must acknowledge, that we have rendered ourselves unworthy of his saving truth, having held it so long in unrighteousness, yet let us instantly beseech him that he would correct us for our sins with any judgment, so that dreadful final one do not overtake us ; so he do not utterly forsake us, and deprive us of his truth.

5. Let patience be your shield against the insolence of your enemies: suffer not yourselves to be provoked out of your duty towards God and the king ; and let not the weakness of an insolent adversary tempt you to do any thing against the rules of the Christian religion. " But above all things have charity towards all men: love your enemies, bless them that curse you, pray for them that revile and persecute you ; so shall ye be the children of your father which is in heaven." But be sure ye have perfect charity among yourselves, and remember, that ye " fall not out by the way, for you are brethren." And as you are united in one faith, so may your hearts be knit together in brotherly love. Support the weak, confirm the wavering, instruct the ignorant, comfort the afflicted, relieve the poor, rebuke the sinner, and edify one another in love. Let not your conversation be a disgrace to your faith, and a scandal to the weak, but let your lives be answerable to so holy a profession: for if you give yourself licence to sin, it is not likely your faith will be long uncorrupt ; a wicked life disposes a man naturally to change for advantage: for since the sinner can take but little pleasure in religion, he will quickly grow indifferent, and be disposed to chuse that which comes attended with the greatest worldly profit.

6. Have a singular tenderness for those who, holding the substance of reformed Christianity with us, stand yet divided from us. As far as we have attained, let us speak the same thing, and let us pray to God, that he would unite us into one fold, that we may walk in the same house of God as friends. And now my Protestant brethren, though differing from us in lesser matters, I will direct my speech unto you in the spirit of meekness and charity.

Doubtless you are our brethren, and children of the same father: we call upon the same God, through the intercession of the same Christ. We direct not worship to saints or angels: we fall not down before any images of Christ or his glorified servants: we worship not the sacraments of Christ's passion as God: we deceive not ourselves with expectation of purgatory fires after this life, nor plead any merit with God, whose unprofitable servants we must confess ourselves to be. We equally renounce all foreign jurisdiction, as contrary to Christian discipline, and the privileges and independence of this church and nation. Having then the same substance of faith, the same sacraments, the same Christ, let us unanimously join in the preservation of that common faith, and not suffer ourselves to be divided by our enemies, who being of themselves destitute of force to overthrow our religion, have no way left to compass their designs upon us, but to divide us among ourselves, and to make us the instruments of our mutual destruction. My brethren I believe better things of you, and will conclude with my prayers to God for you: that he would direct your way, and enlarge your hearts towards us, for our bowels are not streightened towards you: that he would speak peace and unity to us all: that he would preserve us all from corruptions of the faith, and superstition in worship: that he would ever protect us from the tyranny of the Roman bishop, which our fathers, after a sad and long enduring, were no longer able to bear: and if for our sins we cannot attain to the desired blessing of a perfect fellowship, yet as far as we have attained, let us encourage and assist one another, and be ever united in all the good offices of Christian affection and charity.

Copy of an ADDRESS to the King from the Bishops; in the Archbishop's hand.*

To the King's most excellent Majesty ;

The humble Address of the Bishops, who were by his majesty's order lately summoned to attend him.

May it please your Majesty ;

Being sad at the heart for the many great distractions, and disaffections, which we find every where in the minds of your people ; and being most heartily desirous (according to the duty we owe to God and your majesty) to do all that we can to remove them ; we do hereby crave leave, with all humility, to propound to your majesty the following expedients, which, if you please to hearken to, (we think in our consciences) effectually will, and we are sure only can restore to your majesty the hearts of your people, and quiet and compose their minds: viz.

1. And first in general, if you would please

* It is related, that upon receipt of the prince of Orang's Declaration, king James exclaimed, " We shall now see what the Church of England will do." He soon had reason to repent of the contemptuous disregard with which he had received the friendly warning of bishop Morley. See Vol. 8, p. 1016.

to restore the government, and the whole management of it to that state, and put it into those hands of the nobility and gentry in each county, in which it was, when your majesty first came to the crown.

2. If you would often remember and consider that excellent speech which you made to the privy council, when you first sate down in your chair there, and which you after repeated to the lords and commons at the opening of your first parliament; in which your majesty was pleased to declare, that you would support the Church of England, for you knew her principles, and complained, that you were misrepresented as a man of arbitrary principles; whereas you knew, that the laws are sufficient to make the monarch as great as you desired to be.

3. If you would please often to read over, and in the fear of God seriously to consider the tenor and importance of your coronation oath, in which you swear solemnly before God, and angels, and men, that you would keep and confirm the laws and customs granted by the kings your predecessors to the people and to the clergy of England, according to the laws of God, and the true profession of the gospel established in this kingdom, &c.

4. In consequence of these obligations, if you would please to annul your high commission for ecclesiastical affairs; as being evidently contrary to two acts of parliament.

5. If you would please effectually to revoke all dispensations, and letters mandatory, or recommendatory, by virtue whereof any not duly qualified by law hath been put into or continued in any place or office, or preferment, in church or state, or in the universities; especially which have the cure of souls annexed to them.

6. Particularly if you would please to restore the president and fellows of the college of St. Mary Magdalen in Oxford to their just and undoubted rights; and permit them to resettle that college according to their statutes, and the laws of the land.

7. If you would please by your royal proclamation to inhibit the four Romish bishops, who style themselves vicars apostolical, and by a foreign auctority, not derived from your crown, ride circuit in the land, and have presumed to cantonize this your kingdom into four provinces, and to divide it among themselves; (having printed maps of it accordingly) exercising therein a jurisdiction, of which the respective bishops have been long possess, and which by the laws of England belongs unquestionably to them; whom your majesty hath often declared (and even in your declaration of Ap. 4, 1687,) that you will protect, and maintain in the quiet and full enjoyment of all their rights and possessions, without any molestation or disturbance whatsoever.

8. That you would please to revoke all licences, or faculties, by which any person, who is not of the communion of the Church of England, pretend to be enabled to teach public schools, and thereby endanger the corrupting the principles of the youth of the nation.

9. If your majesty would please by your proclamation strictly to command all jesuits, and seminary or missionary priests (who go about continually in great swarms, labouring to perplex, and unsettle, and seduce your good people) immediately to depart out of all your dominions, and not to return, but under the penalty of the law: and particularly, that Mr. Edward Petre be forthwith sent away, and not permitted any longer to sit in your councils, or to be so near your person, to the great and just scandal and scorn of your best subjects, and of the whole nation.

10. If you would please to refer the whole matter, and all the points of your late Declaration for Liberty of Conscience (in and by which so many of the laws of the land, and those of the highest concernment are manifestly violated and invaded) to be debated, adjusted, and finally settled by your majesty, and the three estates of the realm, in a free and regular parliament, in whom alone the power of making, and repealing laws, and the whole legislature of this realm, is legally settled.

11. And that this may be done, and the rest of these expedients (so far as shall be thought fitting) farther considered, confirmed, and finally settled, and that with all convenient speed, as the weightiness of the matter requires; if your majesty would please as soon as may be to cause a parliament to be summoned; and to the end that it may be free, and the representatives that are to serve in it duly and fairly chosen; to supersede all farther prosecution upon quo warrantos or otherwise; and restore all corporations (the city of London especially, and in the first place) to their former and ancient charters, immunities, privileges, and franchises, according to the laws.

These things, if it shall please Almighty God, in who's hands the hearts of kings are, to incline your majesty to do; we doubt not yet—

An Account of the Bishops presenting an Address to the King, with Ten Advices.

My Lord; Whitehall, Sept. 24, 1688.

The king thinking it requisite to speak with your grace, and several others of the bishops, who are within a convenient distance of this place, his majesty commands me to acquaint you, that he would have you attend him upon Friday next, at ten in the morning. I am my lord, your grace's, &c. SUNDERLAND. P.

Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.

Letters to the same purpose, and of the same date (or about that time) were sent to the bishops of London, Winchester, Elie, Chichester, Bath and Wells, Peterburgh, Bristol, and Rochester; and all which (but London and Bristol) came to town; and all (but the archbishop) waited on the king at the time appointed. The next day the bishop of Winchester went out of town, and the day after that the archbishop waited upon the king alone: and by his appointment on Wednesday Oct. 3d, all, who remained in town, went together to his majesty; to whom (in the name of the rest) the archbishop spake, as followeth:

May it please your sacred Majesty;

When I had lately the honour to wait upon you, you were pleased briefly to acquaint me with what had past two days before between your majesty and these my reverend brethren: by which, and by the account which they themselves gave me, I perceived, that in truth there past nothing, but in very general terms, and expressions of your majesty's gracious and favourable inclinations to the Church of England, and of our reciprocal duty, and loyalty to your majesty: both which were sufficiently understood, and declared before; and (as one* of my brethren then told you) would have been in the same state, if the bishops had not stirred one foot out of their dioceses. Sir, I found, it grieved my lords the bishops to have come so far, and to have done so little: and I am assured, they came then prepared to have given your majesty some more particular instances of their duty, and zeal for your service; had they not apprehended from some words, which fell from your majesty, that you were not then at leisure to receive them. It was for this reason, that I then besought your majesty to command us once more to attend you all together, which your majesty was pleased graciously to allow and encourage. We are therefore here now before you, with all humility to beg your permission, that we may suggest to your majesty such advices as we think proper at this season, and conducing to your service, and so leave them to your princely consideration.—Which the king being pleased graciously to permit, the archbishop proceeded, as followeth. Our first humble advice is;

1. That your majesty will be graciously pleased to put the management of your government in the several counties into the hands of such of the nobility and gentry there, as are legally qualified for it.

2. That your majesty will be graciously pleased to annul your commission for ecclesiastical affairs; and that no such court, as that commission sett up, may be erected for the future.

3. That your majesty will be graciously pleased that no dispensation may be granted, or continued, by virtue whereof any person, not duly qualified by law, hath been or may be put into any place, office, or preferment in church or state, or in the universities, or continued in the same; especially such as have cure of souls annex to them: and in particular, that you will be graciously pleased to restore the president and fellows of St. Mary-Magdalen-college, in Oxford.†

* Bishop of Bath and Wells.

† See the Case, p. 1. of this Volume.

4. That your majesty will be graciously pleased to set aside all licences, or faculties already granted, by which any persons of the Romish communion may pretend to be enabled to teach public schools; and that no such be granted for the future.

5. That your majesty will be graciously pleased to desist from the exercise of such a dispensing power as hath of late been used; and to permit that point to be freely and calmly debated, and argued, and finally settled in parliament.

6. That your majesty will be graciously pleased to inhibit the four foreign bishops, who stile themselves vicars apostolical, from farther invading the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, which is by law vested in the bishops of this church.

7. That your majesty will be graciously pleased to fill the vacant bishopricks, and other ecclesiastical promotions within your gift, both in England and Ireland, with men of learning and piety: and in particular (which I must own to be my peculiar boldness, for it is done without the privity of my brethren) that you will be graciously pleased forthwith to fill the archiepiscopall chair of York (which hath so long stood empty,* and upon which a whole province depends) with some very worthy person: for which (pardon me, Sir, if I am bold to say) you have here now before you a very fair choice.

8. That your majesty will be graciously pleased to supersede all farther prosecution of quo warrantos against corporations, and to restore to them their ancient charters, privileges and franchises, as we hear God hath put it into your majesty's heart to do for the city of London; which we intended to have made otherwise one of our principal requests.†

9. That if it so please your majesty, writs may be issued out with convenient speed, for the calling of a free and regular parliament; in which the church of England may be secured according to the acts of uniformity; provision may be made for a due liberty of conscience, and for securing the liberties and properties of all your subjects; and a mutual confidence, and good understanding may be established between your majesty and all your people.

10. Above all, that your majesty will be graciously pleased to permit your bishops to offer you such motives and arguments, as (we trust) may by God's grace be effectual to persuade your majesty to return to the communion of the church of England: into who's most Catholic faith you were baptized, and in which you were educated, and to which it is our daily earnest prayer to God, that you may be re-united.

*According to Wellwood (see a note to lord Castlemaine's Case, A. D. 1689,) the archbishoprick of York was so long kept vacant from want of a dispensation of the statutes of the Jesuit's order to father Petre to enjoy a bishoprick.

These (Sir) are the humble advices, which out of conscience of the duty we owe to God, to your majesty and to our country, we think fit at this time to offer to your majesty, as suitable to the present state of your affairs, and most conducing to your service, and so to leave them to your princely consideration. And we heartily beseech Almighty God, "in who's hand the hearts of all kings are, so to dispose, and govern yours, that in all your thoughts, words, and works you may ever seek his honour and glory, and study to preserve the people committed to your charge in wealth, peace, and godliness;" to your own both temporal and eternal happiness. Amen.

We also do heartily concur.

* "These proposals would at another time have raised the king's indignation, but the necessity of his affairs obliged him now to thank their lordships, and to promise that he would comply with them. Accordingly on October 5, 'His majesty was graciously pleased to declare in council, that in pursuance of his resolution and intention to protect the church of England, and that all suspicions and jealousies to the contrary may be removed, he had thought fit to dissolve the commission for causes ecclesiastical, and accordingly did give directions to the lord-chancellor to cause the same to be forthwith done.' And on Oct. 10, It was farther declared, 'That his majesty having received several complaints of great abuses and irregularities committed in the late regulations of the corporations, has thought fit to authorize and require the lords-lieutenants of the several counties, to inform themselves of all such abuses and irregularities within their lieutenancies, and to make forthwith report thereof to his majesty, together with what they conceive fit to be done for redressing the same; whereupon his majesty will give such further orders as shall be requisite.' On Oct. 12, It was again published from Whitehall, 'That the king having declared his resolution to preserve the church of England in all its rights and immunities, his majesty, as an evidence of it, has signify'd his pleasure to the right reverend father in God, the lord bishop of Winchester, as visitor of St. Mary Magdalen-College in Oxford, to settle that society regularly and statutably.'

"On Oct. 17, The king published a proclamation for restoring corporations to their ancient charters, liberties, rights and franchises. And orders of the council were the same day made for removing and displacing all mayors, Letter to the Archbishop from F. E.

[FRAN. ELY.]

Seven at Night.

May it please your Grace;

Just now Mr. Thinne brings me a message from lord Godolphin (whose credit is great at this time) that the king and court seem to wonder that they received no farther applications from the bishops to-day; adding, that it was my lord Godolphin's opinion, That whatever now was fit to be asked by us we might have it granted, at least by degrees, therefore we ought to be plain, and propose most humbly and as a necessary discharge of our duty to his majesty, whatever we thought necessary for the public security.

This I thought fit to impart for your grace's consolation: but, good my lord, press for expedition with some such kind expression as this, that otherwise the trap will be fallen upon us ere we are aware.

We discoursed Mr. Thinne upon their fatal inadvertency for excepting all the clergy, by immediate consequence, out of the general sheriffs, recorders, town-clerks, aldermen, common-councilmen, &c. which had been put in by the late king, or his present majesty, ever since the year 1679." Kennet.

When the approach of the storm became very sensible, bishop Sprat discontinued to act as one of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and addressed the following letter 'To the right hon. my Lords of his Majesty's Commission Ecclesiastical.'

"I most humbly intreat your lordships' favourable interpretation of what I now write, that, since your lordships are resolved to proceed against those who have not complied with the king's command in reading his declaration, it is absolutely impossible for me to serve his majesty any longer in this commission: I beg leave to tell your lordships, that though I myself did submit in that particular, yet I will never be any way instrumental in punishing those my brethren that did not. For, as I call God to witness, that what I did was merely in a principle of conscience, so I am fully satisfied that their forbearance was upon the same principle. I have no reason to think otherwise of the whole body of our clergy, who, upon all occasions, have signalized their loyalty to the crown, and their zealous affections to his present majesty's person, in the worst of times. Now, my lords, the safety of the whole church of England seeming to be exceedingly concerned in this prosecution, I must declare, I cannot with a safe conscience sit or judge in this cause upon so many pious and excellent men, with whom (if it be God's will) it rather becomes me to suffer, than to be in the least occasion to their sufferings. I therefore earnestly request your lordships to intercede with his majesty, that I may be graciously dismissed from any further attendance at your pardon. He stood amazed and ran away to Whitehall about it before the council should rise.

I must be so just to lord Clarendon as to add this one memoir, that not only one Irish archbishoprick, with three bishopricks there, but board; and to assure him, that I am still ready to sacrifice whatever I have to his service but my conscience and religion. My lords, I am your lordships' most faithful and obedient servant,

"THO. ROCHESTER."

In vol. 9, p. 263, mention is made of Sprat's employment to draw up prayers for king James's queen and for the prince of Orange. In the Collectanea Curiosa, I find this subservient favorite of Charles and James in prayer, solemnly ejaculating of the very first day of king William's landing, "This is the day which the Lord hath made: we will rejoice and be glad in it."

Letter to the Bishop of London from the Bishop of Rochester [Thomas Sprat]: relating to an alteration in the 5th of November office, 1689.

From the original under bishop Sprat's hand, penes S. Knight. For my lord bishop of London.

My Lord;

I suppose you received the message which I left yesterday morning with my lord bishop of Chichester for your lordship: that considering the shortness of time, I could not alone undertake to accommodate the whole fifth of November office to the present occasion, but that I would do something towards it. Now, my lord, I send you here what alterations seem to me to be most necessary, and withal a new collect to be said in the morning prayer, and repeated in the second service, unless you shall be better provided

So that if your lordship shall admit what I have done, there remains but one prayer more to be made for the end of the Litany, which as I told my lord of Chichester, I hope your lordship will be quickly furnished with from better hands.

By reason of some indisposition of body, and some domestic business, I shall not be able to wait on your lordship till Thursday morning at the House of Lords. My lord, I am, &c.

Bromley, Oct. 27, 1689. THO. ROFFEN.

Since I wrote the former I have ventured at a Prayer to be used at the end of the Litany, which has occasioned the blots that I desire your lordship to excuse.

The sentences which begin morning prayer must necessarily be altered, and instead of them these following may seem proper to be used.—
Ps. 118:

V. 23. "This is the Lord's doing and it is marvellous in our eyes."

V. 24. "This is the day which the Lord hath made, we will rejoice and be glad in it."

all their deaneries, and every parsonage and vicarage that has fallen in the gift of the crown, since Tirconnel's regency, is kept void in Ireland.

God's holy spirit guide your grace and grant

V. 28. "Thou art my God, and I will praise thee, thou art my God, and I will exalt thee."

For "O come let us sing unto the Lord," Ps. 95, perhaps the 96th Psalm may serve better as a proper hymn. The other Psalms will do well as before. In the lessons, epistle and gospel, I cannot see any thing to be altered, unless you can find a fitter second lesson and gospel.

All the old prayers and collects must be so far changed, as to make them fit for the present occasion, which may be done by the alteration of a word or two in each.

After the two collects in the morning prayer, which are in the old book, a distinct collect may be added to this purpose, which may be also repeated in the second service.

O God whose name is excellent in all the earth, and thy glory above the heavens, who on this day didst miraculously preserve our Church and State*

[forefathers] from the secret contrivance and hellish malice of Popish conspirators; and on this day also didst [begin to give] us a mighty deliverance from the open tyranny and oppression of the same cruel and blood-thirsty faction.

[enemies.]

We bless and adore thy glorious majesty, as for the former, so for this thy late marvellous loving kindness [in the preservation of our religion and liberties.] And we humbly pray, that the devout sense of this thy repeated mercy may renew and increase in us a spirit of [love] and thankfulness to thee its only author; a spirit of [peaceable submission] to our gracious sovereign, whom thou madest the blessed instrument of it; and a spirit of fervent zeal for pure and undefiled our [holy] religion, which now again thou hast so wonderfully rescued, and established a blessing to us and our posterity. And this we beg for Jesus Christ his sake. Amen.

At the end of the Litany something may be said to this effect.

Most gracious God, and heavenly father, who by thy all wise providence hast ordained the appointed times and seasons of all things, and hast made this day to be for ever famous and renowned in [this Church] for the two signal preservations thou hast wrought and for our blessed reformation upon it.

[on us and our holy religion.] Grant, we beseech thee, that we may approve ourselves so worthy of these glorious mercies, by adorning you favour in the sight of his majesty ! May you, my good lord, perform fortiter in re, suaviter in modo. God send your grace a good night and a happy morning. I am your obliged and obedient servant,

Letter to the Archbishop from the Bishops of Rochester and Peterborough.

May it please your Grace ;
Having waited upon my lord chancellor we in all things the holy reformed doctrine we shall profess*, that the gates of hell [may] never prevail against this church which thy own right hand has planted, and thy out-stretched arm has so often defended amongst us, that thou mayst be with it always to the end of the world. Amen.

At length even Crew remonstrated with James.

1. Letter from Bishop Crew to King James 2.

“ To the King’s most excellent Majesty ; the most humble and faithful advice of your Majesty’s ever dutiful subject and servant the bishop of Durham.

“ That your majesty would be pleased to withdraw your protection of those Romish chapels, which are daily made the occasion of so much disturbance and mischief here, and if continued any longer, I fear, will unavoidably endanger the peace and safety of this your great city, and consequently of your whole kingdom.

“ That the archbishoprick of York, which your majesty hath been pleased to offer me, may be filled with some other more deserving person : and that your majesty would be pleased to make another dean of Christ Church in Oxford, instead of Mr. Massey, who is utterly incapable thereof by law : That the fellows of Sidney College in Cambridge, for whom I have so often moved your majesty, may have leave to elect a new master, in the place of Mr. Bassett (he being also unqualified on the same account) and to proceed on all other affairs relating to that society, according to their original statutes and constitutions.

“ That your majesty would be pleased to call a free parliament so soon as may be, this being the only probable means for preserving your sacred person, for preventing the effusion of Christian blood, and for establishing your throne and government, both in church and state, upon sure and lasting foundations.

“ N. DURHAM.”

Kennet, after relating what passed between the king and the bishops concerning the required abhorrence, says, that after that time Crew came no more to the council board, and that he represented to Sancroft, his sorrow for having concurred so far as he had done in the king’s measures.

* And let all the enemies of thy sacred truth know and confess.

have acquainted him with the objection in the proclamation of pardon, who tells us, tis the usual expression in all acts of pardon, and that we are included therein, and that the king has already been told of it by my lord Godolphin this evening ; and therefore ’tis thought advisable that your grace should not mention it at all, or else very slightly to pass it over. This we think reasonable should be imparted to your grace by our good lord, your grace’s most obedient servants,

A JOURNAL of what passed between the King and some of the Bishops, concerning an abhorrence of the designs of the Prince of Orange. 1688.

On Tuesday, October 16, the archbishop received a letter from Mr. Bridgeman, acquainting him, that the king desired to speak with him that morning, if his health would permit.

Whitehall, Oct. 16th. —88.

‘ My Lord ;

‘ I am directed to acquaint your grace, that his majesty desires to speak with you about 10 this morning, if your health will permit you to come. I am with great respect and submission, my lord, &c.

‘ W. BRIDGEMAN.’

‘ Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.’

He went over at ten of the clock, and was introduced to the king, who discoursed to him about many things : as about the restoring of Magdalen college in Oxford ; that the bishop of Winton mistook his letter, for he never meant to delay the visitation ; and about the restoring of the corporations, which, he said, should have been done the day before, had not the lawyers differed about the penning of the proclamation, &c.

The archbishop told him, that he had lately received a letter without a name, complaining of the ill state of the church in Ireland ; particularly, that four bishopricks had been long void there, the filling of which was the bishop’s 7th advice to his majesty ; and some other grievances, of all which the king desired to have a particular account sent to him, the archbishop not having the letter about him.

At last the king came to that, which may be supposed to have been his chief intention in sending for the archbishop ; sc. to tell him, that he had received certain intelligence, that the prince of Orange was coming to invade England, and to make a conquest of it, &c. ; and in fine, that it would be very much for his service, and a thing very well becoming the bishops, if they would meet together, and draw up an Abhorrence of this attempt of the prince, &c.

The archbishop told him, that, as soon as the bishops had waited upon him the last time together, they (supposing his majesty had no farther commands for them) made haste to return into their several dioceses ; so that there were now none of them in town; the bishop of London being not yet come, and the bishop of Rochester being gone into Essex.

The king replied, that these two last named might quickly be found; and that he was told, that the bishop of Peterborough was still in town.

The archbishop answered, that it was more than he knew; for that bishop had bid him farewell some time before, saying, that he was going into the country: so that in all likelihood no considerable number of bishops could now be got together. Where it is to be noted, that the king did not at all mention the bishops of Chester, St. David's, &c.; though there was now so direct an occasion leading to it.

But the king still insisting upon his former proposal, the archbishop, asking first, and having his majesty's leave to speak freely, said, That there would be (he thought) no occasion for the bishops to make such a declaration; for, said he, I could never believe, nor do I yet, that the prince hath such a design: for which, being demanded, he gave several reasons, too long to be here inserted: and this was all that passed at that time concerning this matter.

On Wednesday, October 31st, the king ordered a letter to be sent by a messenger to the bishop of London at Fulham, commanding him forthwith to wait upon his majesty: but the bishop, having been abroad in the country, came not home till it was too late to do so.

'My Lord; Fulham, Oct. 31.

'I returned home so late this evening, that I could not hope of waiting upon the king this afternoon according to his commands. But understanding that the rest of your lordships were likewise sent for, I beg to know, only by word of mouth, what the matter is, that I may attend accordingly. My lord,

'Your grace's, &c. 'H. LONDON.
[Superscription.]

'To the most Rev. the Lord
Archbishop of Canterbury.'

On Thursday, Nov. 1st, the bishop of London waited on the king; and what passed between them the bishop thus relates in his letter, dated Nov. 6th: "When I waited on the king by his command on Thursday morning, Nov. 1st, he told me, That he had sent for me, when he had nothing but the Declaration of the States of Holland, but that the Declaration of the prince of Orange was now come to his hands; out of which he read to me the short paragraph of the lords spiritual and temporal inviting his highness over. Upon which I told him, I was confident, the rest of the bishops would as readily answer in the negative as myself: and his majesty was pleased then to say, he did believe us all innocent. Next he told me, he thought it requisite we should make some public declaration of our innocence in this matter, and likewise an abhorrence. I then desired to see the Declaration; but he refused. I told him, this was a matter to be considered. Every one, said he, is to answer for himself: but I will send for my lord of Canterbury, who shall call you together."*

On the same day the archbishop received a summons from the earl of Middleton to wait upon the king (with the rest of the bishops) the next day, at ten o'clock in the morning.

'My Lord; Whitehall, Nov. 1, 1688.

'The king commands me to acquaint your grace, that he desires to speak with you at ten o'clock to-morrow morning, and that your grace would bring with you such others of my lords the bishops as are in town.

'I am, my lord, your grace's, &c.

'MIDDLETON.'

'Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.'

In obedience to which command, on Friday Nov. 2d, the archbishop went to Whitehall, and found in the king's bed-chamber the bishops of London, Duresm, Chester and St. David's: and they all being called into the closet to the king, he told them, That he had seized a person, who had brought into the city a great number of the prince of Orange's Declarations, and had begun to disperse them: for his majesty had received five or six copies from several persons, to whom they had been sent in penny-post letters, which he had thrown into the fire; but that he had still one copy (which the lord visc. Preston held in his hand; who had all this while, from the first coming in of the bishops, stood by the king:) in which, said the king to the bishops, there is a passage that concerns you; which he thereupon commanded the secretary to read to them, pointing to the places where he would have him begin and end. The sum of it was, That he, the said prince was coming to invade England being thereunto invited (among others of the English nation) by a great many of the lords both spiritual and temporal. Whereupon the king was pleased to say, That he did not believe a word of it; that he was fully satisfied of the bishops' innocency, and that it was a false accusation; notwithstanding that, he thought fit to acquaint them with it, and that this was the occasion of his sending for them at this time.

The archbishop having thanked the king for his good opinion, so frankly and graciously expressed, spoke to this purpose: that he owed to his majesty a natural allegiance, having been born in his kingdom; that he had oftentimes confirmed this by taking voluntarily the oaths of supremacy and allegiance, and could have at once but one king; that (as his majesty well knew) he never worshipped the rising sun, nor made court to any, but to his king; and to him he did, as often as he was pleased to receive it. And, as to this particular charge, and his personal concern in it, he averred it to be utterly false;† he having been so far from inviting the said prince any way to make this attempt, that he never made any application to him: and farther, that he did not know, nor could believe, that any of his brethren the bishops had given the prince any such an invitation. The bishop of London said, he had given the king his answer the day before: the bishop of Duresm said, I am sure I am none of them. Nor I; Nor I; said the other two.

After this, the king, repeating more than once his former declaration, that he verily believed the whole charge to be a groundless aspersion upon the bishops, did nevertheless require, that some such denial should be published, saying, It would be for his service; yet would not allow time to send for the absent bishops, but commanded the archbishop to call together as many of the bishops as were at hand, and to consider with them, what was fit for them all to do, in order to the vindication of themselves from this accusation. The “Original Papers,” has published the two following Articles as from Tanner’s MSS. in the Bodleian Library.

GEORGE (probably sir GEORGE) MACKENZIE to the Archbishop of CANTERBURY.—Hopes his Grace will disavow the Prince of Orange’s Declaration.

“May it please your Grace;

“We are strangely surprized with the prince of Orange’s Declaration, which seems, upon the misinformation of fanaticks, fled to Holland for to have accused all such as have served in the government of church and state here as criminal. We hope the worthy and pious prelates of the Church of England, will own the true interest of government and their friends; especially such as never exposed themselves nor their religion to sale, and whom neither fear nor flattery has influenced. I refer the state of our affairs to this bearer, who can make your grace understand them as well as if you had been in employment here; nor will there be any thing to be added, when you shall shortly see your grace’s most humble servant, archbishop told him, that there were no bishops at hand, (except those there present) but the bishop of Rochester; to whom he undertook to send that night, and to summon him in. Here the bishop of St. David’s interposed, and affirmed, that the bishop of Peterburgh was then in town; that he had been seen the day before in the Temple; and that he had inquired at his lodging, where so much was acknowledged. The archbishop told the king, it might possibly be so, but that he knew it not; and that if he could, he would find him out.
“GEO. MACKENZIE.”

The Archbishop of CANTERBURY disavows his ever inviting over the Prince of Orange.

“Whereas there hath been of late a general apprehension, that his highness the prince of Orange hath an intention to invade this kingdom, in hostile manner; and, as it is said, makes this one reason of his attempt, that he hath been thereunto invited, by several English lords, both spiritual and temporal; I William, bishop of Canterbury, do for my own discharge, profess and declare, that I never gave him any such invitation by word, writing, or otherwise; nor do I know, nor can believe, that any of my reverend brethren, the bishops, have in any such way invited him. And all this I aver, upon my word; and, in attestation thereof, have subscribed my name here, at Lambeth, the 3d day of Nov. 1688. W. C.”

Then the king went on to say, that, when we met, if we should resolve upon a paper, or apology for ourselves in writing, before we did any thing farther in it, the archbishop should bring it to him (or rather send it, said he to the archbishop, for I would not endanger your health: for which his royal compassion the archbishop gave him thanks:) and then (he proceeded to say) it being approved by me, may by you (the metropolitan) be sent to the absent bishops for their concurrence.

All this while there was not one word spoken about the abhorrence. But at last the king said, you may do well, and it will be very much for my service, &c. if in your paper you express your dislike of the prince’s design: to which (though he said it twice) neither the archbishop, nor the bishop of London (nor any of the other three, as far as is remembered) returned one word. And so they were dismissed.

On Saturday, Nov. 3d, the bishop of London (who had promised the archbishop the day before to dine this day with him) and the bishop of Rochester (who had been in the mean time sent to, to meet him there) came to Lambeth accordingly. But understanding when they came, that the bishops of Chester and St. David’s (though not invited) were come in before them, and were with the archbishop, they went together to dine with a friend not far off; and returning about 3 or 4 of the clock (those two other bishops being then gone) to the archbishop, they consulted, and agreed, that the archbishop should send to inquire after the bishop of Peterburgh, and that all should meet again there on Monday, and resolve what was fit to be done on this occasion.

The archbishop having found upon inquiry, that (whatever the bishop of St. David’s pretended) the bishop of Peterburgh was not in London; but that he might possibly be heard of at a place in the country not far remote:

On Sunday, Nov. 4th, before day, he horsed a servant, and sent him with a letter to the bishop; who being found, came that evening to the archbishop, and was by him acquainted with the meeting appointed for the day following, at which he promised to be present.

In the mean time (this day before dinner) his majesty sent the lord Preston to the archbishop, to require him to expedite (as much as might be) the return to the king’s proposal. The archbishop acquainted his lordship what had been done herein hitherto, which, he confessed, was as much as could be done; and said, that he would inform his majesty accordingly.

On Monday, Nov. 5th, the bishops met all at Lambeth according to appointment; and, after due deliberation and debate, agreed unanimously what measures to take, and hold to in their answers upon the whole matter: and what they were, will best appear at their next audience.

This evening the archbishop sent to the lord Preston, to give him notice, that the bishops had this day met, and were ready to wait upon the king the next day between 10 and 11 in the morning, if it were agreeable to his majesty's convenience and good pleasure. The secretary went immediately to the king, and having spoken with him, returned answer, that his majesty accepted of the time, and would then expect them.

On Tuesday, Nov. 6th, when the bishops came together at Whitehall, they found the bishop of St. David's waiting for them in the guard chamber, ready to thrust in with them to the king. But they meeting also (very happily) the lord Preston there, the archbishop took him aside, and desired him to procure for them a private audience from the king. His lordship understood the meaning of the request, and going presently to the king, moved him in it: who thereupon (as the lord Preston informed the bishops) ordered the bishop of St. David's to withdraw; which he did.

Letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury from the Bishop of Rochester.

May it please your Grace;

When I came out of town on Friday morning, I desired divers of your grace's family to give me notice by a messenger, as soon as your grace should be certain of the time of my lord of London's coming to London. But having heard nothing as yet from Lambeth, I presume his lordship is not yet returned out of Essex. In this time I have drawn up, as your grace commanded, what I can remember of our conference at Whitehall; that if my lord of Peterburgh shall be pressing to go out of town, your grace may be furnished with matter, together with what he shall remember, for the composing an exact account of all that passed. I believe my papers are by much too long; but I thought it was better, in a business of great consequence, to be tedious, than to omit any thing considerable. I shall be ready upon the first summons to attend your grace and my brethren at Lambeth.

I beg your grace's prayers for your grace's, &c.

* Here concludes the Narrative in the Archbishop's hand writing.

The Bishop of Rochester's relation.

The substance (as I can remember) of what passed between the king, my lord abp. of C. my lord of L. my lord of P. and myself, on Tuesday November 6th, 1688.

We four being sent for into the room within the bed-chamber, whither the king was come before, my lord abp. began to this purpose.

Abp. Sir, we think we have done all that can be expected from us in this business. Since your majesty has declared you are well satisfied in our innocency, we regard not the censures of others.

Here the bishop of Peterburgh and myself having been absent the former meeting, made our personal protestations, (as my lord abp. and my lord of L. had done before us) that we had neither by word nor writing, directly or indirectly, invited the prince of Orange to invade his majesty's dominions, nor did we know of any that had.

K. My lords, I am abundantly satisfied with you all, as to that matter. I had not the least suspicion of you. But where is the paper I desired you to draw up, and bring me?

Bps. Sir, we have brought no paper; nor (with submission) do we think it necessary or proper for us to do it. Since your majesty is pleased to say, you think us guiltless, we despise what all the world besides shall say. Let others distrust as they will, we regard it not: we rely on the testimony of our own consciences, and your majesty's favourable opinion.

K. But I expected a paper from you. I take it, you promised me one. I look upon it to be absolutely necessary for my service; and seeing you are mentioned in the prince of Orange's Declaration, you should satisfy others as well as me.

Here the king, taking notice that my lord of Peterburgh and myself had been absent the time before, took out the Declaration, and read to us what concerned the birth of the prince of Wales, and the prince of Orange's resolutions to come hither for the preservation of our religion and laws, being invited by a great many of the spiritual and temporal lords.

Bps. Sir, we cannot think ourselves bound to declare publicly under our hands against a paper, come forth in such a private manner, which as yet nobody owns; and which, as they say, seems rather to be written like a lawyer's brief, than a princely Declaration. We assure your majesty, scarce one in 500 believes it to be the prince's true declaration.

K. No! said the king with some vehemence, then that five hundred would cut my throat, or bring in the prince of O. upon my throat.

Bps. God forbid.

K. What, must not I be believed? must my credit be called in question? and turning the Declaration over in his hands, one of us asked, whether the prince of Orange's arms were to it? He said, there were all the signs of a true Declaration.

Bps. Sir, your majesty's credit is not here concerned. It is sufficient for that, that your officers seized on it.

Abp. Sir, it is a good reason to us to suspect it is not his, that this very clause is in it, of his being invited by a great many spiritual and temporal lords. For either this is true, or false. If true, one would think it were very unwisely done of the prince of Orange to discover it so soon. If it be false, one would not imagine a great prince would publish a manifest untruth, and make it the grounds of his enterprize.

K. What! he that can do as he does, think you he will stick at a lie? You all know how usual it is, for men in such cases to affirm any kind of falsehoods for the advantage of their cause.

Bps. However, Sir, this is a business of date, which properly belongs not to us. To declare peace and war is not our duty; but in your majesty's power only. God has intrusted the sword with you.

Abp. Truly, Sir, we have lately some of us here, and others my brethren who are absent, so severely smarted for meddling with matters of state and government, that it may well make us exceeding cautious, how we do so any more. For though we presented your majesty a petition of the most innocent nature, and in the most humble manner imaginable, yet we were so violently prosecuted, as it would have ended in our ruin, if God's goodness had not preserved us: and I assure your majesty, the whole accusation turned upon this one point—Your attorney and solicitor both affirmed, that the honestest paper relating to matters of civil government might be a seditious libel, when presented by persons who had nothing to do with such matters, as they said we had not, but in time of parliament. And indeed, Sir, they pursued us so fiercely upon this occasion, that, for my part, I gave myself for lost.

K. I thank you for that, my lord of Cant. I could not have thought you would believe yourselves lost by falling into my hands.

Bps. Sir, my lord of Canterbury's meaning is, he looked on himself as lost in the courts of law; lost in Westminster-hall.

Abp. But, Sir, the injustice of the prosecution against us did not cease there. After we had been acquitted by our jury, and our acquitment was recorded, and so we were right in the eye of the law, yet after that we were afresh arraigned, and condemned by divers of your judges, as seditious libellers, in their circuits all over England. And, Sir, I beg leave to say, that if the law were open, (that is, as my lord of Cant. afterwards explained himself, if the same persons were not to be judges and parties) had the meanest subject your majesty has, been used as we have been, he would have found abundant reparation in your courts of justice for so great a scandal.

I will particularly acquaint your majesty with what one of your judges, baron H. by name said, coming from the bench, where he had declared our petition to be a factious libel.

A gentleman of quality asking him how he could have the conscience to say so, when the bishops had been legally discharged of it? he answered, you need not trouble yourself with what I said on the bench: I have instructions for what I said, and I had lost my place if I had not said it. Sir, added the abp. I hope this is not true. But it is true that he said it. There was another of your judges, Sir, baron R. who attacked us in another manner, and endeavoured to expose us as ridiculous, alledging that we did not write true English, and it was fit we should be corrected by Dr. Busby for false grammar.

Bps. Sir, that was not all. The same judge, as we are certainly informed, presumed to revile the whole church of England with the most scandalous language: affirming, that this church which your majesty has so often honoured by promising to cherish and protect it, is a cruel and bloody church.

K. The king speaking to my lord of Cant. said, my lord, this is querelle d'Alemand: all this is a matter quite out of the way. I thought this had been all forgotten. For my part, I am no lawyer. I am obliged to think what my judges do is according to law. But if you will still complain on that account, I think, I have reason to complain too. I am sure your counsel did not use me civilly. I know what is commonly said, that it is customary for the counsel to speak what they can for their clients. But they went farther, and interposed in matters they had nothing to do with. As for what you say, that it is hazardous to meddle in matters of state, that is true when I do not call you to it. But I may ask counsel or assistance of any, as I now do of you; and then there can be no danger.

Here the king still earnestly urging that we would present him with something under our hands, which he had before sometime called a dislike, sometime an abhorrence, sometime a detestation of the prince of Orange's proceedings; and his majesty insisting much upon a promise of this nature, made by my lords of Cant. and London, when we the other two were absent; they, with all duty and submission, persisted, that they never promised a paper, but only to deliberate with other their brethren about town, whom they could confide in, about framing a paper; and if they should agree upon one, to bring or send it to his majesty. Upon this the king asked my lord Preston, whom his majesty had sent for some time before, whether my lords of Cant. and London had not promised a paper, though they now denied it?

As far as I can recollect, my lord Preston answered in these words, or to this sense—That the said lords bishops promised, that, if they should consent or agree upon a paper, they would present it to his majesty before it was published.

Bps. We then said, we were very few of the bishops' bench in town, with whom we could advise: that in so weighty a business the king might be pleased to summon up the rest,

* See justice Allibon's charge, p. 190.

K. The king answered, he had told my lord of Cant. before, that it would be too far, and too late to send to Carlisle, or Exeter, or other remote parts: but if we there present would subscribe, he would afterwards send to those who were farther off for their concurrence.

Bps. We most humbly intreat, that this small number here present may not be separated from the rest, as if we were most suspected than others: farther we said, that the lords temporal were equally concerned in the accusation; and we prayed, that they might be called together, and joined with us in consulting about this protestation, required of us alone.

K. The king hastily answered, Ay, I believe, some of the temporal lords have been already with you and caused you to change your minds.

Bps. We all solemnly declared the contrary: and the king put this off by saying, that he knew some, as my lord Preston, had been with us.

Bps. We said, we understood, that divers of temporal lords had been with his majesty upon this very occasion; and we humbly asked, whether he had demanded any such thing of them, as he now was pleased to do of us?

K. His majesty said, no, he had not. But it would be of more concernment to his service that we should do it, because we had a greater interest with the people.

Bps. We replied, that in matters of this nature, belonging to civil government and the affairs of war and peace, it was most probable, the nobility would have a far greater influence on the nation than we: they being persons who have a greater stake to venture, and the managing such matters belonging properly to them, not to us.

K. But this is the method I have proposed. I am your king. I am judge what is best for me. I will go my own way. I desire your assistance in it.

Bps. Sir, we have already made our personal vindication here in your majesty's presence: your majesty has condescended to say, you believe and are satisfied with it. Now, Sir, it is in your power to publish what we have here said to all the world in your royal Declaration, which, we hear, is coming forth.

Here also something was added, which I do not distinctly remember. I think, it was to this effect; that this way of men's being so called to purge themselves might be a thing of very tender concernment to the liberties and properties of the subjects, especially of the peers: and therefore we begged his majesty would require no more of us in particular, but would rest content with publishing this our declaration of our innocency.

K. No; if I should publish it, the people would not believe me.

Bps. Sir, the word of a king is sacred: it ought to be believed on its own authority: it would be presumption in us to pretend to strengthen it; and the people cannot but believe your majesty in this matter.

K. They that could believe me guilty of a false son, what will they not believe of me?

Bps. But, Sir, all the court sees us going in and out: and all the town will know the effect of what has been done and said, and we shall own it every where.

K. And all the town will know what I have desired of you; so that it will be a great prejudice to my affairs, if you deny me.

Bps. We still earnestly beseeched his majesty, that we might not be divided from the temporal peers: that at least he would appoint a select number of them to consult with us. The king still refusing to hear of that, and urging our immediate compliance, we told him, that the chief place for us to serve his majesty effectually in was in a parliament: and when he should please to call one to compose all the distractions of his kingdoms, he should there find, that as we had always shewn our personal affections to his majesty, so that the true interest of the church of England was inseparable from the true interest of the crown.

K. My lords, that is a business of more time. What I ask now, I think of present concernment to my affairs. But this is the last time, I will urge you no farther. If you will not assist me as I desire, I must stand upon my own legs, and trust to myself, and my own arms.

The substance and conclusion of our reply was, That as bishops we did assist his Majesty with our prayers; as peers, we intreated we might serve him in conjunction with the rest of the peers, either by his majesty's speedy calling a parliament, or, if that should be thought too long, by assembling together with us as many of the temporal peers as were about the town. This was not hearkened to; and so we were dismissed.

The Bishop of Peterburgh's Relation of what past with the King about Abhorrence, Nov. 6, 1688, [in a Letter to the Bishop of St. Asaph.]

My dear Lord and Brother;

About ten we met, but in the way to the place appointed, my lord archbishop met Watson, who desired to thrust himself in amongst us, but was refused. He went into the bed-chamber, and was sent away from thence by lord Preston, by the king's order, who was made acquainted with our exception. We entered the closet, and the king demanded the paper. We knew nothing of any paper. Rochester and I declared we had no hand directly or indirectly in calling in the prince of Orange. The king said he believed so. The archbishop said we had now done all that we could do: for we had satisfied his majesty, and we were no way concerned for any man's opinion besides, but defied and scorned it. But says the king, you ought to vindicate yourselves. No, Sir, says he, we have been often abused by false reports and libels: after we had suffered a sharp prosecution at the bar, your majesty's judges reviled us all over the nation, and being secure of our innocence we have made no complaints, nor endeavoured to set ourselves fair in men's opinions. If your majesty be satisfied, as you declare yourself to be, we despise the opinions of others. But, says the king, you promised me a paper of your dislike. It was answered, I promised to call the bishops together, and to consult about it, &c. You promised me a paper, and my lord Preston was witness of it; upon which he was called, who said the same thing, with a condition.

We argued against any farther declaration, because the paper against which we were to declare was not thought to be true; one of 500 did not believe it. We were joined with the temporal lords, and if his majesty expected any declaration from us, it ought to be in conjunction with them. The most proper place was a parliament: but if his majesty's business would not suffer the delay of a parliament, the next best was a convention of the peers. No, says the king; give me leave to understand my own business: it is your declaration which I desire: you are men beloved in your dioceses, and your names and examples will draw others. It was answered, the temporal lords are far more proper for that, whose great estates give them great interest. The archbishop added, that we had lately suffered for meddling, as Williams said, with affairs of state, and there told all the story of our trial, and all this for meddling in public affairs. The king still insisted on a paper, and we on calling a parliament, and in the interim the temporal lords: and so we parted under some displeasure. I am your affectionate brother,

November 7th, —88.

T. P.

It was said that the king might use our names in his Declaration, if he so pleased, which would be equal to our declaration, that we had not called in the prince: but, says he, the people will not believe me. We answered, it was a shame that we should give attestations to his majesty's words, which were sacred, &c. He need not fear we should retract our words, especially when the retraction was treasonable, &c. He told the archbishop and bishop of London, that they had changed their minds; the temporal lords had turned them.*

* The Scots bishops were more compliant than those of England. They published at this time a Declaration, in which they prayed that "Providence might give the king the hearts of his subjects and the necks of his enemies." Dalrymple, part 1, book 5, p. 153, 4to edition.

three days, I thought it my duty to give you this account.

When I waited upon the king, by his command, on Thursday morning the 1st of November, he told me, that he had sent for me, when he had nothing but the Declaration of the states of Holland, but that the Declaration of the prince of Orange was now come to his hands; out of which he read to me the short paragraph of the lords temporal and spiritual, inviting his highness over.* Upon which I told him, I was confident the rest of the bishops would as readily answer in the negative as myself: and his majesty was pleased then to say, he did believe us all innocent. Next he told me, he thought it requisite, we should make some public declaration of our innocence in this matter, and likewise an abhorrence. I then desired to see the Declaration: but he refused. I told him this was a matter to be considered. Every one, says he, is to answer for himself: but I will send for my lord of Canterbury, who shall call you together.

On Friday the 2nd of November, I waited upon the king with my lord of Canterbury, &c. when his majesty told him of the prince's Declaration, and made the lord Preston read it. Then he put the question round, which was answered in the negative. Then the king desired some such denial should be published, saying it would be for his service; but would not allow time to send for the bishops at a distance. So his grace told him he would send for those in and about town to consult about it. Upon which the king repeated twice, that we should add our dislike, which would be very much for his service.

I have not time to write the last conference, which I hope my lords of Rochester and Peterborough will compleat.

* Dalrymple has given from (as he says) the original in Sidney's hand, in king William's box, the following article:

"June 30, 1688. We have great satisfaction to find by 35, and since by Mons. Zulestein, that your highness is so ready and willing to give us such assistances as they have related to us. We have great reason to believe, we shall be every day in a worse condition than we are, and less able to defend ourselves, and therefore we do earnestly wish we might be so happy as to find a remedy before it be too late for us to contribute to our own deliverance; but although these be our wishes, yet we will, by no means, put your highness into any expectations which may misguide your own counsels in this matter; so that the best advice we can give, is to inform your highness truly both of the state of things here at this time, and of the difficulties which appear to us. As to the first, the people are so generally dissatisfied with the present conduct of the government, in relation to their religion, liberties and properties (all which have been greatly invaded) and they are in such expectation of their prospects being daily worse, that your highness may be as-

The Bishop of London's REASONS against giving any Paper of Abhorrence.

1. We humbly beseech your majesty to receive what we offer, in a favourable sense, since we have done nothing that can justly deserve misconstruction.

2. We humbly conceive that a general clause in a Declaration, not avowed nor published, is not proof, or a sufficient ground for a man, or number of men, to vindicate themselves, as if they were concerned in it. And further, if this Declaration should be owned and published by the prince of Orange, we beg leave to offer it as our opinion to your majesty, that it would be a new thing, and no good precedent to put it [in] the power of a foreign and a general accusation to bring your majesty sured there are nineteen parts of twenty of the people throughout the kingdom, who are desirous of a change; and who, we believe, would willingly contribute to it, if they had such a protection to countenance their rising, as would secure them from being destroyed, before they could get to be in a posture able to defend themselves; it is no less certain, that much the greatest part of the nobility and gentry are as much dissatisfied, although it be not safe to speak to many of them beforehand; and there is no doubt but that some of the most considerable of them would venture themselves with your highness at your first landing, whose interests would be able to draw great numbers to them, whenever they could protect them and the raising and drawing men together; and if such a strength could be landed as were able to defend itself and them, till they could be got together into some order, we make no question but that strength would quickly be increased to a number double to the army here, although their army should all remain firm to them; whereas we do upon very good grounds believe, that their army then would be very much divided among themselves; many of the officers being to discontented that they continue in their service only for a subsistence, (besides that, some of their minds are known already) and very many of the common soldiers do daily shew such an aversion to the Popish religion, that there is the greatest probability imaginable of great numbers of deserters which would come from them, should there be such an occasion; and amongst the seamen, it is almost certain, there is not one in ten who would do them any service in such a war. Besides all this, we do much doubt whether this present state of things will not yet be much changed to the worse before another year, by a great alteration which will probably be made both in the officers and soldiers of the army, and by such other changes as are not only to be expected from a packed parliament, but what the meeting of any parliament (in our present circumstances) may produce against those who will be looked upon as principal obstructors of their proceedings there; it being taken for granted, that if things cannot then be carried to their wishes in a parliamentary way, other measures will be put in execution by more violent means; and although such proceedings will then heighten the discontents, yet such courses will probably be taken at that time, as will prevent all possible means of relieving ourselves.

“ These considerations make us of opinion, that this is a season in which we may more probably contribute to our own safeties than hereafter (although we must own to your highness there are some judgments differing from ours in this particular) insomuch that if the circumstances stand so with your highness, that you believe you can get here time enough, in a condition to give assistance this year, sufficient for a relief, under these circumstances which have been now represented, we who subscribe this will not fail to attend your highness upon your landing, and to do all that lies in our power to prepare others to be in as much readiness as such an action is capable of, where there is so much danger in communicating an affair of such a nature, till it be near the time of its being made public. But as we have already told your highness, we must also lay our difficulties before your highness, which are chiefly, that we know not what alarm your preparations for this expedition may give, or what notice it will be necessary for you to give the states before hand, by either of which means their intelligence or suspicions here, may be such, as may cause us to be secured before your landing; and we must presume to inform your highness, that your compliment upon the birth of the child (which not one in a thousand here believes to be the queen's) hath done you some injury; the false imposing of that upon the princess and the nation, being not only an infinite exasperation of people's minds here, but being certainly one of the chief causes upon which the declaration of your entering the kingdom in a hostile manner, must be founded on your part, although many other reasons are to be given on our's. If, upon a due consideration of all these circumstances, your highness shall think fit to adventure upon the attempt, or at least to make such preparations for it as are necessary, (which we wish you may) there must be no more time lost in letting us know your resolution concerning it, and in what time we may depend that all the preparations will be ready, as also whether your highness does believe the preparations can be so managed as not to give them warning here, both to make them increase their force, and to secure those they shall suspect would join with you. We need not say any thing about ammunition, artillery, mortar pieces, spare arms, &c. because if you think fit to put any thing in execution, you will provide enough of these kinds, and will take care to bring some good engineers with you; and we have desired Mr. H. to consult you about all such matters, to whom we have communicated our thoughts in many jesty's subjects in particular to a vindication of themselves, as if they were regularly accused, and legally tried for a criminal correspondence.

3. If your majesty should think fit to make it punishable to read or communicate this Declaration, then by making such an address as is required, we should do an act, grounded upon a thing which must not be produced; and consequently we shall not be at liberty to alledge the reasons of our doing it, which must unavoidably expose us not only to censure, but suspicion.

4. As we have in all times adhered to our duty and allegiance, we are the less willing to do any thing now which may distinguish us as men marked with a particular character of suspicion; since we think our loyalty less blemished by not being called in question, than it would be by the clearest vindication that can be made of it upon this occasion.

5. We beg leave to observe to your majesty, that by an address from these few of us who are now in town, without the concurrence of the greater number, who are absent, it would look to the world as if the bishops (who, we hope, are very well united) were of differing opinions: or, that we, who are now here, had more particular need of a vindication than the rest; which maketh it reasonable for us to be unwilling to come within the danger of an interpretation.

6. We consider, that the clause in the Declaration joineth the lords spiritual and temporal; so that, if it has any meaning, it must intend that there is a concurrence of many of both orders to invite them to this attempt; which would make it more improper for us, even though all the bishops were here, to make a separate vindication, where the accusation is joined and comprehends the temporal lords in it; so that if any notice is to be taken of it, it can be done no where so naturally, or with so good effect, as in parliament, which, whenever your majesty shall think fit to call, we resolve to do our duty, and to employ our utmost endeavours for the good of the church and state, and for the preventing the miseries particulars too tedious to have been written, and about which no certain resolutions can be taken, till we have heard again from your highness.

Vote of Thanks from the House of Commons to the Clergy of the Church of England; with an answer from the two Archbishops.

Veneris 1mo die Febr. 1688.

Resolved nemine contradicente. That the thanks of this House be given to the clergy of the Church of England, who have preached and written against popery, and refused to read (in their churches) the king's Declaration for toleration, in opposition to the pretended dispensing power claimed in the late reign of king James the 2d: and have opposed the illegal ecclesiastical commission.

Ordered,

That Mr. Leveson Gower and Mr. auditor Done do attend the two archbishops with the said resolve, to the end their graces may communicate the same to the clergy in their respective provinces.

PAUL JODRELL, C. D. C.

The sum of our answer,* twice, or thrice repeated.

That what the clergy of the Church of England had done in opposition to popery, and the pretended dispensing power, was done out of the sense of the duty we owe to God and our country: for we are true Englishmen, and true Protestants, and heartily love our religion and our laws; and esteem the very doing our duty herein to be in itself a reward, and a great satisfaction, without looking farther. Notwithstanding finding, that in what we have done, we have the general approbation of the nation, and so public a testimony of it as a vote of this honourable House, we bless God for so great an encouragement; and we in the name of the rest return our humble thanks to the House, and will take care to communicate what they have voted to the clergy in our respective provinces.

Mr. Speaker;

We do not think it sufficient that we have signified our grateful sense of the favourable vote of your honourable House, sent to us yesterday by two worthy members thereof, unless we do also repeat the same to you under our hands: and withal give you assurance (as we do hereby) that, so far as our observation can reach, the bishops and clergy of England are unmoveably fixed to the Protestant religion, and absolutely irreconcilable both to popery and arbitrary power. And so beseeching Almighty God, to direct all your councils and resolutions to his own glory, and to the good and welfare both of church and state; we humbly take leave, and subscribe ourselves your very affectionate faithful servants,

Mr. Speaker ;

We do not think it sufficient, that we have signified our grateful sense of the favourable vote of your honourable House, sent to us yesterday by two worthy members of the same ; unless we do also repeat the same to you under our hands : and withal give you assurance (as we do hereby) that so far as our observation can reach, the bishops and clergy of England are unmoveably fixed to the Protestant religion, and absolutely irreconcilable both to popery, and to arbitrary power. And we humbly recommend to this honourable House the care of preventing, and suppressing in the most effectual manner, all popish doctrines and practices ; that henceforth they may find no admittance or encouragement among you, or us, or the people of this nation : in which desire we are secure of the full and hearty concurrence both of the bishops and the whole body of the clergy of this church. And so beseeching Almighty God, to direct all your counsels and resolutions to his own glory, and to the good, and welfare both of church and state ; we humbly take leave, and subscribe ourselves your affectionate friends, and faithful servants,

*The Earl of Rochester's PAPER.

The king told me this morning, that he had spoken to your grace, first by yourself, and a second time with some other of the bishops, about that part of the prince of Orange's Declaration, that says, he had been invited to come into England by the lords spiritual and temporal, in relation to your making some declaration under your hands of dislike of it : that he found your grace both times very backward and slow in it, and complained very much that you were so : that it was two or three days since the last time he spoke to you, and that yet he heard not from you : that he would send again to you, for that it imported him very much to have something from you, on this occasion : he added, that your grace had said to him, if his majesty expected any thing in writing by way of dislike, that you wished he would summon all the bishops ; but his majesty added, that that would be a work of time, and that it was necessary for him to have something speedily. This is, as near as I can repeat it, the effect of what the king said to me, which I thought it fit to acquaint your grace with.

I acquainted the king that I had been yesterday at Lambeth ; that I had dined with your grace ; that after dinner came in the two bishops that were there ; that there was some discourse amongst us, of this matter, and that all that I found it came to was, that your grace had a mind to have the opinion of as many of the bishops as were near, and that being informed the bishop of Peterborough was so, you had resolved to get him to you.

Archbishop Sancroft's Declaration that he did not invite the Prince of Orange into England : Dated 3d of Nov. 1688.

Whereas there hath been of late a general apprehension, that his highness the prince of Orange hath an intention to invade this kingdom in hostile manner ; and (as it is said) makes this one reason of his attempt, that he hath been thereunto invited by several English lords both spiritual and temporal : I William archbishop of Canterbury do for my own discharge profess and declare, that I never gave him any such invitation by word, or writing, or otherwise ; nor do I know, nor can believe, that any of my reverend brethren, the bishops, have in any such wise invited him. And all this I aver upon my word, and in [confirmation] thereof have subscribed my name here at Lambeth this 3d day of Nov. 1688. W. C.

Letter to Archbishop Sancroft from sir Thomas Powys, knt. Attorney General ; relating to the Order of Council for prosecuting the Seven Bishops.

May it please your Grace ;

I have sent my servant to attend your grace for the order of council, I left last night ; which is not to be taken away, unless your grace have no farther occasion for it : I know your grace will easily pardon me for being solicitous to have it printed ; for I was desirous to lay hold of any thing which might, if not to the world, excuse, yet something perhaps alleviate my acting in that most unhappy prosecution, which (I call God to witness) was the most uneasy thing to me, that ever in my life time I was concerned in : and if I may be so happy as by any future action of my life to testify my sorrow, and my earnest desire, if it were possible, to make reparation, I will surely perform it with the greatest chearfulness : my lord, I hope, notwithstanding what is passed, your grace will be pleased to have that charity for me, as to believe me to be, what I really am, my lord, your grace's obedient servant, &c.

November 22, 1688.

I have examined these two accounts, and find them justly summed.

THO. PETRIBURG.

We have seen (p. 108, of this Volume,) that in 1686, king James granted to Obadiah Walker a license to print and sell several Popish books. Two years afterwards the sale in Scotland, of certain books and pamphlets, was prohibited by the following Proclamation:

‘ James by the grace of God, king of Great Britain, France and Ireland, defender of the faith: To ‘ Macers of our privy council, messengers at arms, our sheriffs in that part, conjunctly and severally, specially constitute, greeting:
 ‘ Forasmuch as we being informed, that there are many impious and scandalous books and pamphlets printed in Holland, and elsewhere, inciting our subjects to murder and assassination, as well as rebellion, to the great reproach of the christian religion, and the ruin of all human society; in which also our government and the actions of our royal predecessors, and our own, are represented as cruel, barbarous and tyrannical, and all such as have served and obeyed us, are railed at as enemies to God and their native country, notwithstanding of the great care we have always taken to tolerate all different persuasions, and the clemency we have shewn in pardoning the greatest criminals, which books are brought home into this kingdom, and vended, and spread here; and we being most desirous, on this, as on all other occasions, to prevent any of our subjects being brought into a snare, we have thought fit hereby to intimate and make known, that if any of our subjects shall hereafter bring home, vend, or sell, disperse or lend any of the books underwritten, viz. all translations of Buchanan de Jure Regni, Lex Rex, Jus Populi, Nephtali, the Cup of Cold Water, the Scots Mist, the Apologetical Relation, Mene Tekel, the Hynd let loose, the treasonable Proclamations issued out at Sanquhar, and these issued out by the late duke of Monmouth, and the late earl of Argyle, or any other books that are, or shall be hereafter written or printed, defending these treasonable and seditious principles, they shall be liable as if they were authors of the said books; and all other our subjects are hereby commanded to bring in any of the said books they have, and deliver them into any privy councillor, sheriff, balie of regality, or bailaries, or their deputes, or any magistrates of burghs, to be transmitted by them to the clerks of our privy council, to the end the ‘ same may be destroyed: with certification that whoever (except privy councillors) shall be found to have any of the said books, and not to have delivered them up, shall be fined, for our use, in such a penalty as our council shall appoint, for each of the said books, that he or they have not delivered up; and appoints the said books and pamphlets to be brought in betwixt and the diets following, viz. These in the town of Edinburgh, and suburbs thereof, betwixt and the first Tuesday of September next to come, and all others within this kingdom, betwixt and the first Tuesday of November next to come. And to the end our royal pleasure in the premisses may be made public and known, our will is, and we charge you strictly and command, that incontinent, these our letters seen, ye pass to the market-cross of Edinburgh, and whole remanent market-crosses of the head burghs of the shires of this kingdom, and other places needful, and there, in our name and authority, make publication of our royal pleasure in the premisses. And recommend to the most reverend the archbishops, and right reverend bishops, to cause read this our royal Proclamation, in all the pulpits of this kingdom, upon some convenient Lord’s day, in the forenoon, immediately after divine service, that none pretend ignorance.

‘ Given under our signet, at Edinburgh, the 15th day of August, 1688 years, and of our reign the fourth year.

‘ Per actum Dominorum secreti Concilii.

‘ WM. PARTERSON, Cl. Sec. Con.’
 ‘ God save the king.’

Of this Proclamation, Wodrow writes:

“ The occasion of it was the seizing of some copies of the Hind let loose, when coming home from Holland. We have had several Proclamations of this sort before, and so I shall not spend time in observes upon this; and indeed it is softer than one would have expected, after their seizing of such a book as the last named, wherein the king’s right and title is impugned and argued against.

“ It is not without a particular emphasis, that the Proclamation declares the books prohibited to have been printed in Holland; now when the noise of the prince of Orange’s expedition began to be talked of. The books and pamphlets discharged, are, ‘ All translations of Buchanan de Jure Regni, Lex Rex, Jus Populi, Nephtali, the Cup of Cold Water, the Scots Mist, the Apologetical Declaration, Mene Tekel, the Hind let loose, the treasonable Proclamations issued out at Sanquhar, and those issued out by the late duke of Monmouth, and the late earl of Argyle.’ The terms upon which they are to be brought in, and other things, the reader hath in the proclamation itself.

“ I am well informed that this Proclamation was put in execution in Edinburgh, by people who in the councils name went through the booksellers shops, and seized not only these where they found them, but likewise any books written against Popery, alledging the selling of these tended to alienate peoples minds from his majesty. And I have the following pleasant incident from a very good hand at this time in Edinburgh.

"Some of the counsellors gave themselves the trouble to visit some of the booksellers' shops, and the advocate used to relax himself this way. Either he, or another of the counsellors came into a shop, where the master was a firm whigg, and asked him if he had any prohibited books. The other desired him to search and look for them. After he had looked through and caught nothing, he asked if he had any books against Popery. The other answered he had, and a good number of them. The former called for a sight of them; for, said he, that is the religion of his majesty, and his subjects ought not to be alienated from him upon that score. Upon this the counsellor was directed to the place in the shop where the bibles lay, and the door being cast open he took one of them, and a second, and said to the bookseller, these are bibles. They are so, said the other, and from one end to the other against Popery. This was reckoned an high crime; and in the afternoon the master of the shop was cited to appear before the council, and there was brought to some trouble."

Among sir William Williams's papers are his original brief in this cause, and the order (under the councils' seal) directing the attorney and solicitor general to prepare the information against the bishops, and prosecute the same, &c. By this latter instrument, it appears, that the persons present in council when the order was made, were, the king, lord chancellor, lord president, lord privy seal, marquis of Powis, lord chamberlain, earl of Huntingdon, earl of Peterborough, earl of Craven, earl of Berkeley, earl of Moray, earl of Middleton, earl of Melfort, viscount Preston, lord Dartmouth, lord Godolphin, lord Dover, Mr. chancellor of the exchequer, lord chief justice Herbert, sir Nicholas Butler, Mr. Petre.

Sir W. Williams, in his Argument in Prynne's Case, Trin. 2, W. and M. speaking of this case of the seven bishops, said, "I will not undertake to justify the proceedings of the late government: we have all done amiss, and must wink at one another." See 5 Mod. 463.

Neverthelesse it is of veritie, that the said John Balfour of Kinloch, and David Haxstoun off Rathillet, and others, having upon the third day of May, 1679 years, killed and murdered his grace James late archbishops of St. Andrews: they, to escape justice, did involve others in ther guilt, fled into the Westerne shyres, and rose and joynd in open armes and rebellione against his majestie and his authoritie, with seven or eight thousand rebels, ther accomplices from all places of the West and South countreyes, did burne his majestie's lawes and acts of parliament, at the Mercat Croce of Rutherglen, issued furth treasonable proclamations and declarationes of ther owne, drowned out bonfyres, sett on in commemoratione of our royall brotherther gracioussoveraine his happie restoratione, and upon the — day of June the said year, did fight, resist and oppose a pairti of our forces at Loudonhill, under the command of captaine Grahame, of Claverhouse, killed and murdered severalls of them, and them marched in warlyke postoure to our burgh off Glasgowe, did assault and atacke the same, and his majestie's forces therin, wher being repulsed, they marched up and downe the countrey in military forme, randevouzed and exercised themselves, apoynted officers and commanders over them, did robb and rifle the goods, horses and arms of his majestie's good subjects, did take prisoners kept, counsellis of warr, incamped themselves at severall places, particularlie at Solcross, and commissar Fleymeing's park, at the Shawehead muire and Bothwell-bridge; and whill the saids rebels were thus up in armes committeing all acts of hostilitie and high treasons, the saids John Love, John King, elder, and younger, and the haill remanent persons above named, with fyve or six score off rebels, ther accomplices, did lykwayes ryse and apear in armes in open rebellione against his majesty and his authority within the shirreffdome of Renfrew, and places adjacent therto, randevouzed and drilled up and downe and exercised themselves, apoynted captaines and commanders over themselves, wherof James Niving, in muirhead of Beltrees, and — wer principalls; and being armed with swords, pistolls, guns, pykes, Lochaber axes, trees and cabers, they marched up and downe and rank and fyle, and in war-

Wherthroue the doing or comitting wherof, or ane or other of the saids treasonable crymes, the said John Love, John King, elder and younger, and the remanent persons above complained upon, have committed the crymes and incurred the paines of high treasons, rebellione and lese majestie, and ar actors, airt, and pairt, of the samen: which being found be ane assyse, they ought to be punished with forfaiture of lyfe, land and goods, to the terror and example of others to comit the lyke in tyme commeing.

Persewer.—Sir John Dalrymple, his majesty's Advocate.

Sir Patrick Hume, sir Robert Colt, Advocats.

Procurators in Defence.—Sir George Mr. Kenzie, sir David Thiores, Mr. Daniel Lockhart.

His majesty's Advocate restricts his lybell to that pairt thereof concerning the randevouze at Mideltounhill, and what was done ther, and to the conversing with James Niving allienarlie in manner lybelled. The Persewer produced ane act of privie counsell for insisteing against the forenamed persons and others, wheroff the tenor followes:

Edinburgh the 10th day of March, 1687. The lords of his majesty's privie counsell haveing heard and considered the report of a commissione granted be them to the sheriff depute of Renfrew, and others, for taking tryall and precognitione of wittness against Extracted by me,

Sic Subscribitur, WILL. PATTERSONE.

Sir David Thiores, for the pannals, took instruments upon the lybel and his majestie's advocat's restricting and declareing thereof in manner forsaid, and alleadges (primo) that the lybell is nawayes relivant, because albeit that same doe bear that the pretendit meeting was at a place called Middletoun-hill, yet it neyther beares nor condescends within what shyre or paroch the said Mideltoun-hill doth locallie lye, and it is nottar that ther ar severall townes within the kingdome and hills therto belonging of the self same designatione: 1. Adhering to to the forsaid defence albeit the lybell hade been speciall as to the place, tyme and day, the pannalls cannot passe to the knowledge of ane inquest, because denyeing that pairt of the lybell and haill circumstances therof, It is offered to be provine (primo) the said pretendit meeting, iff any was, was absolutlie accidentall and occasionall, ther being at that place the king's common highway, wher ther is frequentlie a converse of severall persones and a publiet smiddie, wherat most of the countrey therabout were served, and a schoole for teacheing of children, and it being alleadged to have been about midtyme of the day, ther was one who occasionallie came and told them that he hade ane proclamacione from king and councill, and invitted some fewe persons who wer ther at the smiddie to come and hear the samen read upon the top off the knowe, and they accordingly haveing rune up to hear the samen read, and the nighbouring herds, school-boyes and neighbours, both men and women, seeing the concurse, they flocked altogether to hear the proclamacione read allienarlie, and no other account.

2. To demonstrat that ther was no lesse or disloyall designe in that pretendit meeting, it is lykwayes offered to be provine, that all ther present did hear the proclamation fullie read out, with dew and reverence and attention, and ther heads discovered, and that efter the same was fullie read out, they all cryed unanimouslie God save the king, and a demonstratione of ther loyaltie and obedience threw up their bonnatts, and iff need beis, it is offered lykewayes to be provine, that when the reader of the proclamatione, or some other persone inquyred what they would doe, they did answer unanimously that they would goe and fight for the king whenever they were called, so that it is most groundless to pretend that ther was the least rebellious designe or practise off that pretendit meeting, especiallie seeing ther was non in all the parroch at the rebellion but one persone, who, upon takeing the bond, is suffred to live upon my lord Glasfurd's ground.

3. It is absolutlie denied that any off the pannalls who are alleadged to have been at that pretendit meeting hade any armes at all, except one, that being a wright and no heritor, came that morning to the smiddie for sharpeing his axe, and that ther was money collected or sent to the rebels is absolutlie denied: (2) Albeit the lybell as to that pretendit metting, and haill circumstances and agravations were all actuallie provine, except as to the sending of money, which is denyed, yet the pannalls nor non of theme, can passe to the knowledge of ane inquest therupon, because by his late majesties' gracious indemnitie, daited the twentie seventh of July, 1679, primo, all treasonable speeches, all favours done to rebels are expressly pardoned and indemnified, as also all such as were ingadged in the rebellione 1666, or in the late rebellione 1679, and particularlie all those who were lyable for advyseing or encouraging any thing contrair to the lawes, except such as heretors, hade been actuallie in that rebellione or contrabuted therto, by levies of men or money alienarlie.

4. As to the pretendit conversing with James Niving, the lybell cannot be sustained, because by his majestie's proclamation, daited the thretteinth of Aprill, sixteen hundred and aughtie-three, all process and pursuits for recepting, converseing and intercomoning, or doeing favours to, and encouradgeing of rebels, is apoynted to perscrybe and discharged to be persewed efter the first of January, 1687, which day was long elapsed before the raising of this lybell.

2. Alleading that the said defence the lybell is nowayes relivant, as to the converse with James Niving, because the lybell neyther condescends upon day, place, way, maner of the said pretendit converse or recept: 3. The lybell is foundit upon alleadged converseing with James Niving, in Beltrees, wheras it is absolutelie denyed that the said James Niving, was ever at the rebellion, or that he was either declared fugitive, or put in printed fugitive roll, nor is it possible he would be justlie put in the said roll, seeing its offred positivlie to be provine the said James Nivin, in Beltrees, did actuallie compeir and enter the pannall before the lords commissioners of justiciary at Glasgow, and was discust by them.

2. That the said James Nivine, in Beltrees, was lykwayes cited and apeired before the saids lords of privie councill as a witness, and was examined and discust by them as a loyall persone, which no man will pretend they would have done to a nottorious rebell, and he is not the persone that is in the roll, the roll bearing only James Nivin in Risk, wheras the said James Nivin in Beltrees was dwelling actuallie in Beltrees the tyme off the rebellione, makeing and printeing the roll, and not in risk, and ther ar severall other James Nivings, in that paroch denyeing the lybell, or that the pannalls was heritors at the tyme.

Sir Patrick Hume, for the persewer, opens the lybell, which bears expressly that the pannals did convene in armes, within the shyre of Renfrew, the week befor the defate of the rebels, and did exercise themselves in a military posture, and kepted their rendezvouze at Mideltoun-hill, which is in the shyre off Renfrew, the week befor the defate off the rebels, at Bothwell-bridge, so that both the tyme and the place is sufficientlie condiscendit upon in the lybell. 2. That the defenders ther meeting together was accidentall is contrair to the lybell, seeing it is positivlie offred to be provine that they did convene and rendezvouze, and were exercised efter a military way by those that comandit them, and did march up and downe the countrey in that maner severall dayes, and were heard say they would goe and joyne with the rebels, at Bothwell-bridge, and evry article off the lybell, as to the conveneing and marching up and downe the countrey, and using military dissipline, traiveing them to keep ther order and fight, evry one of these articles are relivant separatim, much more when all is joyned together as in this case.

3. It is frivolous to pretend that they convened to hear the king's proclamation, and that when they heard it proclaimed they gave testimony of joy, seeing that is likwayes contrair to the lybell, and the hearing a proclamation is so farr from liberating them of the cryme, that it is rather ane aggravatione of ther guilt, seeing it is therby expressly declared, that as the west countreys insurrectione was a manifest rebellione, and that the conveneing of persons together without authoritie, especiallie such ane number being fyftie or sixtie in armes, without authoritie, did clearly fall under the acts of parliament and the said proclamatione, as also by the said proclamatione all persons who hade mett together without authoritie were comandit to render themselves to the earle of Linlithgow, then commander off the forces, which none off thir persons did, which is a clear demonstration off ther guilt.

4. That the defenders hade no armes ought lykwayes to be repelled, as lykwayes contrair to the lybell, and albeit some of them hade not armes, yet seeing they convocat without warrant from authoritie, and ther being armes amongst them, the lybell is unquestionable relivant, seeing ther very presence with others that hade armes, albeit themselves hade been without armes, it is sufficient to inferr the cryme off treason, as has been already disydit by the lords of justiciary in several cases, particularlie in Lermonts; but much more ought it to inferr the cryme of treason against the defenders in this case, they haveing meet and rendezvouzed together in that countrey, and at that tyme when the other rebels were up in rebellione; and albeit it is not necessar, yet iff need were, it could be made appear, that they actuallie declared that they were to joyne with the rebels at Bothwell-bridge.

5. The defenders cannot be secured by the act off indemnitie, because they expresslie fall under the exceptione off the act, they being heritors, and actuallie in the rebellione, and did contribut therto; and albeit it be addit by the act by the levies of men or money, yet these words are but exegitick; and iff any heritor any maner off way contribute to the rebellione, he falls under the exceptione off the act, but much more in this case, wher the defenders themselves were levied, and did put themselves in a military posture, which makes them clearlie fall under the exceptione of the act that they contribute.

6. As to the proclamatione in Apryll, 1683, it cannot secure the defenders, nore does this actione perscrybe; for first that proclamatione, as to the poynt of perscriptione, relates only to conversing and intercomoneing, but not as to such as have been actuallie in rebellione, and even in that case, they ar not to be free, but only restricted to ane arbitrary punishment, nixt perscriptione cannot be obrudit in this case, because thir same defenders were persewed befor the lords of privie councill, within thir three yeares befor the first of January, 1687, which is ane sufficient interruption, and the lords of privie councill were so convinced of the defenders guiltiness off the crymes lybelled, that upon the cognitione taken as to these crymes, did remit the defenders to the lords off justiciary to be persewed for high treason, and appoynted his majestie's advocate to insist against them, which upon the matter clears the poynts of relivance upon this lybell, that it is unquestionable relivant to in enferre treasone against the defenders, for iff the lords of privie counceill came to consider the lybell and precognition taken hade not amounted to treasone, and that it was lyk-wayes provine, they would have judged them themselves, but finding that the cryme went higher then any arbitrary punishment, they thought it fitt to remitt the defenders to be criminallie persewed for treasone, which both clears the poynt off relivancie, and is probatio probata as to the cryme.

7. As to the converseing with James Nivine, the lybell is opponed, that the defenders conversed with him efter he was declared fugitive, which is sufficient to inferr the cryme against them upon the account of converse, without condescending upon any particular tyme, that being a cryme omni tempore illicitum, and the said James Nivine was a nottorious rebell, being a captaine, and the persone who instructed in all ther millitary dissipline; and it doth not import that he is designet by the lybell to be in Beltrees, and that he was designed by the proclamation in Risk, because he dwelt in Beltrees the tyme of this lybell, and in Risk in 1679, the tyme of the rebellione, and quando constat de persona, it is no prejudice, suppose ther hade been error in designatione as there was not, and albeit he hade appeired befor the lords of justiciary at Glasgow, yet he did not put the leidges in bona fide to converse with him, seeing iff he appeared ther at all, is denyed, yet he was not conveened ther for the cryme off rebellione, but might only been as a witness, so that hoc non agebatur, that he should be free and tryed for any cryme, nor was he declared free, and the samen answer is repeatted, in case it could be made apear, that he was cited before the lords of privie counceill as a wittness, seeing it was ordinary for to make use off the greatest rebels as witness, and yet the makeing use off them as wittness putts not the leidges in bona fide to converse with them.

Sir George M'Kenzie, of Roshaugh, for the pannalls, alleadges, that the lybell as it was declared by my lord advocat and accepted by the pannalls, viz. that they mustered in armes, declared that they would adhere to the rebels, and contributed money, is found relivant of consent, nor will the pannalls procourators defend any such traitors, but as the lybell is now insisted on, viz. evry poynt separatim is relevant; they crave leave to deffer extreamly in the principle as inconsistent with all humaine societie and the nature of mankind, for as to the first brench, viz. that the pannalls did meet and muster may conceive the samen is foundit upon no act of parliament, nor no part of the common law to inferr treasone, in so farr as convocatione, is a separat cryme from treasone, and even convocatione in armes, with mustering, except ther were ane considerable number above ane hunder armed and continowing in armes, does not at all inferr ane cryme, ther being nothing more ordinar in Scotland, and all the pairts off Europe then upon accidentall occasions, such as burrialls, marriages, neighbour feeds, fear of harships, huntings, keeping of watches, weaponshawings, and many other occasiones they use aither by comand off the heritors or without comand, upon emergents to unite, administer, and it is oft tymes verie advantageous for the government; as for instance, iff a prisoner were to be rescued that were taken for a cryme, it were very just and farr from treasone for any heritor to gather together his people all in armes and muster, or iff ther were noise or aprehensione off rysing off rebels in the neighbourhead, as in this case it was a duty and comendable in his majestie's leidges to meet and muster, and that such meetings were no crymes, was expresslie found by the lords off justiciarie in the proces persewed be the earl of Seaforth contra assunt efter most contentious debate; and even the fyfth act of the first session and first parliament of king Charles the Second, dischargeing the ryseing in armes being but generall words, has been declared by that decision not to be extendit to any rysings, except wher the number exceedeth ane hunder men; and that it was done in oppositione to the king's royall authoritie upon ane public account, and that even the ryseing in oppositione to his majestie's commissione off fyre, sword, tho' warranted by authoritie, did inferr no such cryme, and this is foundit very justlie upon the nature and temprament of mankind, which is to be the rule in all decissions, for ther is nothing more naturall and customary amongst comon people then to rune together, not only upon these occasious, but even by ignorance or novillty or missrepresentatione and therefor no lawyer hath been so barbarous, as from such subitanious acts, whereupon no prejudice followed to inferre so hynous a cryme; and the act of parliament itself, declaring only the ryseing in armes against the king to be treasone, does from these words and the narrative off the act founding upon the great disorders that have been committed in the late horrid rebellions, requyre two things expresslie from the words; first, that the ryseing should be in armes, and the denomination must be taken from the greater pairt, nor could there be any thing more absurd then to think that threttie or fourtie herds driveling themselves, tho' no man should have a sword, that this could be called a ryseing in armes: 2. It requyres that it most be against the king's authoritie, and so ther most be something exprest to shew that it was against the king's authoritie, or else all former accidents enumerat might have against the interest off mankynd, and the designe off legislators amounted to treasone, which was never designed for tho' wher the greater pairties in armes, any one man wanting armes, being present, is justlie; yet except the greater or a considerable pairt were yet in armes, no armless convocatione was found to be treasone.

3. But even these qualificationes, irrelevant as they ar, ar fullie taken off by this exculpatione offred to be provine, viz. that the number did not exceed fourtie or fyftie, that these were persons could have no designe, such as herds-women and children, for the greater pairt: that the occasione and ryse off the meeting was accidentall; that they read the king's proclamatione, and cryed God blisse the king; that bareheaded most off them, and generallie it was declared that they would owne the king's authoritie and goe to his armie and fight for him; that ther was but two or three off that little number that hade armes; that some off those things called armes, viz. the axe, were naturally fitt to be brought to the smiddie wher they were by a countrey man, for ane countrey use, and was but a common axe, the bearer being a wright to his trade; that they hade dissipat within ane hour, and never meet againe, nor never randevouzed thereafter, as people in rebellione used to doe, all which qualifications ar very consistent with the lybell as it is now restricted, for tho' it were indeed inconsistent with the lybell as lybelled, and which is found relivant, yet certainly it only taks off that ane general poynt of the people per se, viz. that some people mett and randevoused, and even in general so favourable is the pairt off the defenders that ane exculpatione, though contrair to the lybell, is sustained in criminalls, or else a man might be overtaken for mustering his owne people in armes to bring back ane harship, for it would certainly in that case be provine that they mett and driveled off that law did not allow circumstances to be provine sufficient to qualifie restrict, and take of the lybel.

3. Though some particular persons hade said they would goe to the rebellione, which cannot be proven, yet except it would be provine that this was generallie resolved upon at the meeting which is indeed weell and judicallie lybelled these words 'suos tenent authores et Novum Caput sequitur;' but that qualificatione is a law,* taken off by offering to prove that it was generallie spoken and resolved that they would serve the king, and cried universalie God blisse him, and read his proclamatione with respect, which in dubio is much stronger and ought to be preponderat, the words off any ane or two ignorant bodes, which eyther might not be heard or deserved not to be regairdit, to which branch the defence is lykwayes joyned, that pairt of the indemnitie 1679, remitting all words spoken, and the lords commissioners of Justiciary ar disyred to consider what a dangerous condition mankynd were in if in a company off four or fyve hundred loyall men, one or two should be by ane extravagant expressions, neither heard it nor had it by the company, inferr them all in a common guilt, and the most that could inferr is a different cryme from this, viz. concealling and not revealling, which is not lybelled hear, and in which case it most be provine that the words were heard or could not, but have been heard by the company, they being in one rounge and serrious upon the affair, which can never be extendit to words spoken in a company in the feilds by sensles bodies.

To the 2nd poynt off the defence insisted upon, as to Nivin converse with him or recepting him, cannot inferr treasone, because the persone alleadged denounced fugitive is niving in risk, and the replye made that this is but ane wrong designatione, and that constat de personæ is most absurd and irrelivant; for when the designatione is not de substantia actus, as in contracts, testaments, &c. falsa designatio non vitiat contractum, yet wher the designatione is de substantia actus, as in all cases of certioration ther, except the designatione condescendit on be provine, ther can be no cryme, as for instance in our case, because ther may be many men off one name dwelling in the neighbourhead ther, specifice designations are requisit quoad the putting the leidges in mala fide, for iff ther were no designatione certainly the denunciatione could inferr no guilt; ergo, when the law requyres a designatione, a wrong designation is no designation, especiallie as to the place off dwelling, so ignorant poor people, such as the pannalls, requyre clear marks; such as designationes off the place, the parroch, &c. or else the lawe would be in a snare to them, and they would be overtaken for ignorance and not for guilt, and why did not only our law, but the criminal itself, requyre the designations to be printed and publict except for this end, and since equipollences ar not requyred by our lawe, even in such things as ar stricti juris, much lesse ought they to be receaved to inferr crymes, especially in such dangerous crymes as treason, and in such qualifications as converse, which of its own nature is hard enough for any common man, but much less ought this to be allowed in this case, wher it is positivlie offered to be provine, that ther were two more James Nivings within a myle, so that this persone was no mor James Nivin off Risk then they were, for non off them were ther.—

2. Iff ane equipollence were to be receaved, it behoved to be in these termes, viz. that albeit he dwelt not in Risk, yet it is offred positivlie to be provine that they were in mala fide to converse with this Nivine, because they sawe him actuallie in armes, which supplies the want of denunciation, but when he was never in armes and hear present to byd a legall tryall, when he dwelt not in Risk the tyme of the denunciatione, when ther were others off the same name dwelling within two myles, and when the common measure taken to informe the leidges, viz. the publict roll printed by authoritie off the counsell, when they hade reason to beleive that was not the man when he conversed with officers, judges, at Kirk and Mercat, as other men did, for who when a man is rightly designed as Duchall's brother, was these qualificationes be not sufficient per se, yet wher the persone is not rightly designed, and so they have not done all that the law allowes and comands expresslie, it is most absurd to pretend that mankynd could be sure with such principles. As to what is answered to the act of indemnitie 1683, by which it is contentit that those pannalls were not persewed debito tempore conforme to the indemnitie. It is duplyed, that the indemnitie has taken off all persuits, except such as were intended debito tempore befor the first of January 1687; and therfor, tho' a persuit intended befor that tyme might be insisted upon, yet no new process could be raised, for else the interruption appoynted for the prescriptione hade been absolutlie elusione and uselese, and when the persewer insists in that lybell, he shall have ane answer.

2. That lybell, iff it were insisted in, is absolutlie irrelevant, and ther is no lybell, for conversing with Nivine is absolutly perscrybed, as wanting a warrand 'et non legitime fieri et non fieri equiparantur.'

3. That process did absolutely seaze by the defenders getting a protestatione for not insisting which is extracted, and so perit instantia, and it could not have been continewed by the councill nor could the act off councill, tho debito tempore, take away the indemnity and jus quæsitum to the pairtie, and much more when the act off councill is long posterior, viz. in March, for they being once secure by the indemnitie as to recept and harbouring which is all that is contentit here ane act of councill two moneths efter the finishing off the prescriptione, and the protestation obtained for not insisting cannot revive a cryme when it is extinguished, nor any such replyes or streached grounds sutable to his majestie's gracious inclinatione so ample now declared in favours off all those poor people whose errors he has in his clemencie imputed not to arryse from the unkyndnes to him and his familie, but from ignorance, mistake or oppressione, and iff these persons hade beene guilty, they hade been found guilty long or now.

His Majestie's Advocat oppons the lybell and adheres to the former answers, and as to the place of the randevouze, the designation of Middeltoun-hill, which is in the same parrock in the midst off the pannalls interest, being a knowen place, is sufficient, and ther was never a lybell restricted to a more precise and nottor tyme then the week before the defate off Bothwell bridge; and as to that pairt of the defence that the randevouze being without armes and accidentall, it doth not inferr the paine of the lybell: it is replied, that in this case, it is not a simple convocation off his majestie's leidges that is lybelled, or convocatione in a military posture excusing the pannalls in forme of warr disposed in company under the command officers, and marching according to the rules and methods off souldiers by rank and fyle, receaving the ordinary words of comand, goeing to the right and left hand, and doeing evry thing that sojores, drivled and discipline, or used to doe, and this randevouze being in a tyme when ther was ane open rebellione in the kingdome within a dayes march of the randevouz, which rebellione as it hade stood for a considerable tyme, and was nottor so by publict proclamation: it was declared a rebellione by the letters of exculpatione, it appeares that the pannalls had one off the proclamationes and so they would pretend no ignorance; but whill they were randevouzing in forme of warr, ther was ane open rebellione at ther doores, with which they were in a capacitie to joyne at ther pleasure, so that every one off these steps per se ar relivant convocatione off his majestie's leidges in fear or posture of warr, tho ther had been no rebellione or armes amongst them, et multo magis, when a rebellione infested that same country, and the convocatione off the leidges in itself is a cryme, and the usurping off his majestie's prerogative, and therfor in the first parliament off king Charles the second these poynts ar stated in two distinct poynts and acts, wherof the first being the fourth act asserts and declares his majestie's royall prerogative in makeing of leagues and conventions of his subjects, and the act relates to a former act of parliament of king James the sixt, wherby it is statut that none off his majestie's subjects, of whatsoever state or conditione, presume to convocat, convene or assemble, without his majestie's speciall comand or licence, and by the subsequent act of his majestie's prerogative in making off peace and warr, raising armies, is distinctlie asserted, so that the convocatione off the leidges without warrand and authoritie, tho' the randevouzeing in armes were not libelled, were in itself a cryme, which by the seventie sevent act parliament, fourteint king James the second, which is lykwayes renewed by king James the fourth, such unwarrantable convocations off the leidges is declered to inferr confiscatione of goods, and the lyfe off the contravener, and amongst all nations levieing of warr or raiseing in armies, is treasone nowe the greatest; armies have been raised, marshalled, modelled and exercised, without any armes, and the raiseing off ane army imports not armes for conscribere manum, or to levie any armie imports no more but the raiseing and modelling the bodies off the men which ar ordinarily armed from the magazines of these who raise the armies, and most of the sojores that ar raised ar incapable to cary armes before they be listed and exercised, and by the policie off this kingdome, upon the suppitiones and evidences of dissatisfactione in the West countrey to the government, they have been severall tymes ordained to be disarmed, ane the armes of the West countrey were actuallie taken from them and put into garisons, and iff it were sustained that a randevouze of men, mustred and exercised in forme off warr, did not inferr a rebellione, except they had armes, then it might be impossible that the West countrey could rebell, they being all disarmed, so that though ther hade been no armes in this case, the randevouzing off a considerable number of men was certainly a formall rebellione; but to testifie the inclinations of the pannalls first, tho' they be lowe and mean persons who never used to cary any armes, yet they had at this randevouze all the armes in ther power, and which they hade kept up and concealled when they were ordored to be disarmed, and such armes as ar not usuall in the lowe countrey Lochaber exes, which ar not off promiscuous use, but only used in expeditions, and they hade guns and swords amongst them, and to testifie ther forwardnes they fyred such armes as they had, and Hugh Love who was at Bothwell-bridge with the rebels was actuallie sent from the rebels to keep that randevouze; and Hugh Love, who is lykwayes in the printed fugitive roll, did actualie, as one off the captaines exercise the pannalls, and James Niving was the other captaine, so that ther was not only exerciseing in fear of wear, and a standing rebellione in the tyme, but ane actual intercourse and communication betwixt the pannalls and the rebels, besyds the collecting of three hundreth merks of suplie, and the sending them assurance that they were to joyne with them upon the Munday thereafter; but, the defate falling out upon Sunday, this meeting was prevented, and in the year 1666, Cadwell, Kersland, and many other gentlemen, were justlie forfaulted, tho they ther were never randevouzed or made appearance, but only designed to joyne the rebels att Pentland-hills, who were lykwayes broken befor they came up; and whereas it is pretendit that ther meeting was only accidentall or to hear his majestie's proclamation, which they did with reverence, and signified ther intentiones to goe to his service, it is answered, that convocation in forme of war the tyme of rebellione without authoritie, is contrair to authoritie, and the want off a warrand, tho' the pannalls principles and countrey were unsuspect, it were sufficient; yet in this case ther can be no favourable constructione off ther designe, because the proclamatione off councill in anno 1679, requyreing all heretors to attend his majestie's host in repressing of the rebels, did particularlie except the western shyres, so that these heritors hade nether warrand, call nor trust to attend his majestie's host, and by the proclamatione, such as were conveyened were ordained to render themselves within twentiefour hours, so that if the reading off the proclamatione hade been ther bussines, they would first have understood they were not bound to ryse for the king, having risen without his authoritie, which is against him. They ought immediatly to have rendered themselves, whereas after the reading off the pretendit proclamatione to have randevouzed in forme off weir, it was a most open and avowed rebellion, and the proclamatione is so farr from exculpateing that it evidently aggravats the guilt, and shoves they were irreclaimable. As to the other poynt in relatione to converse with Nivin, and recepting him upon ther ground, the proclamatione in anno 1683, did noe wayes secure the pannalls, for by that proclamation, It was declared that no persone should be persewed for recept or intercomoning, who is not cited for these crymes befor the first off January 1687, so that the citatione in this case is directly in the termes of the proclamation, and the proclamatione does not at all restrict the persuits intended befor January 1687, nor hade it any relatione to the persuits, but bears expresslie the persons shall not be persewed who ar not cited, so that the citatione was ane interruptione, which does not restrict to the same proces, but leaves the matter intire to be persewed by any compitent proces as if the proclamatione and indemnitie intendit, hade never been emitted or published, and it is certaine in all interruptions that a citatione in relatione to the subject perscrybes the right or actione befor all judicatories, and in all other process, and as ane citatione befor ane inferior court or ane supreme court, is sufficient to interrupt or prescrysbe the right or actione before any other court without being restricted to the actione which made the interruptione; so in this case the citatione before the councill makes the case as intire as befor the proclamatione: and whereas it is pretendit, that Nivin is designed James Nivin off Risk, in the printed fugitive roll, tho at that tyme he lived at Beltrees, and is now cited as living ther; It is answered the matter of fact is this, in anno 1679, James Niven lived at Risk when he committed the rebellione, and was captaine or drivill-master to the pannalls, and lived at Risk for severall years thereafter, and suppose he hade gone to Beltrees at the tyme the fugitive roll was printed, Beltrees being in the same parroch, within half a myle off the Risk, his being designed in Risk with relatione to the tyme off his rebellione and denunciatione, was nether falsa designatio nor such a mistake as could have defendit the pannalls; for, 1. He being the drivill-maister and captaine, tho he hade never been denounced, yet the nottoritie off his rebellione to the pannalls made them fall under the lawe off harbouring and recepting rebels, and since designations in the fugitive roll ar only necessar for certioratione off such persons as ar off proper knowledge may not know the guilt off the denounced persone, since these pannalls both knew that he exercised them, and that he lived at Risk many years thereafter the denunciation could not indure any upon ther pairt, and in this case it is not accidentall converse, but since he was ther captaine at Middleton-hill, the pannalls hade evry day and year intertained James Nivin upon ther ground, and he is actuallie a tenent to them, and he has only flitted from one rounge to ane other within that baroney, so that in all the process that ever were befor this court ther was never a more oppine designe of rebellione, nor a more constant recept and harbour off a knowen rebell and ringleader, and his being dismisst from the justice court unless he hade been assolyed is no defence, and his majestie's secret committee or ministers of state may make what use off rebells they think fitt for his service, but the adduceing a rebell as a wittness in ane ouccult obstruse process as the inquirye against Mr. Ezekeiell Montgomerie, who being a shirreff depute, was accused and dismissed, and covering rebells for money, wheroff this Nivin was one, can import no defence.

Sir David Thiores, ffor the pannalls, repeitts and oppons his former defences and duplie, especiallie those foundit upon the act of indemnitie 1679, and proclamation 1683; and farder adds, that the meeting lybelled can never be reputt a randevouze, seing randevouze off ther owne nature presuposes ane place of meeting previouslie apoynted, and advertisment previouslie given to meet ther, neyther off which can be pretendit in this case, the same being simplie occasionall and accidentall, which is offered to be provine, so that the haill acts of parliament anent unwarrantable convocations, ryseing in armes, and concluding the paine of treasons, can never quadrat with this case.

2. It is offred to be provine as these who were at the meeting did come severallie one by one, so the meeting as said is did not last above two or three hours at most, and that they did separat upon that individuall spott of ground, and within the said three hours efter the beginning of the meeting were all at ther respective homes and imployments, and its absolutely denyed that they did march, in rank and fyle, from or to any place from the said spott of ground wher the meiting was.

3. That any pretendit marching or exercising was allienarlie upon the place wher the proclamations was read, and that for the most part by shipherds and school-boys, servant women, and that out off sport and for divertisment allienarlie.

4. That at the said pretendit meeting, the pannalls did not only cry God save the King! but also declaired that they would never joyne with the rebells, and would be readie to fight with the king when called, and that the tyme of their pretendit marcheing, they declaired that they would breid themselves to be sojores for the king, so that it is admeired upon what pretence his majestie's advocat cane crave that the pannalls should be found guilty of treasons upon such ane accidentall and impremiditat meitting, wher so much loyaltie was exprest, especiallie seeing as a farder demonstratione off the pannalls loyaltie, ther was nether themselves nor any of ther families, nor within the bounds, did ever offer to joyne themselves with the rebells; but then, and ever since, upon all occasiones, have evidenced ther obedience to his majestie, by takeing ther oathes of alleadgance; and as to severalls off the pannalls offers to prove alibi from sune ryseing to sune setting, viz. John Pattiesone and the two William Cadwells, as to Robert Orr, in Bel-treemoir, and James Robiesone, in Wardzet, they ar not so much as cited befor January 1687. As to the most pairt of the pannalls, they were not heretors the tyme of the rebel-lione, viz. John Love, in East Gavan; John King, elder, in West Gavan; William Cadwell, ther; William Orr, in Risk; John Pattiesone, in Lochsyde; James Wilsone, in Mossend; John Cadwell, in Hall of Glenhead; Robert Orr, in Beltrees; and William Cadwell, in Glendarloch.

Sir George M'Kenzie adds, that as to that conclusion, that some off the pannalls ar apeirand aires to persons who wer at the rebellione, but are now dead, the sumonds is opposed, bearing no such proposition nor subsumptione, that such and such persons were at the rebellione but are now dead, and therfor that they ought to be forefaulted, and ther apeirand aires cited to heare and see the forfeiture orderlie led and deduced.

My Lord Advocat answers, as to the conversatione, randevouzing, modeling and exercising a company of men the tyme off a standing rebellione, is, per se separatim, relevant to inferr treasons; and this being a poynt that the government and securitie off the monarchie is extreemly concerned in, his majestie's advocat doth desyre in a specifick and distinct interloquitor upon this poynt per se, besydes the other grounds formerlie represented, That the convocatione and assembling of his majestie's leidges in considerable bodies and companyes, the formeing, modeling and exercising them in forme of weir, without warrand from authoritie, it is a direct usurpatione of his majestie's authoritie and royall prerogative, asserted expresslie in the fourt' act, first session, first parliament off king Charles the second, that all convocationes, especiallie in posture off weir and dureing the standing off rebellione, ar necessarlie to be understood contrair and opposit to his majestie's authoritie, when they ar not by his warrand or by warrand off those deraving commissione from his majestie; and albeit judiciall meetings are expresslie excepted, and the exceptione itself shoves that otherwayes the generall rule would have includit them; and the lawfull meittings to faires, mercats and other publict occasiones, which ar allowed by the concessions of these faires, and the lawes has been so jeallous in this poynt, that it has restrained the number off persons that are allowed to meet at marriages, burrialls, &c. wherby a precise number is perscrybed that cane be invited in these cases, and much lesse off randevouzeing; but when the case is not ane simple convocatione, but a modelling into ane formed force, under captaines, ther can be no pretext, and iff this were allowed, evry parroch in the west of Scotland might, when rebellione was standing, have chosen captaines, formed and exercised themselves; and the late rebellione and invasion, when the late earle of Argyle brought home ane hundred thousand stand off armes, if it hade been saiff to have modelled and raised the cuntry without armes, it hade been easie to have furnished them with these armes when they were raised, and therfor our law for publict ex-pediencie sake has declared that the right of the soveraigne and ane usurpatione in the subject to convocat or assemble in companyes, especiallie in forme and fear of weir, and during a standing rebellion, and albeit the pannalls had no armes when they rendezvouzed, yet it will be provine they had severalls, yet upon ther joyning the rebels they might expect to have received armes, and its certaine the concourse of greet multitudes, even without armes, was able to have shuffled and suprest the standing force of the kingdome: As to the grounds of exculpation, tho they were true and could be provine by honest and unsuspect wittness as they ar false, and only presumed to be provine by persons absolutlie disaffected and involved in the same cryme, yet the lybell being provine, and that pairt being sustained that the convocatione and rendezvouzes was a rebellion to which his majestie's advocat expects a particular interloquitor, nothing but a remissione cane purge that cryme, and protestationes to paliat the rebellion of that rendezvouze to secure the pannalls till they had once joynd the rebels, cannot take off the crimes committed be the rendezvouze, wherby he was ius quesitum to the king, and all that is pretendit; tho' it were true, is but protestatio contraria facto; and iff persons who are in rebellion shall pretend to loyaltie or the interest of the crowne and kingdome, yet that could not excuse or defend from any treasonable practise, and during all the oppen rebellions in the last age, ther was non aryved to that height as to disowne the king, or to pretend that they were in rebellion against him, but they did be for the king in ther owne treasonable wayes, and when the process against captaine Niven ex incontinenti, both befor and efter he exprest as loyall and dutifull sentiments as any man would doe, and yet haveing exprest some words which are interpret to be treason, these protestationes off the height off loyaltie at the same instant did not in the least defend him; but treason once comitted can only be remitted by a remission, and pairties have not power to dispense with themselves or remitt ther owne crimes by adjecting inconsistent words of loyaltie to the treasonable actiones they committ, and to no rationall constructione oppin acts ar to be qualified by words, but in doubtfull words or doubtfull actiones words may be allowed from persons unsuspect to clear the designe off the actione, but wher the matter does not consist in a designe or project but in a formed direct act of rebellion in a publick rendezvouze, it were absurd to allow words inconsistent to retriue or defend the same.

2. It is much easier to believe that this wordld was produced by ane accidentall concourse off* then to think that all these men mett at Middletoun-hill with what armes they hade, and such armes as no bodie but in ane expeditione carry without a designe, and iff nothing hade followed but ane convocatione the acci-dentall meiting might passe, but ther formeing themselves in rank and fyle, and exercising themselves conforme to the methods off warr, iff that was ane accident they most have great charitie for the pannalls cane believe it, and it is certaine never men were drivelled, modeled and dissiplined without some previous proposal, treatie or designe, which cannot be presumed to be for authoritie, for nothing done without authoritie and contrair to law can be sustained as a loyall act; and in some case, wher persons off unsuspect loyaltie have broken expresslie lawes with good designs for ther prince and commonwealth, yet the excess and breach of law doth render the pairties lyable to the penaltie and to need the pardone of the soveraigne, as Manlius execut his sone for obtaineing a great victorie by feighting a battall contrair to his order; and therfor the designes in this rendezvouze, tho they were as certainly good as they were certainly bad, could not defend the pannalls; and as to the reverence in hearing the proclamation, the last word of all proclamationes being God save the king, these words behoved to be pronounced with the rest off the proclamation, which inferrs not the least duty off loyaltie; and iff the proclamatione was read, as it shewes no accidentall meiting but a project to advyse according to the present circumstances, and the pannalls joyning, was ther found mistake that the king hade no sufficient force to reduce them, but by proclamationes to command them to lay downe armes, and it was not a due obedience to these comands to rendezvouze thereafter when by that proclamatione the westerne shyres were excepted from attending his majestie's host, and iff ther was any thing said importing ther inclinationes to goe to the king's service, it most be understood in their owne treasonable style that it was for the king's service in opposition off his persone and in opposition to these haveing commission from him and his lawes; and as to the defence of alibi, it is directly contrair to the lybell, and so cannot be admitted regularlie in any case, and much more in cases of treason, which ar the most privileged, et facili probacionis; and in many natione, particularlie in England, no alibi is allowed to take off a positive probatione of the king's evidence, and tho' maters consisting with the lybell, which in ane effect resolved in ane exceptione are, and ought to be allowed to be provine be way of exculpatione, yet this being ane direct denyall off the lybell, it were to grant the pannalls the sole probatione, and as this is not to be sustained even in civilibus, much less in crimes, wher tho' the pannalls succumb in proveing this alibi, the king's advocat is not releived from the burding of proveing his lybell, but in this case the rendezvouze being the week befor Bothwell-bridge, and it can be positivlie provine that ther wer three rendezvouzes upon three distinct dayes, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, tho' he burdens himself but with one ane alibi in this caice behoved to be beyond two or three hunder myles, and all that is pretend it is to prove that some of the pannalls, some off the dayes of that weeke, were at three myles distance, which can never be sustained, especiallie since by the pannalls owne defence it is asserted, that they randevouzed but three hours, and about three hours they were at ther owne houses and about ther owne affairs; so that it being in June they might be provine to have been twelve hours at any other place within three myles, so that both being most consistant the exculpatione cannot be sustained; ffor in all lawe and alibi most importane naturall impossibilitie that the pannalls was at the place lybelled: and whereas it is pretendit that severalls of the pannalls were not heritors, and that they offer dispositions of all lands they hade the tyme off the randevouze, it is answered, that the makeing of ane dispositione will not secure ane rebell who is ane heritor from underlyeing the paine off death and other effects of forfaulture, and therfor the giving in such dispositions cannot clear the heritors who were rebels, but the doome of forfaulture ought to be pronounced against him, since the pannalls ar in possessione of the lands holden and reputt heritors, and the persuit being at the instance of the superior, his infestment in the baroney most carry the propertie except he were excludit by ther particular infestments, and it cannot be beleived that he would persewe them as heritors in prejudice off himself, iff they were not holden and reputt heritors; and his majestie's interest upon the quinquenniall might be eludit iff his majestie's right were not foundit upon the doome off forfaulture, which no voluntar dispositione can suplie, but on the contrair it doth insinuat that the rebell had no right to the lands he posesst since he could not be forfault as ane heritor, and therfor that the pannalls cane pretend no just prejudice efter they ar found guilty as heritors, the indemnitie upon the dispositions will secure them as to ther lives, and in this way the pannall has no prejudice, and by receaveing dispositione and preventing forfaultures, the king will be absolutlie excludit from the benefite of the forfaulture, and in this case ther be adonator, yet his majestie's interest is equallie concerned, and the preparative will exclude him in all tyme coming: and wheras it is pretendit that ther is no warrand for sumonding the apearand aires of John Love, elder, and that ther is a known style that ought to be observed in citteing the apearand aires to hear the doom of forfaulture pronounced against ther predecessors; it is answered, that the letters are opponed, beareing expresslie that John Love, elder, was at the randevouze, and so in oppin rebellion, and that he is deceast ther, is ane expresse warrand to call the relict and nearest of kine, and John Love, his eldest sone, to hear the dome of forfaulture pronounced against him, and the executiones ar speciall, and ther is no necessitie to lybell ane act of parliament, tho' the particular act be lybelled, because forfaultures in absence of traitors for perduellione is conforme to the comon law, and it was practised in this kingdome by the justices befor the act of parliament was made, and the act of parliament doth not only ratifie ther proceder, and in criminall lybells ther is no precise rigorous style, but wher the matter is sufficiently exprest, the lybell ought to be sustained, and in this case it is both formallie and sufficiently exprest, that Love, elder, was in the rebellione and dead, and his relict and nearest off kine ar cited to hear sentence pronounced against him.

Sir Patrick Hume adds, 1. That the defenders did not joyne with the rebels at Bothwell-bridge; it is answered, that they being convened in a military posture, they were in a formed rebellione by themselves, which is relevant to inferr the cryme of treason, especiallie seeing, if need were, it is offred to be provine, that it was given out by the company that they designed to goe out to Bothwell-bridge, and albeit the rebels at Bothwell-bridge ware defeated befor the joyning, yet that cannot liberat the defenders.

2. The proclamacione in Apryll, 1683, is not taken off by the pretendit protestatione for not insisting, seeing it doth not appear that that protestatione was admitted by the lords of privie councill, and albeit it hade, yet it takes not off the interruptione, but on the contrair the protestatione itself instruct the interruptione.

3. Wheras it is pretendit that severalls of the pannalls were not heritors at the tyme, it is farder adit, that albeit they had not been heritors, yet being now heritors they ought to be forfaulted because the forfaulture is drawne back to the tyme of the committing of the cryme, so that whatever was acquyred by the rebels since the tyme belongs to the king; for if the defenders had been forfaulted at that tyme, iff they hade thereafter acquyred ane estate by themselves, or hade fallen to ane estate belonging to ther predcessors, it would have pertained to the king, so by the same reasone the defenders being now forfaulted, ther lands will belong to the king, in the same maner of way as iff the same hade hade ane estate the tyme of the rebellione.

4. The defenders, who ar not heritors, have conversed with Nivine since they were heritors, and consequently falls under the act of parliament anent, converse and intercomoning.

5. As to M^r Leod, of Assints case, it doth not at all meitt this present case, because it was a persuit betwixt privat pairties, and wher a convocatione of above ane hundred men was expresslie lybelled, and that the convocatione was efter publicatione of letters of intercomoning against Assint, and in which termes the lords of justiciarie sustained the lybell, both as to the number and qualificatione, the takeing test or oath of alleadgence is not instructed, nor doth it exoner them.

Sir Georg McKenzie duplyes, That he and the others procourators for the pannalls ar verie far from debaiteing that it is lawfull to raise men without armes, or that treason being committed can be salved by a protestatione, but that which is debated single is this precise poynt, that the meitting of some few men in the case hear circumstantial and offered to be provine, cannot of its owne nature per se inferre treasone, nor doe any of the arguments urged meit this case at all, and the same is so contrair to the constant practice of this and all other nations in the cases represented, that this proposition can bear no debate, for that all convocatione ar by the fourt act first sessione first parliament of king Charles the second, treasone is a mistake, contrair to evry word of the act in relatione to our case, for that act does not speake at all of convocations and meittings, but of convocations, assemblies and councils, and the excepting ordinary judgments, as well as the acts of parliament to which that act relates, shoves that that act is only as to conventiones for trealing, consulting and determining in maters of state, nor does the act of parliament anent burrialls and baptismes, restrict the number at all; for tho' ten thousand meat at a burriall it were no treason at all, and that act is only against the expense and not the convocatione, and ther is nothing more ordinar in our style, evine before the criminall court and councill, then to lybell convocationes in armes, but as ane aggravatione off ane cryme in suo genere, nor was Assint forfaulted for his convocatione, tho' it be acknowledged that he hade four hundred men, and that driviling was provine but tanquam crimen in suo genere, and the former debate is opponed wherin the circumstances offred to be provine, take fullie off any possible guilt, so that it could never be once a cryme, and consequently all that is debated against protestations meet not the case at all. As to alibi, the knowne principall needs not be againe debated, for, by the law of all nations, alibi is a sufficient defence wher it is circumstantial, et certo loco et tempore, as heir, viz. That upon the Friday, from morning till night, at the least from ten in the morning till eight at night, William Cadwell was at a tryst or marriage, at Beith, three myles distant, evry hour and moment, and — Pattersone was working at a coall hugh, a myle or two distant, all that tyme, and that the other William Cadwell was herding kyne two myles distant all that day, evry hour therof, per tempus continuum, so that it was naturallie he could be ther.

The debate urging that they were not heritors, yet tho' becomeing so ex post facto, or that they need not prove them to be heritor, and that the renunciation is not sufficient, is so absurd, that it needs no consideratione, for all being indemnified in 1679, except heritors who were actuallie in the rebellione, it is this qualitie of being heritors then that inferre the guilt 'et qualitas per quod crimen inducitur probari debet;' and it has been the constant and reasonable custome of this court, that either the king's advocat produced a seasine to prove the pannalls were heritors, or otherwayes a renunciatione off all they hade at that tyme was still sustained, and this is uncontraverted law; so the king cannot be prejudged, for it may easily be prevented by extracting the seasine; nor is it pretendit, that iff they can be provine to be heritors that a renunciatione is sufficient to assolzie them. As to what is replied against the forfaulting of the heirs, the defenders procourators, upon the constant and uncontraverted styll which in all courts, and especiallie in this, cannot be transgressed; and the style in such cases is, that the act of parliament of king James the fyfth, sixt parliament, and first act for forfaulting the aires efter death is lybelld, and it is subsumed that such a man comitted treasone, and having lands, heretages, it is just that his aires should be cited to hear and see forfaultur led and deduced against them, and the names of the aires relict and nearest off kine ar condescendit upon, but nothing of all this is done hear, and a conclusion cannot suplie the premisses of a sumonds that has a specifick style, especiallie wher the conclusion itself is blank to this day, and wher instruments is taken upon the blank sumonds, for why should ther be a blank in the sumonds if it be not to be filled up? or why should ther be a warrand for citeing any bodie, if they be not to be filled up in that warrand? or why should ther be executions iff ther names be not transferred from the executions to the sumonds? for the citation can signifie nothing, except ther be a warrand, and therfor our lawe ordaines blanks to be filled up, and iff a mane wer persewing ane appeirand aire in any court, the sumons against behoved to be filled up, but when this is joyned with the whole tenor of the sumonds, wanting propositione and subsumptione, it is denyable that this sumonds can be no warrand, for this process and the sumonds have been sustained without this, yet it can never be shoven that this was proponed and repelled, and the deceast Love cannot be proceedit against to be forfaulted, because he has three daughters who ar minors and nearest of kine, and would be his executors and heredes in movilibus, and consequentlie should be called, since his moveables will fall as well as his heritages.

Sir David Thoirs adds, That the sumonds is opponed wherein the hail defenders ar only lybelled against designed as Commons, and not as heritors.

2. The act of indemnity 1679, is opponed, wherby all persons in generall ar indemnified except heritors, and so the pannalls being secured by the generall indemnitie, the reply proponed ther against beareing that they fall under the exception from that act most be provine, and this being the only pretence, wherby my lord advocat pretends to seclud them from the benefit of his majestie's generall indemnitie, he ought to prove it, and, unlesse the same be instantlie provine, the pannalls ar undoubtedlie secure by the generall act; nether is ther any lawe that cane obleidge the pannalls aither to acknowledge themselves heritors or to grant dispositions, the doeing either wherof being as much as to force the pannalls to prove the indytment against themselves; and my lord advocat's pretence that the pannalls have no prejudice, albeit they were forfaulted as heritors, is most relivant, because the doome and sentance should passe against them as such, not only is ther, and ther, and ther posterities blood tainted, but ther lives ar in the king's hands, and the most aither be execute or continew in prisone till they gott a remissione.—His majestie's advocat adds, that as to the exculpatione, none of the witnesses therein can be admitted, because he opens the executione in the proces bearing that the copies were given to the haill witnesses and the king's advocat upon the last day of Aprill, the second and third days of May, without distinguishing the particular dayes upon which they were cited, and de facto the copie given to the advocat was upon the last dayes of it, however that being upon 15 days or compitent tyme upon which the advocat might have taken off the habillis off the wittnesses, and raised dilligence for that effect, conforme to the expresse tenor off the act of regulatione, the citatione cannot be regairdit, and therefore alleadgit the exculpation could be sustained, it can only be provine by the persewers wittnesses.

Sir George M'Kenzie answers, that by the article of the regulatione proponed upon ther is no tyme limited, apointing that the king's advocat shall gett lists of the witnesses in the exculpatione, and consequentlie ther being no act of parliament to put the leidges in mala fide, the exculpatione, which is jure natura, and the self-defence, cannot be taken from them. By the twentie-nynth act, first parliament off king James the seventh, it is declared, that pannalls for treasons may be cited upon twentie-four hours or fourtie-aught houres wher they ar in prisone, but so it is thir pannalls being now in prisone it is sufficient for them to have given copies of ther exculpatione upon fourtie-aught houres, the paritie of reasone and rule of equitie beareing the same, that whatever may be against a pannall may be lykwayes for him, and not only ar they in prisone now but were in prisone, and came upon caution given to my lord Glassfoord for 20,000*l*.

Sir Patrick Hume — As to that pairt off the debaite anent, not citing the nearest of kine to Umquhil, John Love adds, That John Love the eldest sone of the deceast John Love, is called, and compeiring who is the only legitimus contradictor in this case, seeing he as the eldest sone was to enjoy his father's estate, and the king's advocat was not obleidged to call any other but for farder securitie, the relict and children ar also called.

The Lords Justice Generall, Justice Clerk, and Commissioners of Justiciary, having considered the lybell persewed by his majestie's advocat against John Love, and the other pannalls, finds that dureing the rebellione the pannalls did randevouze, modell themselves in military forme and fear of weir, and drivelled and exercised themselves as soul-diours doe att Middeltoune-hill, the week befor Bothwell-bridge, relivant to inferre the paine and cryme off treasons. And sustaines the defence that the pannalls meitting was accidentall and to hear the king's proclamation read, and that they cryed, God save the king! and declared they would never joyne with the rebels, but would be readie to feight for the king when called, and that they were breeding themselves sojores the king, and that they stayed together for a fewe hours, and efter the reading of the proclamatione, and did separat and went home to ther owne houses relivant to elid the dittay.

The lords finds it relivant separatim, that the pannalls, the tyme off the randevouze, declared ther resolutione to joyne with the rebels at Bothwell-bridge, or that money was collected at that tyme frae the pannalls to be sent to the rebels to inferr the paine lybelled.

And as to the defence of alibi, though it be receavable in the case of treasons, yet as it is preponed and circumstantiat in this case, the lords repell the samen.

As to the defence that severall of the pannalls wer not heritors the tyme off the rebellion, the lords find the samen relivant, the pannalls renuncing all lands and heretages belonging to them, the tyme off the committing the cryme lybelled, in favours of the king and his donator, unlesse his majestie's advocat prove them to be heritors.

The lords sustaines the executiones of the exculpatione, but prejudice to his majestie's advocat to have a farder dyet in case he requyres the samen to prove objections against the pannalls witnesses. And also having considered that pairt off the lybell and debate anent the pannalls harbouring, recepting and converseing with James Nivin, in Beltrees, and — Love, in Cadwells, and that ther is nether moneth nor year lybelled, finds the samen not relivantly lybelled, and repells the haill remnant defences proponed for the pannalls.

His Majestie's Advocat for probatione aduces the witnesses efter deponing.

Sir George M'Kenzie contends, that the witnesses depositions being formerly taken, they must be reteired and cancelled befor the witnesses depone in presence off the inquest.

His Majestie's Advocat answers, that the depositions of the witnesses being taken befor the commissioners apoynted by the councill, and, upon report, the councill did advyse the depositions, and remitted the pannalls to the justices, they cannot be produced.

The lords ordaines his majestie's advocat or my lord Glasfurd, donator to the pannalls for-faultures and escheat, to produce ther depositions alreadie taken, that they may be cancelled before the witnesses * depone.

* "After being questioned in initialibus, and before giving his evidence on the case, the witness, if he please, may call for his declaration, or deposition if he has been examined on oath, and have it cancelled in his presence, that he may be at absolute freedom in telling his story on the trial. This was done in the trial of Love and others for treason, May 4th, 1687, where the privy council had examined several witnesses upon oath. But even if the declaration should not be cancelled, yet certainly it can never be employed in any manner of way to the prejudice of the witness; nor can it even be produced in the trial, to discredit his evidence, by shewing that on a former occasion he had given a different account of the fact. Still less in the ordinary case, will verbal testimony to that effect be received, to impeach the credit of his oath. [It was once attempted to found a charge of perjury against a witness upon his oath in the trial, compared with his declaration; but this prosecution was abandoned after an order for lodging informations on the relevancy of the charge. Maccurley's case, 1777.] Hume's Commentaries, vol. 2, p. 192.

Sir David Thoirs objects for the pannalls, that Henry Adame cannot be received as a witness, because, 1. he is frequently furious and bound.

2. In his pretendit lucid intervalls, he is altogether graceless and debauchit, drinks the Divill's good health, and boasts that all the Three Persons off the Trinitie will have enough adoe to save him.

3. That he was active in the persuit in apprehending and threatning of the other witnesses, and shooting a gune in at ther windows in the night, a purpose to terrifie and affright them; all which shall be comonly and instantly provine be witnesses.

4. Reffers to my lord Glassfurd's oath, that since he gott the att and warrand for precognitione from the councill, he has frequently intertained him in his house, or givine him good deed, at least appoynted and allowed others to give him the same.

Sir Patrick Hume answers, That notwithstanding of the objection, the witness ought to be received, because in so farr as it alleadged he is frequently furious, it is now evident that he is sane mentis, and albeit he hade been any tymes furrious, which is denyed, yet any persone in his delucid intervalls as he, may grant right and doe other deeds which may be sustained in, so he may be admitted a witness.

As to the second, it is answered, that he is not convict off any crime, the objection is not relivant against him, and it is absolutly false and calumnious.

As to the third, the same is not relivant, unlesse it were offred to be provine, that my lord Glassfurd made use of him since the intenting of the proces.

To the fourth, it is absolutly denyed, that my lord Glassfurd did intertaine him as a servant in his house, and albeit he hade given him any thing for his maintenance, that is not relivant to object him as a witness; and as to any objection that relates to the witnesses, so inhabiliundo can only be provine by the witness's owne oath, and not by other witness; but any thing that is lybelled against this witness, is nether relivant nor true, and therefore he should be received.

Sir George Mac Kenzie replies, that these are clear and distinct principles in the lawe, that sana mens is presumed till furor be provine, but efter furor is once provine, it is presumed to continew, and to have infected the judgment, and therefore he who uses that witness, or getts a contract from him, must prove his lucid intervale, and the lucid intervall must be provine in the tyme the contract was entered into, and the act to be provine was subject to sense, and so he must be provine to be in a lucid intervale the tyme of Middletoun-hill, for then he was to understand what was doeing, and even tho' he could only be taken cum notâ, because that weakens the judgment.

To the second replies, the fundatione off credibility of a witness is his sense of a dietie and a feare and dread off it, numinis reverentia, and therfor whatever taks off this casts a wittnes, and nothing cane doe this more then the acts and words condescendit upon, and what iff he hade done it within this hour could he be receaved because ther was not a sentance, and the reasone why a sentance is requisit in some cases, such as theft and others, is because it is presumed the pairties injured would have presumed, but as to that act and expression ther was no persone interested, and so ther could be no persuit; and tho it be farder objected against the wittnes that he is a constant theiffe,* and ther could be no persuite

* Mr. Hume, in his "Commentaries respecting Trial for Crimes," (vol. 2, p. 154,) says, "A third ground of disqualification of a witness, is infamy of character; a just cause of exclusion certainly, if it be of the due degree, and be established in a regular and satisfactory way. And in these points our judges seem always to have been observant of the proper caution and reserve. To allow a summary impeachment of the character of any witness, in the course of the trial, or to sustain any, even the strongest, testimony of a general nature against him, as a bad or immoral person, is held in our practice to be an improper, and, indeed, an unfair proceeding, with respect equally to the prosecutor and the witness: to the prosecutor, who cannot be prepared with evidence on his part to obviate such aspersions, which may be utterly groundless; and to the witness, who, according to this course of inquisition, might, without any warning of the challenge, or any opportunity of vindicating himself, suffer a material injury in his fame: not to mention the intolerable length of such inquiries, and the rashness, lubricity, and uncertainty so incident to all general testimony respecting matters of this sort, and the boundless field which such investigations lay open to the indulgence of evil passions. For these reasons, our judges uniformly refuse to listen to any general challenge, how strongly soever it may be expressed, of the character of a witness, as a dissolute, or immoral, or unprincipled person. Of which rule suffice it to cite one testimony, August 12th, 1765,"—[The only judgment of an opposite tendency that I have met with, is in the trial of Love and others, for treason; where the lords allowed a proof of this, among other objections, to Henry Adam, that he is graceless and debauched, drinks the devil's health, and boasts that all the Three Persons of the Trinity will have enough to do to save him. After proof, he was admitted cum nota, May 4th, 1687. It has been made a question whether the common executioner is such person as may be a witness; and Mackenzie, Part 2, Tit. 31, No. 7, says, that he had known the lords of session refuse him. But I observe that he was admitted in the trial of John Pringle for theft; June 20th, 1715,]—"which occurred in the noted trial of Nairne and against him therfore because off the skaith was repayed.

As to the wittness his goeing up and downe showeing himself concerned in apprehending and threatning wittnesses, this takes off the disinterestednes that should be in a wittness, and being facti is probable by wittness, and it is verie absurd and contrair to the light of nature as weell as the opinione off lawyers, that the fault and maleversatione of a wittnes should be purged by his owne oath, for the objectione against him is and heir ther is no perjurie as wittness, and wittness should be omni exceptione majores in crymes.

Ogilvie, for the crimes of murder and incest. It was objected to Anne Clark, one of the chief witnesses for the crown, that she was a person of evil fame, a notorious liar and dissembler, a known sower of dissension in families, and a common whore, who had lived for years in a bawdy-house. But to none of these reproaches did the court pay any regard; though to a certain extent they had consideration of some other charges, which were made on the same occasion.

"Not only is this our rule; but the panel shall not much strengthen his objection, though he drop those general imputations of evil fame, and offer immediate proof, by testimony, of infamous crimes committed by the witness. The prosecutor is not to lose his evidence, but on sure and satisfactory grounds; and the witness is not to be made infamous in this trial, on a summary, unexpected, and ex parte inquiry: he must be shown to be already infamous, by his conviction in course of law, of some crime inferring infamy, after a trial where there was equal opportunity of establishing his innocence as his guilt. This has been the settled rule of our practice, if not from the earliest times, at least ever since that period when things were brought into a more improved order, through the new establishment in 1671. In the trial of Love and others for treason, the pannels excepted to Henry Adam, for several reasons, and especially because he was a thief. But the lords gave this interlocutor: 'And as to the objectione anent the witness his being a theiffe, the lords repell the same, in respect he was never convict thereof.' In February, 1775, Margaret Fairlie being prosecuted in an inferior court, for instigating certain boys to steal, offered a bill of advocation on this among other grounds, that the charge was meant to be proved by the testimony of the very boys, who were mentioned in the libel as guilty of the acts of theft, and who, on this trial at least, must be held for infamous and unworthy of credit. The lords refused the bill of advocation. In the trial of Bruce and Falconer, for breaking into the office of the Dundee Bank, and afterwards in the trial of Dick for the same offence, August 13th and November 24th, 1788, it was strenuously objected to Alexander Macdonald, (who indeed was soon after convicted

Sir Patrick Hume duplyes to the first, that evry mane is presumed to be sanae mentis, and the wittnes being now present is of a most stayed and composed judgment, and cannot be rejected, unlesse it were offred to be provine that he was furrious all the tyme that the deof forgery) that he was a dishonest and infamous person, and had been guilty of several acts of theft; whereof immediate evidence was offered to be given. But here too, as in all former cases of the like kind, the lords sustained the answer, that no conviction of these crimes was on record against the man, and that he could not be convicted of them at this time, nor in this summary fashion.

“Farther still; it is not even on every trial and conviction of a crime that our judges have such entire reliance, as to allow it the power of affixing infamy to the convict, and casting him out of the number of citizens who are to be credited on oath in a court of justice. In general, this high power is not to be ascribed to a conviction before those inferior magistrates, such as justices of the peace, and magistrates of burghs, who are not supposed to be so conversant in legal proceedings, and are in the use of trying summarily themselves alone, without calling the assistance of a jury. Though still the lords will not entirely disregard a conviction of this less solemn kind; but, allowing the witness to be received, will reserve its effect as to his credibility, or the degree of faith which his evidence shall have a claim to with the assize.”

I have found in the Records of Justiciary, the following recent Case involving this point:

EDINBURGH, 7th JANUARY, 1808. IN THE TRIAL OF DANIEL M'PHERSON, AND OTHERS, FOR THE CRIME OF MURDER.

“Peter or Patrick Skinner, labourer, or late labourer in Aberdeen, being called as a witness, “Murray, for the pannalls, objected to the evidence of this witness, that he had been convicted of theft, by sentence of the baillies of Aberdeen, set on the pillory, and banished from that city; and that having returned from his banishment, notwithstanding that sentence, he had afterwards been whipped through the town. In support of this objection, extracts from the records of the burgh of Aberdeen were produced. It was maintained on the part of the pannalls, that there could be no doubt that the crime of which Skinner had been convicted subjected him to infamia juris, and upon this point the authorities of Dirleton, fo. ed. p. 224; Stair, b. 4, tit. 43, s. 7; Mack, fo. ed. p. 2, tit. 26, s. 6; Bankton, b. 4, tit. 30, s. 4; and Erskine, b. 4, tit. 2, s. 23; as also the decisions pronounced by the court of session in the cases of lady Milnetoun, 21 January, 1671; and Taylor, 26 February, 1709, Fountainhall, were referred to. The question came therefore to be, whether this conviction, ascertained by the judgment of a court of record, was to be re-fenders did meitt and randevouze at Middletoune, which is not so much as pretendit, and many tymes a man when he is in drink, or by other accidentalls, may be furrious at a tyme, and yet it were absurd that that man at no tyme should be received as a wittnes.

ceived as an objection to the admissibility of the witness, or merely to his credibility; and in answer to the argument of the counsel for the crown, that it was only a conviction proceeding on the verdict of a jury, that could render a witness inadmissible, it was submitted to the court, that no such doctrine was recognized in any of the decisions or authorities upon the law of Scotland, with the exception of Mr. Hume, a recent authoritie upon the subject. It was admitted, that where the sentence was not pronounced by a court of record, their conviction could only be proved in the same manner as any other matter of fact; but the conviction of a court of record, ascertained the fact in the best possible manner; and the guilt and conviction, being thus ascertained, the legal consequences must follow from it. It was objected, that with regard to the three cases referred to, in answer to the objection, the sentences had been pronounced, the one by the baillies of Alloa, the other in the Gorbals of Glasgow, and the third by the justices of the peace of Stirlingshyre, that the court, in none of these cases, had the judgment of a court of record before them, and therefore could not determine this point. The only case in point, which Mr. Hume states, was the trial of Walter Ross, which he admits proceeded on a contrary principle, and there William Boyd, who had been banished 15 March, 1786, by the sheriff of Mid-Lothian, without the verdict of a jury, on account of theft, was rejected as a witness. This was a case perfectly in point, and was not disputed, that the burgh of Aberdeen had a grant of sheriffdom from the crown, and stood in that respect upon the same footing as the sheriff court of Mid-Lothian. This was the only case in which the point had been determined, and it was there found that the judgment of a court of record might be produced as establishing infamia juris, although it had not proceeded upon the verdict of a jury.

“Macenochie, for the prosecutor, answered, that it was quite unnecessary to do more than refer their lordships to the numerous train of decisions with which they were all acquainted, occurring daily both in the supreme court and upon the circuits, by which it was now as irreversibly fixed as any point in the criminal law of Scotland, that no conviction of an offence, unless proceeding on the verdict of a jury, created an infamia juris. It is no doubt true, that to this rule there may be one exception, viz. the case of a conviction before the court of session; but the reason of this was obviously that the court itself, from its great numbers, was considered in the same light as a jury, and therefore in truth the principle which regulated the one case seemed to regulate the other.

2. It is a principle in law, that unlesse a mane be convict off a cryme which inferr infame the of a cryme against him is not sufficient, for, iff that were allowed, then ther is few wittnesses could be allowed to be receaved, for the pairtie would alwayes object some cryme or other against him, and the reasone why a wittnes cannot be rejected upon objecting a pretendit crime against him, is, because iff he were persewed he has his legall defences, which would liberat him from the crymes objected, which, in this case, is not competent to him, he not being in a proces, and therefore the lawe has justlie determined, that albeit the cryme wer never so hynous that is objected against a wittnes, it cannot inva-

With respect to the distinction which was attempted between courts of record and others, none such was known in the law of Scotland, and it would be of the most mischievous tendency to give that effect which was contended for to the sentences of inferior magistrates, whether sitting in a court which kept a record or did not keep a record. The police of the country required that inferior magistrates should punish petty offences, but the extent of the punishment which they could inflict was extremely limited, and there could no great hardship arise to the individual who was tried from this exercise of power, because if aggrieved he had the remedy of a suspension: but it would evidently be attended with the greatest hardship if such sentences were to be followed with infamy for life, or to have any high and lasting effect, such as that which was now contended for, and which, therefore, neither the principle nor the practice of the law has allowed to them. It was therefore trusted their lordships would repel the objection.

"The Lord Justice Clerk and Lords Commissioners of Justiciary, having considered the foregoing objection with the answer thereto, and heard parties procurators fully thereon, they repel the objection, and allow the witness to be examined, reserving the consideration of his credibility to the jury.

(Signed) "C. HOPE, I. P. D."

"The witness was then examined."

After all, there is some appearance of incongruity in entrusting legal jurisdiction of offences to magistrates who are not presumed to know what the law is. With respect to the competency, according to the law of England, of witnesses as affected by the different objections noticed in this Case, see Peake's Compendium of the Law of Evidence, cap. 3; Selwin's Abridgment of the Law of Nisi Prius, cap. 8, s. 3, cap. 10, s. 3, cap. 22, s. 3, cap. 28, s. 2; and the Case of Christopher Saville, mentioned in the same work, pp. 680, 884. See also East's Pleas of the Crown, cap. 10, s. 3, s. 5, s. 6; and the Cases of Coghlan v. Williamson, Douglas, 93; and of lord Audley, vol. 3, p. 401, of this Collection.

lidat his testimony or reject him from being a wittness unlesse there were actuallie a sentence against him by a compitent judge, finding him guilty off a cryme that inferrs infamie.

3. It is lykwayes a certaine rule in lawe and the constant practise, that the objections contra persons testimonys only probable by his owne oath, such as iff he be a servant, a moveable tenent, craved good deed, &c. which objectiones ar never allowed to be provine by other wittnesses, for, iff that were allowed, then the objectiones against the wittnesses would just resolve in a newe proces, and so ther could never be an end off such actiones.

Sir David Thoires objects, that Robert Blaire cannot be received a wittnes, because it is offered to be provine by his owne nearest relationes, and others above exceptiones, that he was borne ane idiot, and has been holden and repete as such ever since, and to this verrie hour.

2. That he is not worth the king's unlawe, and is knowen to be a constant begger, begging up and down the countrey.

3. That he was alibi at least a myle's distance from Middeltoune-hill the tyme lybelled.

4. That since the citatione declared he knew nothing of this affair, except what Andrew Howe bade told him and bidden him say, and that he behoved to tell what Andrew Howe bade him. My lord advocat answers to the first, that the wittnes being ane idiot or off that weaknes, that he is incapable to be a wittnes, falls under the observatione of the lords, who in takeing his depositione will be able to observe his sufficiencie or want of judgment.

It is answered to the second, that his being not worth the king's unlawe, a beggar cane only be provine by his owne oath.

As to the alibi a myle's distance is not relivant, and three myles distance was repelled by the lords to the parties.

As to the fourth, it can only be provine by his owne oath, and the lords may examine him.

In generall it is answered as to both the wittnesses, that as the objectione off a cryme which is not staited nor instructed by a sentence is not relivant in generall, otherwayes one proces would be includit in ane other, so in cases of treasone famosi et impuberes are eavil wittnesses, so that no objectione of a cryme, tho' it wer establised by a sentence, and even the being of a rebell perjured, does not att all barr a persone from being a wittnes in this privileged cryme.

The lords having considered the objections against Henry Adame, as to his being often furrious, and as to his drinking the divill's health wher he was in lucid intervalls, and contemning the Persons off the Trinitie, and as to his being active in the persuit in apprehending and threattning the witnesses, and shooting a gune at ther windowes, they ordaine the wittness for proving these objections to be examined befor the lords, befor they determine upon the relivancie of these poynts to cast the wittnes; and as to the objectione anent the wittnes his being a thieffe, the lords repell the same in respect he was never convict theroff.

As to the second wittnes, the lords ar to examine himself and wittnes his idiotrie, and to take his oath anent, his being worth the king's unlawe, and to examine wittnesses if he hade been ane ordinary commone beggar receiving charitie.

* Mr. Hume, in his "Commentaries respecting Trial for Crimes," says, (vol. 2, p. 137), "There is a disqualification from defect of intelligence, on which ground are excluded all persons bereft of reason, whether idiots or furious persons, if they are either constantly in this condition, or are subject to such frequent returns of their malady, and at such short intervals, that they cannot safely be relied on. In regard to him who has only at times been deranged, but at long intervals, it seems probable that his testimony may be taken, at least cum notá, concerning any matter which has fallen under his observation in his season of sound health, more especially if it be a recent matter, provided always that no fit of derangement has succeeded; for if the fact be otherwise, certainly he is not receivable at all. In the trial of Love and others for treason, May 4th, 1687, it was objected, inter alia, to Robert Blair, that he was born and had always continued and been reputed, a natural fool; and on this head the court proceeded to take evidence, by the examination of witnesses, and of the man himself; but in the end his testimony was allowed. In the same trial, it was objected to Henry Adam, and, along with other matters, was admitted to proof, that he was frequently furious, and had sometimes been confined and bound on account of his disorder. But it appeared, that it was at least four years since he was in any such condition, and he was received in consequence cum notá."

† Mr. Hume, in his "Commentaries respecting Trial for Crimes," (vol. 2, p. 138,) says: "Persons are deficient in intelligence, owing also to immaturity of years, which grounds an objection to them in a double point of view: as they may be liable to misapprehension of facts; and still more, as they may not be sufficiently confirmed in their attachment to truth, or their sense of the obligation

His Majestie's Advocat craves, conforme to the lords interloquitor, that the paunalls may of an oath. Mackenzie is of opinion, part 2, tit. 26, No. 5, that, for these reasons, a minor is not to be received in any case, unless he be past fourteen years of age; and that with respect to certain matters, not so easy to be understood, even a greater maturity of years shall be required. That at fourteen, a person is ordinarily receivable as a witness, may be shown from many instances on record: as in the trial of Alexander Cunningham for fire-raising, July 30th, 1677, where James Swan was admitted, with respect to whom the prosecutor alleged no more than that he was fourteen; and in the trial of Carmichael, January 15th, 1700, a schoolmaster, where James Ewart was admitted, who was fourteen on the 5th of Nov. preceding the trial; and in the trial of Stewart Abercrombie, Feb. 7th, 1718, where Henry Finlay, a boy of fourteen, was in like manner received. But that there is an absolute and invariable rule, which excludes every one who is under these years, how simple soever the fact in question; and although the individual appear to be competently instructed in the nature, and duly impressed with the reverence of an oath, this cannot so readily be yielded: not only because such a rule seems neither to be convenient nor reasonable in itself, but also on account of the precedents which may be quoted against it. In the trial of Charles Fallon, August 10th, 1775, for a rape, alleged to have been committed on a damsel hardly arrived at woman's estate, the following persons, her school-fellows, were received and sworn without objection: namely, Betty Tweedale, aged fourteen and some months; Mary Sneddon, aged thirteen, and going fourteen; Bell Innes, aged thirteen; Janet Blaikie, aged twelve, and going thirteen. More lately, in the trial of Daniel Mackay, a servant of the Post-office, July 9th, 1781, for stealing bank-notes from a

His Majestie's Advocat for probation, aduced the witnesses efter deponeing, viz.

Robert Blair, servitor to Andrew How, of —, aged threttie-six years, unmarried, purged and sworne, and admitted a witnes, depons, that some fewe dayes befor the defate of Bothwell-bridge, being the week befor immediately, he did see John Love, elder, in Little Gavan; John Kings, elder and younger, in Meikle Gavan; John Cadweell, in Risk; David Smith, in Glenhead; with about threttie people in haille, convocat and met together, at Midletowne-hill, in the parroch of Lochquhinock, when the rebels were in armes at Bothwell-bridge, and that amongst these threttie, most of them were heirds and boyes, some of sixteen, some of fourteine, some of twelve, and some of ten yeares of age; and that he did see packet, Margaret Yule, aged thirteen, was admitted to prove, that, by order of the pannel, she had carried one of the bank-notes to a shop, to be there turned into cash. I have not, however, met with any instance of a person, male or female, being sworn as a witness, who was under twelve years of age.

“ Yet it is certain, on the other hand, that on special occasions, where, from the nature of the charge, persons of earlier years are necessary witnesses, and are capable also of understanding the matters in which there is need of their evidence, the court may and do take their examinations without an oath, ‘ut prosint ad veritatem indagandam;’ leaving it with the jury to put that degree of faith on their relation, to which, on weighing the matter and manner thereof, and all the circumstances of the situation, it shall justly seem entitled. This was done, Feb. 7th, 1688, in the trial of Philip Stansfield. (See it in this Collection, vol. 11, p. 1371), for the murder of his father. James Thompson, a boy of thirteen, and Anne Mark, a girl of ten years of age, were there examined in that way, (as the record expresses it) “for clearing the assize.” And again, July 24th, 1758, in the trial of Forbes, a school-master, for corrupting the morals of his pupils, two of these, viz. Isobel Alice and Isobel Goodwillie, gave their declarations on the trial, being under twelve years of age. The same course has sometimes been taken with persons of riper years, when, upon the whole case, the court have seen cause for declining to administer an oath. William Ranken, a boy of thirteen, was examined in this way, July 31st, 1738, on the trial of David Young for fire-raising; as was John Paterson, a boy between twelve and thirteen, August 1st, 1774, in the

Hugh Love upon ther head, and drawe them up, and that they were in rank and fyle, and that he was not so near as to hear any word off command, but he sawe them goe throwe other as iff they hade been playeing, but knowes not howe sojores ar drivelled; and that the deponent stayed but ane quartour of ane hour ther, dureing which tyme they continewed and were goeing throwe other when he left them; depons that amongst them he sawe one pyck, and the rest hade staves and runges, without iron, and was at such a distance, as he knowes not iff ther were swords amongst them, and that he heard one off them make a shott with a pistoll, but knowes not who it was, but as it is reported, it was James Wilsone; depons that he did not hear any off that number off threttie, nor from any amongst them that day, that they were to goe to Bothwell-bridge, and all that he heard off was that upon the day thereafter, John Fultoune, who was one off ther number, told the deponent that they were resolved to goe to Bothwell-bridge, and joyne with the rebels upon the Munday thereafter; and John Walker, ane herd boy, who was ther, told the lyke: being interogat iff John Love, elder, was amongst the rest trial of John Reid for sheep-stealing, with respect to certain things which had happened when he was just turned of twelve.

“ As it thus appears, that the objection of non-age, at least in many instances, arises from the defect of instruction in the nature of an oath, rather than from any distrust of the minor's capacity to understand and relate what he has seen; so the rule on this head is to be taken from the age of the witness at the time of his examination, and not at the date of the facts of which he is to give an account. Perhaps, however, this remark ought to be accompanied with two restrictions. The facts must be of an obvious and simple nature, such as the witness might readily understand at the time he saw them; and farther, they must have happened at a period not very distant from the time of trial. For if it is otherwise, so great is the alteration which takes place in any one at this season of growing manhood, that we can hardly have reliance on the witness, how much soever he may be disposed to tell the truth, for a relation of things strictly conformable to his first impressions. It is true, that in the trial of Gavin Dunbar, July 12th, 1637, Alexander Miln, aged twenty two, was allowed to depone with regard to an act of murder, which happened (he says) when as yet he was ‘betwixt elevin and twelf yeiris of aidge;’ but this testimony, as the record expresses it, was taken ‘in retentis, per viam ‘inquisitionis tantummodò.’ In the case of Love and others, May 4th, 1687, (and as I presume for some such reason), the lords rejected William Carrith; he having been under twelve at the date of the facts libelled, which was upwards of seven years before the trial.”

May 7th, 1687.

The said day the persons who past upon the assyse of John Kings, elder and younger, and others, returned ther verdict in presence of the said lords, wheroff the tenor followes.

The assyse, all in one voice, be the mouth of James Currie, ther chancellor, finds the pannalls John King, elder, in Meikle Gavien, and John King, younger, ther; John Caldwell, in Risk; David Smith, in Glenhead, not guilty off the crymes lybelled of treasons, in respect that any meitting that was accidental, some being about ther necessary affaires, and ather designed for sport and play, finds it provine that at the close of the meitting the king's proclamation was publictly read, wherat they generallie cryed 'God save the king,' and were willing when called for to follow and assist the king's standart; and as for John Love, junior, in Littel Gavan; Alexander Clerk, in Meikle Gavan; William Caldwell, ther; Umphray Barbour, in Risk; William Orre, ther; John Patterson, in Lochsyde; John Caldwell, in Hall, of Beltrees; John Orr, in Beltrees; Thomas Caldwell, ther; William Caldwell, in Glendarloch; Alexander Robieson, in Trees; Robert Orr, in Beltree-muire; William Caldweell, in Brunt-hills; Robert King, in Gleanhead; Robert Orr, in Beltrees; James Robieson, in Wardzeat; the deceast John Love, in Littel Gavan, finds them not guilty off being at the meitting, in respect ther is no probation against them.

Fountainhall's Account of this Case, is as follows:

"May 4, 5, and 6. At the Criminal Court, sir John Dalrymple, his majesty's advocate, and Fetternier, lord Glasford his informer, pursue 23 feuars and wadsetters of Glasford, &c. for being at Bothwell-bridge, at least for rendezvousing at that time, and resetting rebels. To cut off their defence on the proclamation in April 1683, declaring all free who were not cited or attached before the 1st of January 1687, he caused cite them on the penult of December 1686. Sir George M'Kenzie alledged for them, rendezvousing without arms was not relevant to infer treason. And the Justices found it so, unless it could be proven, that at the rendezvousing, (which might be for joining with the king's forces) they expressed their design of joining with those at Bothwell-bridge. The king's advocate complaining of this interlocutor, as too strait in point of relevancy, he moved the lords, for the king's interest, to change it, that even the naked rendezvous without arms (not being convocate by any lawful authority) was sufficient.

"On their exculpation, they proved, that the meeting was meerly accidental; and that, when their cattle were resting in the folds, one of them having the proclamation against the rebels, read it, and asked, whom they would be for? And they all threw up their bonnets, and owned they would be for the king; and he, in sport, bad them get muskets then, which they did, by cutting down some branches of trees, and so in raillery made a mock muster. Glasford's witnesses declared, they had been examined on a precognition, and were threatened to depone against them: and their depositions being read to them, they declared there was more written than they said; for they could not write; and that they were promised rewards to abide at it, and threatened with hanging if they resiled. This practising being so unwarrantable, the assize (whereof provost Curry was chancellor) assoilzied them. One of them refusing to own the king's authority, (on whom the king's advocate took pains to save him) was banished to the plantations. Glasford was much dashed at this; for, being Popish, he judged himself so sure, that in a new signature of his own, he had insert their lands also."

INDYTED and accused, That wher, not-kingdom and constant practice thereof, and by the particular acts of parliament after-mentioned, viz. by the 129th act, 8th parliament, king James 6th; and the 151st act of his 15th parliament; and 1st act of his 18th parliament; and by the 2d act, 2d session, 1st parliament, king Charles 2d; and 2d act of his 3d parliament, the kings of Scotland, their aires and royall successors, are acknowledged to be the sovereign monarchs, absolut princes, judges and governours of this realm, and that none shall declyne the king or his authority, under the paine of treason, and that the kings of this realme hold their crown and authority from God Almighty only, and therfor the entering into leagues and covenants, rying in armes against the king, or suspending him from the exercise of his government, or putting limitations upon the alledgeance and obedience of the subjects, ar declared treason, and that upon the death of any king, the royall and soveraign authority is immediately et ipso facto devolved upon the nixt lawfull successor, and that no objection or pretence whatsoever can imped or obstruct the same, and the designe to oppose or divert the succession is declared high treason. Neverthesse, it is of veritie, that the said Mr. James Renwick having shaken of all fear of God, respect and regard to his majestie's authority and lawes, and having entered himself into the society of some rebels of most damnable and pernicious principles and disloyall practises, he took upon him to be a preacher to these traitors, and became so desperat a villane, that he did openlie and frequently preach in the fields, declaiming against the authority and government of our soveraigne lord the king, denying that his most gracious soveraigne king James the sevinth is lawfull king of this realme, and asserting that he was ane usurper, and that it was not lawfull to pay cess or taxes to his majestie, but that it was lawfull and the duty of subjects to rise in armes and make warr against his majesty and those commissionat by him, for which crymes the said Mr. James Renwick was declared fugitive and denounced rebell, and by open proclamation, published at the marcat croce of Edinburgh, and printed, bearing date the—day of——* the liedges wer convocat ther-anent and requyred to apprehend him, and ther was a fyne of ane hundreth pounds sterling as a reward or encouragement to such as should apprehend him, and yet he did still continue in his former desperat obstinacie, keeping conventicles in the fields, and requyring his hearers to provide armes, and to come armed to these rendivouzes of rebellion; and particularly upon one or other of the dayes of September last he kept a field conventicle upon the ——* muir, near Paisley, wher ther wer many persons in armes, and upon one or other of the dayes of November last, and lykwayes upon the eighteenth day of January last bypast, he did keep two conventicles at Breadscraigs, within two myles of the capitall city of the kingdome, wher he not only renewed his former treasonable doctrines and positiones, but lykwayes with his own hand he wrote down in a book found upon him when he was taken, the heads of these treasonable sermons, with the dates and places wher he had preached the samen; and being apprehended within the city of Edinburgh, he did desperatly fyre upon the officers that came to take him. And being brought before the lord chancellor and others counsellors in the thesaury chamber, upon the first day of February, 1688 years, instant, lyke a desperat preclamable traitor, he did openly deny and declyne our soveraign lord's authority, and assert that our most gracious king was ane usurper, and no lawfull king, and owned that he hade preached the same; lyke as the said

Mr. James Renwick's being brought to the viscount of Tarbat's lodgings, he did ther, in presence of the lord chancellour and severall other counsellors, upon the third day of February instant, avowedlie and traiterouslie declare, that he could not in his conscience acknowledge the king to be his lawfull soveraigne, and that the lineal succession did not lawfull to pay cess to the king, because it was imposed for maintaining of forces to suppress the gospel, and that all persons who made payment of any cess wer involved in that guilt, and adhered to his preaching book, and declared the same to be his own hand write, and owned that he had preached to the people to come in armes to his meetings, for defence, in case they mett with opposition, and that it was lawfull sua to doe. Wherthrowe the said Mr. James Renvick has committed and is guilty of the crymes of high treason above specifit, or ane or other of them, and is actor, art and part, of the samen; which being found be ane assyse, he ought to be punished with forfaiture of lyffe, lands and goods, to the terror and example of others to committ the lyke heirafter.

Persewer.—Sir John Dalrymple,* of Stair, our sovereign lord's advocat.

His Majestie's Advocat declares he insists upon these poynts of his lybell, viz. upon his denying the king's authority, and that it was unlawfull to pay cess to the king, and declaring that he had preached to his people to come in armes to his meetings.

The Lords Justice Generall, Justice Clerk, and Commissioners of Justiciary, finds the indytment as it is restricted by his majesty's advocate, relevant to inferr the cryme and paine of treason.

An Account of Mr. Renwick's being seized at Edinburgh.

In the beginning of February this year, Mr. Renwick was seized in a private house in Edinburgh, and executed upon the 17th. He was the last who suffered publicly, and he wanted not impressions, his blood would stem the current of blood we have seen running those eight and twenty years.

This pious person having been minister to the society people, who endured no small hardships for many years, and separated from the rest of our Presbyterian sufferers for conscience sake since the year 1680, and very little of him being known, and the first rude draught of his life writ by the reverend Mr. Alexander Shiels, having come to my hand, I shall from it, and some other original papers under Mr. Renwick's own hand, before me, give the reader a few of the most remarkable passages of his life, and a larger account of his sufferings and trial, from the registers and other papers, than I have yet seen.

In the entry I take the liberty to observe, as in part I have already hinted, that, had not this good man been overdriven by several of the people he was embarked with, he would not have run the lengths he went in some things; and had he outlived the revolution, I make no question but he would have come in with Messrs. Shiels, Linning, and Boyd, to join with the establishment of this church, and might have been a very useful instrument in it.

Mr. James Renwick was born February 15, 1662, of mean but pious parents, in the parish of Glencairn. His religious disposition appeared very early, and his parents had the hopes of his being publicly useful. His father, who died about the year 1676, declared to some of his friends upon his death-bed, that he was under the thoughts his son would have but a short time in this world, and die publicly in his youth.

During his childhood he wanted not temptations and vexations about the foundations of religion, out of which he got with advantage, and came to great establishment, and a settled faith of God's being, attributes, providence, and a future state. He was educated at the college of Edinburgh, and there fell under some reproaches and aspersions, from which the writer of his life fully vindicates him. When he came to receive the degree of master of arts, he refused the oath of allegiance, and publicly objected against the nauseous titles and compliments given to the then duke of York, in the dedication of Theses, emitted by the class he was in; for this reason he was excluded from a share in the public laureation, but received his degrees privately.

When prosecuting his studies at Edinburgh, he fell in with the people who at that time raised objections against the indulgence, and came that length in his scruples upon that head, that he gave over in a little time hearing the indulged ministers. Frequently afterwards he used to signify that he was extremely affected at Mr. Cargil's [see his Case, vol. 10, p. 849] death, July 21, 1681. And upon the back of this entirely joined himself with that party who cast off the king's authority, and set up on a lay distinct from the principles and practice of other Presbyterians since the reformation. He kept their general and particular meetings, and was not a little useful to that people by his letters, and quick apprehension of things.

Mr. Renwick, when thus embarked with the society people, was a most violent opposer of Gib and his followers, though he wanted not aspersions cast upon him as if he had been dipt with them. And when that vile blasphemer had seduced about thirty persons, most part silly women, and was apprehended and extremely favoured by the duke of York, at that time in Scotland, upon all occasions he opposed Gib,* and was very useful to recover not a few from his delusions.

In the year 1682, though Mr. Renwick joined in proclaiming the Lanerk declaration, yet he always acknowledged several expressions in it to be unadvised. A little after this, the societies sent Mr. Renwick abroad to the university of Groningen to prosecute his studies; and there, after about half a year's study, he was, April 1683, ordained indefinitely to the ministry with imposition of hands, and at his ordination had the favour done him, that, instead of the Belgick forms, he was allowed to sign the Westminster confession of faith and catechisms.

September 1683, he came home to Scotland through a great many hazards and difficulties, and the society people chose him as their minister, and subjected only to him. He was very frequent in preaching and baptizing during the following years, till he was taken; and met with many surprising and singular deliverances from his pursuers, several instances of which lie before me, too long here to be inserted.

Towards the end of the year 1684, when the forenamed declaration against informers and intelligencers, was first proposed to him, he was very much against it, declaring his fears of the sad effects it might have; yet at length was brought into it. It was he who penned the Sanquhar declaration, and proclaimed it May 28, 1685, with about two hundred of his followers, wherein they deny king James's authority, and renounce all subjection to him.

About that same time he refused to join the earl of Argyle, [see his Case, vol. 8, p. 843] and his party, till they would so state their quarrel, that he and his followers could join in it. In the years 1686 and 1687, he continued preaching and catechizing such as would subject to him up and down the West and South. He appeared with no small keenness against the liberty at this time granted to Presbyterians, and inveighed against their accepting it from a Popish prince.

Against this he drew up a paper, and came into Edinburgh January this year, and gave a double of it to one of the Presbyterian ministers in that city, to be communicated to his brethren. It hath been printed under the title of The Testimony of some persecuted Presbyterian Ministers against Toleration, &c. It being common, I need not insert it.

From Edinburgh he went over to Fife, where he continued preaching till the last of January, which day he came back and lodged in a friend's house in the Castle-hill, who dealt in English goods; and the custom-house officers were frequently searching it for prohibited goods. Thomas Justice, one of the people who used to look after such things, by some of his spies got notice that a stranger was come to that house that night, and the master of the family being a known follower of Mr. Renwick's, it was suspected it might be he: yea, that very night the said Justice, in a company where the discourse happened to fall upon Mr. David Houstoun, and a rumour a going that he was seized in England, said, he hoped he should have another of them ere long, and taking up a glass, drank Mr. Renwick's health, swearing he hoped to grip him ere seven next morning.

Accordingly, February 1, early in the morning, the waiters attacked the house, pretending they were searching for run goods. Mr. Renwick coming out of his room upon some noise, Justice standing at the door, said, 'My life for 'it this is Mr. Renwick; all in this house must 'go to the guard to see what trade they are of.' Mr. Renwick, with two of his friends, retired to another door, and opening it, found it guarded by some of Justice's company. One of them essayed to force his way, and was resisted by the waiters; whereupon Mr. Renwick drew a pistol, and discharging it without hurting any of them, obliged them to give way, and got out, but when going by them, one of them struck him on the breast with somewhat or other, and bruised him very sore, which marred him in his flight, and the pain of it was the occasion of his fall more than once when running.

By this time Justice had raised the cry for assistance to take the dog Renwick: however Mr. Renwick got down the castle-wynd, and even to the head of the Cowgate; but having fallen several times, and lost his hat, he came to be noticed, and being hotly pursued, at last was taken by a profligate fellow. The two others escaped.

Mr. Renwick was straight carried to the court of guard, where, for a while, he was very much insulted. Graham, the captain of the guard, delivered him up to a committee of the council, who ordered him to be put in the irons. When there alone, he afterward signified to some of his friends, being the first opportunity he had of stated supplication, he betook himself to God in prayer, humbly begging, that the Lord might carry him through his sufferings, cheerfully resigning his life to the Lord, earnestly begging, that enemies might be permitted to do no more but take his life, and not to torture and mangle him. He observed to them, that the Lord was pleased to answer him remarkably enough, several projects this way being disappointed.

Before he received his indictment, he was carried to the viscount of Tarbet's chamber, and there examined very particularly. Two little note-books of his were found upon him when taken, where, in his own hand, were the notes of two sermons he had lately preached at Broad-craigs, wherein he had disclaimed and disproved the king's authority, and had reasoned against the paying of cess, with some other things, and proven, that bearing arms, for the defence of the gospel at field-meetings, was lawful. This I find Mr. Renwick giving an account of, in an original letter of his before me, to a friend, dated February 6.

Upon those points he was examined, and very frankly acknowledged the doctrine he had taught, and with much composure and boldness he defended it. In the same letter, he gives an account of his examination upon some other things contained in a pocket-book found upon him, which were only forms of address to some professors abroad, and Robert Hamilton. Those being plain and set down, he owned he corresponded with them; and being asked the subject of their correspondence, he answered, he used to give account of his and his hearers sufferings, and beg their sympathy.

There were moreover some capital letters in the same book, such as A. S. M. S. J. W. A. W. P. R. P. A. M. M. at G. where a hat was left. The committee were extremely importunate to discover their names. Mr. Renwick knowing they were as obnoxious already, as any thing he could say would make them, ingeniously declared they were the names of persons he was to have writ to, Mr. Alexander Shiels, Michael Shiels, James and Archibald Wilsons, Peter Rayning, and Peter Aird, all of whom were upon their hiding, and out of their reach. He made some difficulty upon the last, till the advocate promised to save her from any trouble upon his account: and then, to escape the torture they threatened him with, he told them it was one Morris Miller, at Glasgow. This ingenuity in him did much soften the rage of his enemies.

After this examination he received his indictment, February 3, and the annexed list of witnesses.

[Here he sets forth the Indictment.]

With this libel a list of forty-five was given him as his assyse, to judge upon the probation, out of which fifteen were to be chosen. I have formerly observed, that it was customary in this period to vex Presbyterians, who could not actively join in the bloodshed of this time, by putting them upon the assizes of the sufferers, and that both to expose them if they consented, and to bring them into trouble if they refused.

Thus I find some worthy persons, some of them very considerable sufferers themselves, put upon Mr. Renwick's assize, as sir John Maxwell of Nether-pollock; sir Robert Stuart of Allanbank; Mr. Robert, since sir Robert Blackwood, merchant, in Edinburgh; Mr. George, after sir George Hume; Samuel, since sir Samuel M'Clellan, merchants, there; George Mosman; John Armour, merchant, in Glasgow, and many others. None of these would be concerned in the condemnation of this good man.

Here he sets forth a list of the assize. But he omits the name of Joseph Young and substitutes that of William Somervel, Chamberlain of Douglas.

Together with this indictment and those assizers, Mr. Renwick received the following list of witnesses signed by the pursevant:

John archbishop of Glasgow,
George viscount of Tarbet,
—— Lord Livingstone,
Colin earl of Balcarras,
—— Earl of Traquair,
General major Graham,
Sir William Paterson,
Mr. Colin Mackenzie, clerk to the council,
Sir Thomas Moncreif of that ilk,
Mr. William More, clerk to the session,
—— Master of Balmerino,
George Row, David Gourel, Hugh Ross, merchants in Edinburgh.
James Boyl, prisoner in the Canongate.
(Signed) JAMES GUTHRIE, Pursevant.

When Mr. Renwick had gotten this indictment, by the favour of the keepers, his mother Elizabeth Carsan, a singularly religious person, was permitted now and then to see him. With her he conversed in much composure and affection, and frequently declared his great grief to leave his people who had been under his ministry; but added, were it in his choice, he could not think upon it without terror, to continue much longer in his conflicts with a body of sin and death he carried about with him; that he adhered to all he had preached. This was upon the Sabbath, February 5.

In his letter, February 6, before referred to, after he hath given an account of God's great goodness to his soul, and desired the persons whose names he decyphered, might be acquainted with what he had done, to save himself from torture, he concludes, 'I desire none may be troubled on my behalf, but rather rejoice with him, who with hope and joy is waiting for his marriage and coronation hour.'

At another time his mother asking him how he was; he answered, well, but since my last examination I cannot get praying. His mother looking on him with much surprize and concern, he added, I can hardly get praying, being so much taken up in praising, and ravished with the joy of the Lord.

When his mother, who was extremely affectionate, expressed to him her fears of fainting, and running to extremities, saying, How shall I look to that head and these hands set up upon the ports of Edinburgh? I have so much self, that I will never be able to endure it. He smiling said, She would never see them there; adding, I have willingly parted with my life, and humbly sought of the Lord to bind them up from going any further; and I am much persuaded, they shall be permitted to go no further. When at liberty, he used to be much troubled with fears about torture, and mangling his body, but now they were intirely removed.

Some time after, others of his friends found means to get in to him; them he pressed to mind salvation work, and to get their peace made with God, and to be stedfast in the way of truth. When they regretted his being taken away from them, he said, they should rather rejoice that he was to be taken away from the reproaches and calumnies he had lien under, which he hoped his death would wipe away. He further told them at his first appearance, he was once thinking to wave the counsellors interrogatories, and put them upon probation; but he found his soul filled with darkness upon those thoughts, and resolved to be plain and full in his confession, as he had been in his sermons, and in so doing he had peace.

Upon Wednesday, February 8, Mr. Renwick was brought before the justiciary. After his indictment was read, the advocate restricted it to his denying the king's authority, his preaching the unlawfulness of paying cess, and that he had called his followers to come with arms to the field-meetings. All I find in the registers for probation, is his own signed confession, which I give from them.

[Here he inserts the examinations.]

I shall now give a larger account of his Case from the above cited account of his life, and other papers before me.

When before the justiciary, he adhered to his former confessions with great composure and sedateness, and the lenity of the court was beyond what had been their use and manner formerly: he did not seek lawyers to plead for him, but the lords permitted him to speak what he had to say, without threatenings and interruptions, even though he gave none of them their titles, save the nobility.

After the indictment was read, the justice-clerk asked him, if he adhered to all his former confessions, and acknowledged all that was in the libel? He replied, 'All except where it is said, I have cast off all fear of God, for it is because I fear to offend God and violate his law, I stand ready to be condemned here.' Then he was interrogated, Whether he owned authority, and if he owned king James 7, to be his lawful sovereign? He answered, 'I own all authority, which hath its prescriptions and limitations from the word of God, but cannot own this usurper as lawful king, seeing both by the word of God such an one is incapable to bear rule, and also by the ancient laws of the kingdom, which admit none to the crown of Scotland until he swear to defend the Protestant Religion, which a man of his profession cannot do.'

He was urged by the lords, How could he deny him to be king? was he not the late king's brother? had the late king any children lawfully begotten? was he not declared successor by act of parliament? The pannel answered, 'He was, no question, king de facto, but not de jure; that he was brother to the other, he knew nothing to the contrary. What children the other had he did not know; but from the word of God, which ought to be the rule of all laws, or from the ancient laws of the kingdom, it could not be shewn that he had, or ever could have any right.'

The next question propounded to him was, If he owned or had taught it to be unlawful to pay taxes or cess to his majesty? He answered, 'As to the present cess, exacted to the present usurper, I hold it unlawful to pay it, both in regard it is oppressive to the subjects for the maintenance of tyranny, and because it is imposed for the suppression of the gospel. Would it have been thought lawful for the Jews, in the days of Nebuchadnezzar, to have brought every one a coal to augment the flame of the furnace, to devour the three children, if so they had been required of the tyrant? And how can it be lawful, either to oppress people for not bowing to the idols the king sets up, or for their brethren to contribute what may help forward their oppression on that account?'

Next he was interrogated, if he owned that he taught his hearers to come armed to their meetings, and in case of opposition, to resist? He answered, 'It were inconsistent with reason and religion to teach otherwise; you yourselves, in the like circumstances, would do it. I own I taught them to carry arms to defend themselves, and to resist your violences.'

Further being asked, if he owned the note-books taken upon him, with the sermons written therein, and that he had preached them? he answered, 'If you have added nothing, the books being in your custody, I will own them, and am ready to seal all the truths contained there with my blood.'

All his confessions being read over, and he required to sign them, he said, he could not do it, since he took this to be a partial owning of their authority. Some reasonings passed upon this subject; at length he said, I will sign the paper as my testimony, but I declare it is not in obedience unto you.

The assize were next called upon by fives, and sworn. Mr. Renwick was asked, if he had any thing to object against them. He objected nothing against any of them, but protested, that none might sit on his assize who professed Protestant or Presbyterian principles, or an adherence to the covenanted work of reformation. The assize unanimously brought him in guilty; and sentence was given, that he should be executed at the Grassmarket on the Friday following. The earl of Linlithgow justice-general, asked him if he desired a longer time. He said, it was all one to him; if it was protracted, it was welcome, if shortened, it was welcome; his master's time was the best time. However, without his knowledge, and after he had openly refused, when the advocate urged him to desire it, he was delayed till the 17th of February.

During this interval Mr. Renwick was visited by bishop Paterson, doctor Monro, and others of that kidney. Meanwhile, which was not usual after sentence of death, not one of his friends for some time were permitted to see him. The bishop vexed him with his solicitations to save his life, and his queries he proposed to him; 'Thought he none could be saved but those of his principles? Would he kill himself with his own hand, since he might have his life upon such easy terms?' and others of that nature. Mr. Renwick answered, 'He never said or thought none could be saved but such as were of his principles; but he was of opinion those were truths upon which he was suffering, which he had not rashly concluded upon, but deliberately, and of a long time had been confirmed in, as what were sufficient grounds to suffer upon.' The bishop said, he was sorry to see him so tenacious, and throwing away his life, but wished him well, and took his leave of him. Afterwards he commended him as a youth of parts, and in the council pressed for another reprieve for him, which would have been easily granted if he would have petitioned for it. Yea, such was the bishop's professed kindness and concern in him, that he sent one to him the night before he was executed, desiring to know, if there was any thing lying in his power to do for him, and he would do it. Mr. Renwick returned him his thanks for his civility, and desired the messenger to acquaint the bishop, that he knew nothing he could do for him, or that he himself could desire of him.

At another time he was visited by one Mr. Macknaught, a curate, in his gown and canonical habit. At his coming in, Mr. Renwick told him he did not like his coat, it was a bad badge. The other said, he was not come to debate, but wished him well, and discoursed a little upon the toleration, inquiring at the close, what he thought of it, and of the men who accepted of it? Mr. Renwick answered, 'He was against the thing as not conform to the rule, but as for the men who embraced it, he judged them godly men.' The curate, after parting with him, commended him for gravity and ingenuity.

The advocate also made him a visit, and very earnestly pressed Mr. Renwick to supplicate, and to own the king's authority, and heard him patiently as to his reasons why he could not fall in with his desire. The advocate told him he was very sorry for his death, and that it fell out in the short time he had been in his office, and gave, as the reason of it, the reports that had been industriously spread, that he was a Jesuit; and said, the Papists were enraged, that any, said to be of their principles, should deny the king's authority, and pushed his execution; and told him it was not in his power to stop it, unless he would own the king's authority.

Several Popish priests came frequently to him while in prison, and at their coming away were overheard saying, He was a most obstinate heretick. The keepers of the prison used to tell how vexing they were to him, and that he frequently desired them to leave him, so that it became a proverb among them at that time, be gone, as Mr. Renwick uses to say to the priests.

All the time he was in prison after his sentence, he was kept so close, that he could get nothing written. He began to write a testimony, but pen and ink were taken from him. Yet he found means that night before he suffered to send out a short paper, which I take to be that printed in the Cloud of Witnesses.

February 14. He was again brought before the council, and they signified to him how much kindness they had shewn him in giving him a reprieve unsought, and plainly enough insinuated there was yet room of lengthening it out; but he was fully determined not to table any petition to them.

At his return he was very cheerful, and a friend asking him how he was, he answered, very well, but he hoped to be much better in three days. He told his mother, who was sometimes admitted to him, that the last execution he was witness to, was that of Robert Gray above spoken of; and it was then born in on his spirit, that he would see no more of that kind, till he were executed himself.

Frequently he owned the necessity of his suffering at that juncture, and that he had firm hopes, that his death would not be without fruit. Very often he praised God for his goodness to him, in making his death and the manner of it so very easy to him. When he was asked, what the Lord would do with the remnant he left behind him; he answered, It would be well with them, for God had said, he would not leave his inheritance.

That morning before his death, February 17, the good man (jailor) of the Tolbooth came to him in his chamber, and told him he might have his life, if he would sign the petition he offered to him. Mr. Renwick answered him, that sufferers for the truth might indeed require that their persecutors should not take their life, and remonstrate against them; but he did not think it lawful to petition in his circumstances, since it would be a receding from the truth, and declining a testimony for Christ. Then the keeper desired him not to mention the cause of his death at the place of execution, and to forbear reflections and irritating expressions. He answered, What God giveth me, I will speak, and nothing else, and nothing less; and begged the favour of him, that his mother and sister might be permitted to come in to him, and stay a little with him. The keeper objected, he would perhaps give them papers to carry out. Mr. Renwick answered, he might search them, and see, when they left him.

They were suffered to come in to him, and he took some meat with them very cheerfully. In his giving thanks they minded these expressions very distinctly: 'Lord, now thou hast brought me within two hours of eternity, and this is no matter of terror to me, more than I were going to lay down in a bed of roses, through thy grace. To thy praise I can say, I never had the fear of death since I came within this prison. O! how can I contain under the thoughts of this, to be within two hours of the crown of Glory?' He exhorted them much to prepare for death; for, said he, in itself it is the king of terrors, though not to me now, as sometimes it was in my hidings. But now let us rejoice and be glad, for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready: would ever I have thought that the fear of suffering would ever have been so taken away from me! but what shall I say? it is the doing of the Lord, and is marvellous in our eyes. I have many times counted the cost of suffering for Christ, but never expected it would have been so easy; who knows the honour and happiness of that? He that confesseth me before men, him will I confess before my heavenly father.

Perceiving his mother weeping, he exhorted her to remember, 'that whoever loved any thing better than Christ, was not worthy of him. If you love me,' added he, 'rejoice that I am going to my father, to obtain the enjoyment of what eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive.'

Then he prayed with them, and therein he run out much in praises, 'That now he was getting above all conflicts with sin and sorrow, and where there should be no quarrels, or distance from God. He pleaded much in behalf of the suffering remnant, and that the Lord would not leave Scotland, asserting with great confidence of hope, that he was strengthened in the faith of it, that the Lord would be gracious to Scotland.'

In a little time he heard the drum beating for the guards to take him out to his execution, and rejoiced exceedingly, saying, 'Yonder the welcome warning to my marriage; the bridegroom is coming, and I am ready, I am ready.' Then he took his leave of his mother and sister, intreating them not to be discouraged, for ere all were done, they would see matter of praise in that day's dispensation.

After the usual manner he was taken to the laigh council-house, where, after reading his sentence, he was desired to say any thing he had to say there. He answered, I have nothing to say to you, but that which is written Jer. xxvi. 14, 15 : 'As for me, behold, I am in your hand,' &c. Then he was told, he would not get leave to be heard on the scaffold, for ruffling of drums, and was desired to pray there. This he refused, asking if the drums would be ruffled, unless when they thought he spoke bitterly, and made reflections. They answered, they would be ruffled all the time, and urged him to pray, and put a friend, whom they allowed to wait upon him to the scaffold, to request him; but he still refused. Then they warned him to forbear reflections. He told them, he would not be limited; he had premeditated nothing, but what the Lord gave him, that he would speak. They offered him any minister he pleased to be with him; but he only desired the friend they had already granted him.

Mr. Renwick went very cheerfully to the place of execution, where there was a vast number of spectators. Executions had not been frequent for some time, and his circumstances were singular. Very little of what he said was heard, for the drums beat without intermission, till he was put over the ladder. Any thing gleaned up here, is from the person who waited upon him, with the help of a few others, who had placed themselves near the scaffold.

There was a curate standing at the side of the scaffold, who addressed himself to Mr. Renwick when he came up, and said, pray for the king, and we will all pray heartily for you. Mr. Renwick answered, he did not expect his prayers, and was come hither to bear his testimony against him, and such as he was. The other replied, pray for the king, whatever you say against us. Mr. Renwick answered, I will discourse no more with you, I am shortly to appear before the King of kings, and Lord of lords, who will shortly pour contempt on all the kings of the earth, who have not ruled for him.

He sang the 103 Psalm from the beginning, and read Revelations 19 chapter, and then prayed, commending his soul to the Lord through the Redeemer, and his cause to be vindicated by him in his own time. He declared this was the most joyful day he ever saw, and what he longed for, and blessed the Lord for the honour of the crown of martyrdom, an honour, added he, the angels are not capable of. He regreted he was disturbed in worshipping God, and said, but by and by, I shall be above those clouds, and enjoy, and worship, and glorify thee without interruption or intermission for ever. This is all that is remembered.

Prayer being ended, he spake to the people, and what was remembered was to this effect:

"Spectators, or if there be any of you auditors, I must tell you I am come here this day, to lay down my life for adhering to the truths of Christ, for which I am neither afraid nor ashamed to suffer: Nay, I bless the Lord that ever counted me worthy, and enabled me to suffer any thing for him; and I desire to praise his grace, that he hath not only kept me free from the gross pollutions of the time, but also from many ordinary pollutions of children; and for such as I have been stained with, he hath washed and cleansed me from them in his own blood.

"I am this day to lay down my life for these three things: 1. For disowning the usurpation and tyranny of James duke of York. 2dly. For preaching that it was unlawful to pay cess. 3dly. For teaching that it was lawful for people to carry arms, for defending themselves in their meetings for receiving persecuted gospel ordinances. I think a testimony for these is worth many lives; and if I had ten thousand, I think all little enough to lay down for the same.

"Dear friends, spectators, and if any of you be auditors, I must tell you, I die a Presbyterian Protestant. I own the word of God as the only rule of faith and manners; I own the confession of faith, larger and shorter catechisms, sum of saving knowledge, directory for family worship, covenants, national and solemn league, the acts of the general assemblies, and all the faithful contendings that have been for the covenanted reformation.

"I leave my testimony approving preaching in the fields, and the defending the same by arms. I adjoin my testimony to all those truths, which have been sealed by blood, in scaffolds, fields, and seas, for the cause of Christ.

"I leave my testimony against popery, prelacy, Erastianism, against all profanity, and every thing contrary to sound doctrine, particularly against all usurpations and encroachments made upon Christ's rights, the Prince of the kings of the earth, who alone must bear the glory of ruling his own kingdom, the church; and particularly against the absolute power assumed by this usurper, that belongs to no mortal, but is the incommunicable prerogative of Jehovah, and against this toleration flowing from this absolute power." Here he was ordered to dispatch; and answered, I have near done.

Then added, "Ye that are the people of God, do not weary in maintaining the testimony of the day, in your stations and places; and whatever you do, make sure an interest in Christ, for there is a storm coming, which will try your foundations. Scotland must be rid of Scotland, before the delivery come. And you that are strangers to God, break off your sins by repentance, else I will be a sad witness against you in the day of the Lord."

Here they caused him to stop, and ordered him to go up the ladder. There he prayed again, and this expression was distinctly heard: "Lord, I die in the faith that thou wilt not leave Scotland, but that thou wilt make the blood of thy witnesses, to be the seed of thy church, and return again and be glorious in this land. Now, Lord, I am ready, the bride, the Lamb's wife hath made herself ready."

When the napkin was tying about his head and face, he said to his friend who was permitted to be with him, "Farewel, be diligent in duty, make your peace with God through Christ. There is a great trial coming as to the remnant I leave. I have committed them to God; tell them from me, not to weary, nor be discouraged in maintaining the testimony. Let them not quit or forego one of those despised truths. Keep your ground, and the Lord will provide you teachers and ministers, and when he comes he will make all those despised truths glorious upon the earth."

When he was turned over the ladder, he had those words in his mouth: "Lord, into thy hands I commit my spirit, for thou hast redeemed me, O God of truth." He died in the 26th year of his age.

Thus I have given a pretty large account of this zealous, serious, and pious youth, especially of his sufferings. The writer of his life adds a large vindication of the heads upon which he suffered, in which I observed nothing but what the reader will meet with in the Hind let loose, upon those subjects. I have observed some things intermixed in the history of Mr. Renwick's life, wherein I am sure the worthy writer hath been misinformed, and some other passages that breathe a little of that keenness one needs not be surprized at in this time of bitter persecution, and when probably the author wrote, just when the loss of Mr. Renwick was fresh upon his spirit. Those and other particulars I have omitted, and given as short and distinct an abstract of matter of fact as I could. Wodrow, p. 630.

Fountainhall observes of this Case, vol. 1, p. 495, of his Decisions, as follows:

"February 1. Mr. James Rennie, head of the field-preachers, mentioned 18th October, 1687, was this day taken in Edinburgh. They were not seeking him, but for some unfree goods that were stolen from the customers; and he suspecting they were seeking him, bolted the door and shot a pistol, which made him to be apprehended, and then some knew him. On the 3d of February, he was examined before the privy council, and impudently disowned the king to be his lawful prince: his pocket-book bearing those he had corresponded with, and particularly one Mr. David Williamson, the meeting-house preacher of that name, was apprehended, and imprisoned; but he denied any converse, so at last was liberated.

"Upon the 8th of February, Rennie got his indictment at the criminal court, and adhered to his disowning the king's lawful authority, or that he was his true sovereign, and called him only a king de facto and not de jure: and that to give him the absolute power he assumed, was to put a creature in place of the Creator; and that it was unlawful to pay cess to maintain soldiers to suppress the free preaching of the gospel; and that they might meet in arms to protect themselves. He was found guilty of treason by the assize, and condemned to be hanged in the Grass-market on the 10th of February. But to see if he would renounce his principles, and for other reasons, he was reprieved till the 17th of February, on which day he was executed; and it is thought he would have been spared, had not the people talked broadly that he met with favour as a secret Jesuit. What he owned appeared to some to be no more than what Mr. Samuel Rutherford's Lex Rex says, and Naphtali, and Jus populi Vindicatum, &c. and other Presbyterians own the same, when they have power and may do it without hazard. He seemed to die composedly." withstanding be the common law, lawes, and acts of parliament of this kingdom, and constant practice thereof, particularlie be the 43d act, 2d parliament, king James 1st, it is statute and ordained, that all leasing makers, or tellers of them, which may engender discord betwixt the king and his people, shall tyne their lives and goods to the king; and be the 83d act, 5th parliament, king James 5, the forsaide act is revived, and ordained to be put to execution in all poynts; and be the 134th act, 8th parliament, king James 6, it is declared, that great harme and eivill troubles have occurred through wicked and licentious publick and privat speeches, to the disdain, reproach, and contempt of his majesty, and his proceedings; stirring up his majestie's subjects to mislikeing, sedition, unquyetness, and to cast off ther due obedience to his majestie, to their own destruction. Therfor it is ordained, that non of the subjects, of whatsoever function or quality, shall presume or take upon hand, privatlie or publiclie, in sermons, declamations, or privat conferences, to utter any false, scandalous or untrue speeches, to the disdaine, reproach or contempt of his majesty, or to meddle in the affairs of his highnes and his estate, certifieing the contraveeners, that the lawes and paines contained in the acts of parliament against leasing makers, shall be execute against them with rigor, to the terror of others to doe the lyke; and by the 205th act, 14th parliament, king James 6, all the forsaid acts are revived and ratified, and ordained to be published and put to execution; and accordingly that none might pretend ignorance, by a publict proclamation, by order of privy counsell read and published in all the severall parioch churches of this kingdome, immediately efter divine service, this instant year, the forsaid lawes and acts of parliament wer expressly repeated and declared, and all the liedges, under the paines and penalties therein mentioned, wer expressly discharged of leasing makeing, midleing in matters of state, or telling false names; neverthelesse it is of veritie, that the said Mr. John Hardy, having shaken off all fear of God and regard to his majesty's lawes, did, in a sermon preached by him in the printing-house in Edinburgh, upon the first sabbath of October last, take upon him to meddle in his majestie's affairs, in matters of state and government, and notwithstanding of the great clemency that his majesty had shoven to him and these of his professione, in allowing them the free exercise of their religion according to their own persuasion; neverthelesse, it is of veritie, that the said Mr. John Hardy, having shaken off all fear of God, did envy against that universall ease which his majesty has declared he doeth all his subjects, in matters relateing to their conscience, and did endeavour creat jealousies and misapprehensions in his hearers, to misconstrue and contemn his majestie's proceedings, telling them that they ought to be sory that others besides themselves did enjoy that freedome, and that no true Presbyterian would consent to allow liberty of conscience to any other persuasion than their own, endeavouring to incite to sedition, and to oppose his majestie's counsells, notwithstanding it be expressly provyded by his majestie's proclamation, allowing these dissenting ministers to preach that in ther sermons, they doe not take upon them to raise any dislyke of his majestie's person or government, in the hearts of their hearers, by all which the said John Hardy has committed, and is guilty of the crymes of leasing making and leasing telling, misconstrueing his majestie's proceedings, mideling in the affaires of his highnes and his estate, stirring up the people to dislyke of his majestie's government, and to sedition and unquyetness, and is art and part of these crymes, which, being found be ane assyse, he ought to be punished with the paines of death and confiscation of moveables, to the terror and example of others to committ the lyke herefter.

Sic Subscribitur, THO. GORDONE.

Persewer.—Sir John Dalrymple, younger, of Stair, his Majestie's Advocate.

Procurators in Defence.—Sir Patrick Hume, Sir David Thoires, Mr. James Grant.

Sir Patrick Hume, for the pannall, alwayes denying the indictment and haille members therof, and qualifications, alleadges, that it is very well knownen that the defender is a man of most peaceable principles and undoubted loyalty, and well affected to the government, and has given many testimonies therof, and particularly during the time of the English usurpation, and when the earle Glencairn, Middleton, and Kenmiur, wer in the hills, and gathered together all the forces they could for the king's service, the defender was very instrumental in levieing a troupe of horse, that was commandit by Pringle, of ———, who was then under the command of sir Arthur Forbes, now viscount of Granard, and the defender should have been cornet to the troupe himself, and did send his brother Nicoll Hardy to give them intelligence, and furnish them with amunition and all necessars, which troupe did verie good service to the king at that tyme, and albeit the defender did nothing but what he conceived himself in law and conscience obleidged to doe, out of respect to his countrey and loyalty to his prince, and would have done much more if it had bein in his power, yet he humbly conceaves what he did in that affair at that exigence and circumstance of tyme, when the kings were almost ruined, was a convincing evidence of his affection and loyalty to the king, and his late majestie's happy restauration the defender has alwayes lived most peaceably and regularly, and when others did withdrawe from the publict ordinances, he alwayes kept the church, so that it is not to be imagined that a man of his peaceable principles and loyalty would have endeavoured to have created jealousies and misapprehensions in his majestie's subjects, or would have misconstrued his majestie's proceedings, and stirred up the people to a dislike of the government, or to sedition or disquyetnes; and as to the indytment, it is answered, that the expressions lybelled, which is alleadged the defender had in his sermon, telling his hearers that they should be sory that others besides themselves did enjoy that freedome, and that no true Presbyterian would consent to allow liberty of conscience to any other persone than those of their owne persuasion, doeth not fall under the acts of parliament lybelled, nor doe they inferr the cryme of leasing making.

1. Because ther is nothing in these expressions of disdain, contempt or reproach of his majesty, nor did the defender midle in the affaires of the king or his estate, seeing ther is no mention made of the king, estate or government, and seeing the expressions lybelled doe properlie concern religion, and neither the state nor government, they cannot fall under the acts of parliament lybelled upon in relation to leasing making.

2. The subject of the expressions lybelled is not against the standing law, for any of the Protestant religion to be sorrie that others besides themselves did enjoy the freedom, and that no true Presbyterian would consent to liberty of conscience, is not against a standing law, and therfor the expressions cannot import a cryme, far less the cryme of leasing making.

3. To be sorrie that any other should enjoy that freedom that they did enjoy, and that no true Presbyterian would consent to allow liberty of conscience to any other persuasion than their own, can import no more than this, that a person who has such expressions doth wish that all were of his opinion and his religion, and it is very ordinar and naturall for every man to wish that all the world were of his opinion and religion, which was never looked up as a cryme; and albeit these expressions should import a discourse against tolleration, as they doe not, yet ther has bein many books printed in England and Holland, and other places, for tolleration, when ther was no tolleration allowed by authority, and against tolleration when it was allowed, and yet neither of these was punished as a cryme, nor the authors of the books challenged, as having acted or done any thing against the government, this being looked upon only as ane opinion problematick, having many eminent devins, both for the one opinion and the other.

4. Any expressions that may admitt of ane innocent sense and construction, cannot import a cryme, seeing crymes are not presumed, unless the expression can admitt of no other sense nor construction than that which inferrs a cryme, but the expressiones lybelled may admitt of ane innocent sense and construction; for to be sorrie that others besydes themselves did enjoy that freedom, may be understood of a privat sorrow of heart, which cannot pre-judge the government, and that no true Presbyterian would consent to a tolleration, implys only ane opinion, which is no cryme. For if a member of parliament should vote against tolleration, it would not be imputed to him as a cryme, or if any man should be asked the question if he would consent to a tolleration, and if he should answer he would not, in respect of the standing laws, it would be no cryme, and therfor seing the expressions lybelled may admit of ane innocent sense and construction, and agreeable to the standing lawes, it cannot import any crime.

5. Certain particular expressions in books, sermons, or ordinary discourses, cannot be made use of to prove a parties opinion, farr less to inferr a cryme unles the whole book, sermon, and discourse be considered complexlie together, because one expression doeth interpret and explain another, and what has bein the parties meaning, and it offred to be provine, that if the defender's sermon be complexly together, it was a most loyall sermon, and so far from envying against his majestie's clemence in granting the individu and tolleration, that he told his hearers that they ought to thank God that he had put it in the king's heart to give a tolleration for the free exercise off religion, and did most cheerfully and cordially pray for the king.

6. The expressions being lybelled copulative, viz. that they ought to be sorrie that others, besydes themselves, did enjoy that freedom, and that no true Presbyterian would consent to allow liberty of conscience to any other persuasion then their owne, if the expressions did inferr any cryme, as they did not, they most be proven copulative distinctlie and specificallie in the very words they are lybelled; so that if any pairt of the words or the lyke words should be provue, it is not relivant, for witnesses cannot be judges of the sense of words and expressions, for that which the witnesses may think to be like words, or to the same sense of words and expressions, for that which the witnesses may think be like words or to the same sense, the lords of justiciary may think they did import another sense, in respect of all which the indytment ought not to be put to the knowledge of the inquest.

His Majestie's Advocat oppones the lybell and dittay, and insists particularlie upon the pannall's meddling in his majestie's affaires, and matters of state and government, which, by the express act of parliament, is declared to inferr the pain of leasing making, which is death, and ther is no nation so rude but does observe this pollicie to inhibit and restrain licentious speeches, and meddling into the actings or deliberations of a state, and by the custome of most nations, even curiosity, wher no designe appears, is constructed to be attempted malo animo; and if the prying in arcana regni be prohibit, much more the opposing, counteracting, and disclameing against the same, especiallie in sermons or popular convocations, and therfor the 134 act, 8 parliament king James 6th, does justly charge the great inconvenients that fall unto the kingdom by the licentious speeches of subjects taking upon them to censure, oppose, to give characters upon the proceedings of state and his majestie's affaires; and that wise and prudent prince duely foreseeing that meddling in sermons with matters of state or government, would be fatal to the peace and quyetnes of the kingdom, which future experience, during the late troubles, did sufficiently evince that all rebellions and seditious motions, by which last both the monarchy and the kingdom were ruined, wer promoted and vented from the pulpits, and the people induced to misconstrue, oppose, and at last with armes to resist the determinations and resolutions of the soveraign authority and government, and therfor in the narrative of that act, stirring up of his highnes subjects to mislikeing sedition or unquyetnes, are stated as the necessar and unavoidable effects and consequences of licentious speeches, and therfor in the statutory part, whosoever in sermons or other declamations shall meddle in the affaires of his highnes and his estate, are punishable by death; so that simple meddling in the matters of state, and opposing, disuading, or counteracting, doe inferr this cryme and punishment, and therfor it is answered to the particular defences, that tho' the king wer not mentioned, or any thing directly against his majesty, yet the meddling in his majestie's affairs is sufficient.

It is replied to the second, third, and fourth defences, That they do proceed upon a mistake, as if the words lybelled were not relivant to infer the conclusion of the lybell, except the expression wer against standing law, and that they wer but the privat sentiments and persuasions, either of the Presbyterians in general or of the pannall in particular, and it could be no cryme in any man in a parliament to refuse to confurr with the tolleration. It is replied, that the meddling and opposing infers the cryme, suppose the matter itself wer lawfull or allowable; and albeit a member of parliament, or any person requyred, might refuse their consent or concurse to tolleration; yet in those cases, the member of parliament or party requyred was in his duty, and this was no meddling with matters of state or the king's affaires; but after his majesty, by a public proclamation, had signified his royal pleasure to grant and allow ease and libertie to his subjects, in matters relating to their consciences, and that by vertue of that same proclamation, the pannall and others of his persuasion had the liberty and freedome of the exercise of religion in that way they thought right, it was not only ungrate and undutyfull, but the meddling in a matter of state, after a public proclamation, especially upon designe, and efter conferences, and falls directly under the words and meaning of the statute; and the consideration of that proclamation was without the pannall's sphere, especially in the pulpit; and as the law has been so jealous of ministers meddling in sermons, so ther is nothing of greater importance to the peace and quyet of commonwealths: and it is replied to the fifth, that the expressions mentioned or either of them, are sufficient to infer the pannall's having medled in matters of state, viz. That he told his hearers they ought to be sorie that other persuasions did enjoy that same liberty which they had, or that it was the Presbyterian principle to allow no tolleration to others, or not to consent to take off any lawes that might impeded them; and albeit matters of opinion or persuasion do not generally amount to crymes, yet the venting of opinions at a tyme when the state and government have enacted or determined the contrair, it is not a meer matter of persuasion, but a meddling, opposing, or counteracting; and suppose the pannall might saiffie have signified his own sentiments and the sense of the Presbyterians, if he had bein called or requyred by authority, but the ultronious and officious obtruding and imposing the same upon his hearers, is a contravention in the direct termes of the act of parliament, and expresslie contrair to that same proclamation of toleration by which the pannall was allowed to preach, which bears that nothing should be preached or taught which may any wayes tend to alienat the hearts of the people from the king or his government, and the finding fault with the tolleration, because it was extended to others as well as to Presbyterians, did tend to alienat the hearts and take off the thankfulness which was due to his majestie for that measure of government.

2. The pannall's meddling in matters of state was aggravate by a proclamation, dated at Edinburgh, the fyft of ——— 1687, before the pannall's sermon, and the indulgence in which the particular act of parliament founded upon is ad longum exprest, and the hazard and penalties thereof fully mentioned, so that it was ane avowed and deliberat contravention, to treat and counteract, or midle in any matter of state thereafter: wheras it is pretended that the whole sermon must be taken complexlie, and that the pannall did exhort his hearers to thankfulness to the king; that the pannall in the tract of his life had given evidence of his loyal inclinations and moderat practices. It is replied, that malum est ex quolibet effectu, and suppose ther had been some expressions that have imported loyalty in the preaching, yet these can neither attone nor excuse other parts of that sermon, which was direct meddling with and opposing matters of government; and where a cryme is clearly inferred, neither the tract of a man's life, nor expressions at another tyme, can take off the guilt inferred, by the direct contravention of a law introduced for utility, and the universal securitie and quyet both of the people and government; but on the contrair, the danger of this crime requyres that the relevancy should be sustained, even against a person, who in other thing was not culpable; and his majesty is the dispenser of his own grace and clemency, in which he hath exceeded the expectations and hopes of those of the pannall's persuasion, but in a tryal the relevancy of the lybell being directly founded, both in the words and the designe of the act of parliament, ought to be sustained, and the defences repelled.

Sir David Thoirs, for the pannall, duplyes, That the former defences proponed for him are repeited and opposed, and which are no wayes eleided by the replies made therto by his majesty's advocat; and furdur adds, that the 134 act, 8 parliament king James 6th, wherupon the dittay is founded, can never be understood to be contraveened by the expressions mentioned in the dittay, both the title and the narrative of the act of parliament being allanerlie anent, the sclanderers of the king, his progenitors, his estate and realm, and nothing of either sclander, injurie, or reproach, can be inferred from the expressions lybelled, either against his majesty, his progenitors, or government; and all expressions or words being only judicia animi, whatever expressions do flow from a person of unquestionable and untainted loyalty and obedience to his prince, and peaceable and obedient inclinations to the government, even in the greatest temptations and tumult, must always be supposed and presumed to have proceeded from a loyal and obedient principle, and must be interpret, and even stretched according to the opinion of all lawyers to ane favourable construction and interpretation in favours of such a loyal and faithfull subject, as the pannall is known to be.

It is impossible that a single sentence or expression in a sermon, or any long continued discourse, can be pickt out separatim et per se, to be foundation of ane indytment against the speaker, unless the whole, at least the most part of the sermon or discourse, wer condescended upon and instructed, or that in fortification of the expressions condescended upon, my lord advocat would alleadge and offer to prove, that the current and designe of the pannall's baill sermon, at that tyme, had ane tendence to disloyalty and sedition, and which his lordship cannot doe, because it is positivlie offered to be proven, that the whole strain and scope of the pannall's discourse the day lybelled was most loyal, and the scope thereof directed allanerly to excite the people to thankfulnes, first to God, and then to his sacred majesty, for his royal indulgence granted to them; and how can these two consist together, that a person of the pannall's loyalty ane piety should both bless God himself and exhort the people to bless God, and that the king for that individual indulgence, and yet to repyne and murmur against the same, this importing no less than a dounright mocking of God to his face.

3. If single sentences in sermons and continued discourses should be sustained as a foundation for dittays, ministers might be indyted for blaspemy, by persons who heard only the latter part of a sentence; as for example, if a minister should say, the fool hath said in his heart there is no God, a person heareing the last, but not the first words of that sentence, might accuse the preacher of blaspemy.

Wheras my lord advocate replies, that by the forsaid act of parliament, the simple midling with matters of state is punishable by death, and that the expressions doe undoubtedly import a middling, &c. It is duplyed, that all laws and constitutions are to be interpret favourably for pannalls, and according to the presumed meaning and intention of the lawgivers, and whose intention in this act is evident, both from the title and narrative of the act, and it cannot be pretended that the pannall is guilty of any thing relative to the title or narrative of the act.

2. The word medling, in this act, can only be interpret as to sclanderous and lying, or designed medling, in order to stirr up sedition; otherwayes all persons talking or discoursing anent any lawes, proclamations, or matters of state, might be crimminallie indyted as medlers, without distinction, whether they wer owning or justifying, or whether they wer reclameing against or complaining of any such law or proclamation, this act being against all medlers in general, without any distinction whatsoever; and it is clear that the medling understood in this act, is only understood of those who, malo animo, make curious inquiry in matters of state, which cannot be presumed against the pannall. Whereas the reply bears, that the pannall did not only medle, but actually oppose the proceedings of the government, and did actually stirr up the people to dislyke thereof, by the saids expressions. It is duplyed, that the former defences and reply are opposed, and the expressions lybelled (and which are altogether denyed) can never be interpret to inferr against the pannall, the stirring up the people to dislike against their prince, because his regrating of the extent of the indulgence, was no complaining against the same, seing he did frequently bless God for the same; and his saying that Protestants would not consent, &c. can inferr no cryme, seeing the pannall did at that tyme exhort them all to a submissive obedience and acquiescence in his majesty's lawes and government, and to be thankfull for the indulgence; and wher universal obedience was given to the indulgence and proclamation, by a general submission and acquiescence; and wher the pannall did expressly preach and enjoyne the same, what could the government be concerned in this, that the pannall was sorie that others of different persuasions wer as sorie, that the Presbyterians enjoyed that priviledge as the Presbyterians were that they enjoyed it; and ane minister declairing his hope and expectation of his hearers adhering to their principles, can never be stretched any further than his own opinion; and ministers declairing their opinions in pulpit, wher ther is no prejudice done or intended to the government, can only be repute as opinions.

Sir Patrick Hume farder adds, that the meddling mentioned in the act of parliament cannot be understood of every medling, but only medling contrair to a standing law, so that if the subject matter to which the expressions relate, be not against the king, the same cannot import a cryme, far less a capitall cryme, as leasing making; and it cannot be pretended, that the subject of the expressions lybelled, is against any express lawe, and wher ther is no law, ther can be no transgressions.

2. As to the proclamation reviveing the act of parliament, ther being no more designed by the proclamation but only to be ane intimation to the liedges, that that act would be put to execution, it can have no more effect than the law itself.

3. As to the other proclamation, the 5th of October, 1687, it is after the tyme lybelled, that the defender is alledged to have hade thes expressions, and it is so far from being ane argument against the defender, that rather it makes for him; for being after that tyme, it is a clear evidence that it was not designed that any expressions preceding that time should be punished as a cryme.

4. The expressions being lybelled conjunctive, the lybell now cannot be divyded; and the expressions cannot be alternative found relevant o infer any cryme.

5. Et separatim, if the forsaid expressions could import any crime, as they cannot for the reasons above mentioned, yet by the second act, second session of first parliament Charles 2, it is expressly provyded, that if any person shall by wryting, printing, praying, preaching, lybelling, remonstrating, or by any malicious and advysed speaking, express, publict or declare any words or sentences to stirr up the people to hatred, or dislike of his majestie's royal prerogative and supremacy, in causes ecclesiastick, or of the government of the church, as established by law, that every such person so offending, and being legally convict thereof, are declared incapable to enjoy any place or imployment, civil or ecclesiastick, within the church or kingdome, so that seeing the forsaid expressions can relate only to his majestie's prerogative, and supremacy in causes ecclesiastick and government of the church; if they did import any crime, as they did not, they could only fall under the forsaid act of parliament, which inferrs only ane arbitrary, and not ane capital punishment; and albeit be the said act, it be lykewayes declared that the party guilty shall be lyable in further paines as are due by the law in such cases, that can never be extendit to capitall punishment. It being a principle in law, and the opinion of all layers, that wher ane arbitrary punishment is imposed by a law, albeit it bear the forsaid clause, yet the cryme can never be punished by a capitall punishment, thes paines being inconsistent, for it wer absurd to say that a man should be declared incapable for a cryme, and that lykewayes he should be declared incapable for a cryme, and that lykewayes he should lose his life for the same cryme, so that the forsaid clause in the act of parliament, that the offender should be lyable in what farder paines is due by the law, can only be understood of other arbitrary punishment that my be inflicted by another law, if any be; but seing ther is no other law inflicting any other punishment in relation to crymes against the king's prerogative in matters ecclesiastick, but only that the defender should be declared incapable of any publict office. If the expressions could inferr a cryme as they dont, no other punishment could be inflicted upon the defender, but to be declared incapable of publict office, and the capital punishment of leasing making.

My Lord Advocat tryplies, that the proposition of the lybell, is the express words of the law, that meddling in the king's affairs and matters of state, infers death, the subsumption is a clear, the preaching being after his majesty had signified his pleasure by a publict proclamation, relateing to the indulgence and tolleration, which the pannel could not but know, that being the warrant of his own preaching, and ther is no necessity to alleadge that the meddling was by words inferring a cryme or sedition, for crymes or sedition, without meddling in matters of state, are punishable by themselves, and therfor meddling in state most import that even wher ther was no cryme upon the matter, but only the counteracting of the measures of government was forbidden in sermons, or to any person without his sphere. It is tryplied to the 2nd act, 2nd session first parliament king Charles 2nd, that the last part of that act founded upon, relates only to his majestie's supremacy, and the government of the church by bishops, and does not relate to the meddling or counteracting of any thing actually done by his majesty or the state, and therfor has no relation to this case, but even by that act of parliament ther is no former paine or penalty remitted, but on the contrair the law bears expressly, and to be lyable to such farder paines as are due by the law, in such order as the privy councill shall think fitt; and the reason why ther are first arbitrary pains, and thereafter the general clause of all paines enacted by former laws, which includes capitall paines, is because by the subsequent words, it is expressly provyded, that no person shall be punished for the offences forsaid, except by order from his majesty or the privie councill, and therfor since the king's advocat could not insist without a warrand, ther was reason for the distinction of the punishment, that the contraveener should be incapable to enjoy publict place or imployment, without any speciall order from his majesty or the councill. But upon a speciall order all the paines enacted by any law are expressly salved and imposed, and in this case ther is ane express letter from his majesty to the privy councill, and a warrand from ther lordships to the king's advocat to insist.

The lords justice generall and commissioners of justiciary, having considered the lybell persewed he his majestie's advocat, against Mr. John Hardy preacher, and haill debate theranent; they find the expressions, as they are lybelled, does not inferr the cryme mentioned in the acts of parliament specified in the indictment.

362. Proceedings in the House of Commons, against ROGER PALMER, Earl of CASTLEMAINE,* for High Treason, in going Ambassador to Rome: 1 WILLIAM & MARY, A. D. 1689.

THE Attorney General [sir George Treby] having, on Saturday the 26th of October, 1689, informed the House of Commons, that the earl of Castlemaine, sir Edward Hales, and other prisoners of the Tower, were brought by their Habeas Corpus to the Hall to be bailed, de-

* See his Trial for High Treason, A. D. 1680, vol. 7. p. 1067.

Of Castlemaine's embassy to Rome, Welwood (Memoirs, p. 183,) writes:

“To bear the public character of ambassador to the Pope, was likewise an open violation of the laws: but so fond was the governing party about king James to show their new acquired trophies at Rome, that the earl of Castlemaine was dispatched thither extraordinary ambassador, with a magnificent train, and a most sumptuous equipage. What his secret instructions were, may be partly guessed by his public ones, which were, to reconcile the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the holy see, from which they had for more than an age fallen off by heresy.

“Innocent 11. received this embassy as one that saw further than those who sent it. The ambassador had but a cold reception of the holy father; and none of the cardinals, but those of a particular faction, and the good-natured Cardinal of Norfolk, took any further notice of it, than good manners obliged them. The court of Rome were too refined politicians to be imposed upon with show and noise; and knew the world too well, to expect great matters from such hasty, ill-timed advances as were made to them. Not only so, but Innocent having an aversion in his nature to a faction he knew king James was embarked in, which he never took pains to dissemble, was not over-fond of an embassy from a prince who was in an interest he had long wished to see humbled. King James met with nothing but mortifications at Rome in the person of his ambassador, which occasioned his making as short a stay as was possible. In which may be seen the vast difference there was at that time betwixt the politics of Italy, and those of a head-strong party in England. And however the world has been imposed upon to believe that the Pope's nuncio at the English court, who is since made a cardinal, was an instrument to push on things to extremities, yet certain it is he had too much good sense to approve of all the measures that were taken; and therefore desired often to be recalled, lest he should be thought to have a hand in them.

“Although the earl of Castlemaine was pleased, upon his examination before the parliament, to say that his embassy to Rome was only such as is between two temporal princes, about compliment and commerce; yet father Warner, in his manuscript history, quoted by a learned author†, gives us another account of it, in these words: things being thus settled, says he, within the realm, the next care his majesty had, was to unite his countries to the obedience of the bishop of Rome, and to the Apostolick see, which had been cut off by heresy about an age and a half before. To try the Pope's inclination, in the year 1685, he sent Mr. Carryl thither, who succeeding according to his wishes, and being recalled, the earl of Castlemaine was sent the next year, as extraordinary ambassador to the Pope, in the name of the king and the catholics of England, to make their submission to the holy see.

Castlemaine had several audiences of the Pope, but to little purpose; for whenever he begun to talk of business, the Pope was seasonably attacked with a fit of coughing, which broke off the ambassador's discourse for that time, and obliged him to retire. These audiences and fits of coughing continued from time to time, while Castlemaine continued at Rome, and were the subject of diversion to all but a particular faction at that court. At length he was advised to come to threats, and to give out that he would be gone, since he could not have an opportunity to treat with the Pope about the business he came for. Innocent was so little concerned for the ambassador's resentment, that when they told him of it, he answered with his ordinary coldness, ‘E bene, se vuol andersene ditegli adunque che si levi di buon matino al fresco e che a mezzo giorno si repositi, per che in questi paesi non bisogna viaggiare al caldo del giorno.’ Well! let him go; and tell him, it were fit he rise early in the morning, that he may rest himself at noon; for in this country its dangerous to travel in the heat of the day.

“In the end, he was recalled; being able to obtain of the Pope two trifling requests only, that could hardly be denied to an ordinary courier; the one was a license for the Mathe House directed the governor to bring him up (as he did) the Monday following; and then the Speaker [Henry Powle] said to this effect:

reschal d'Humiers's daughter to marry her uncle; and the other, a dispensation of the statutes of the Jesuits order, to father Peters, to enjoy a bishoprick: the want of which, says my author, was the reason that the archbishoprick of York was kept so long vacant.

"Though the Pope carried himself in this manner towards the English ambassador, yet the Jesuits paid him the highest respect imaginable; which did him no service with the old man, for he and that order were never hearty friends. They entertained him in their seminary with the greatest magnificence; and nothing was wanting in nature or art, to grace his reception. All their stores of sculpture, painting, poetry, and rhetorick, seem to have been exhausted upon this entertainment. And though all the inscriptions and emblems did center upon the triumph of the Romish religion, and the ruin of heresy in England, yet care was taken not to omit such particular trophies and devices, as were adapted to their new acquired liberty of setting up their public schools at London. Among a great many other panegyrics upon king James, the following distich was placed below an emblem of England.

'Restituit Veterem tibi Religionis honorem
'Anglia, Magnanimi Regis aperta fides.'

"The open zeal of this magnanimous king has restored to England its ancient religion.

"In the great hall the ambassador was harangued by the Rector of the College in a Latin speech; which, to show the vain hopes they had of king James and their own fortune at that time, is placed in the appendix, with a translation of it into English: referring the reader for the rest of that solemnity, to an ingenious gentleman that was then upon the place, and has given a particular account of it.

"But yet it may not be amiss to mention what the same gentleman tells us, of a device that related to king James's having a son; which was, a lilly, from whose leaves there distilled some drops of water, which as the naturalists say, becomes the seed of new lillies; and the motto was, "Lachrimor in Prolem:" I weep for children. Underneath was this distich:

"There was one inscription more this author takes notice of; which being one of the most unaccountable things of that kind, afforded matter for the wits of Rome to descant upon. Though the words are ill chose, and strangely harsh, yet it is certain the fathers had a good meaning in them; and they refer to king James's influence upon his brother to turn Roman Catholic at his death. The inscription runs thus:

THE SPEECH of the Rector of the COLLEGE OF JESUITS, to his Excellency ROGER Earl of CASTLEMAIN.

"Sir; You must not think this College alone can be mute; and if they could, their silence must be a crime, at a time when this city is filled with universal joy, upon the news of your excellency's arrival; and all places resound the praises of James the second, and the obligations the Catholic church has to that illustrious prince. I, in the name of this learned body, do in the first place congratulate thee, Innocent, in whose reign this flourishing imperial crown is added to the Papal diadem. It is now your holiness can properly use that apostolick expression, my joy and my crown. Heaven has deferred this happy day thus long, that so great a blessing might not be obtained, without long and unwearied prayers; and at last effected, when two such princes as James and Innocent should concur to reign, the one in England, and the other in Rome. What a support have all Catholic kings gained by this accession! what an honour has the orthodox faith received, and what a defence against the enemies of the name of Christ! The thunder of his invincible fleet will strike greater terror into the pyrates of Barbary and the Levant, than storms and waves can do. How highly blest art thou, O Britain! Empress of the ocean; once secluded from the earth, now artifice than candor, I shall now, without further delay, let you and this great assembly see (where so many of birth and quality are met) how far I am from deserving either censure or reproach. But, Mr. Speaker, before I go further, I must humbly beg these few favours of mistress of the commerce of the Eastern and Western world! What prosperity mayest thou not hope for, under the reign of so excellent a prince! Raise thy hopes; raise thy courage; and banish all unjust and unseasonable fears. I have no inclination at this time to recount those disasters and calamities of which England has been the theatre for above an age past, to the grief and astonishment of the rest of the world. But if Providence has made these the steps for James the second to mount the throne, I can hardly refrain declaring how cheaply thou hast purchased so great a blessing. It is certain, their present happiness will create envy in succeeding times; and however dear it has cost them, posterity will esteem it more the bounty and profusion of heaven, than a recompence of their sufferings. In the last place, I must congratulate your excellency, who has first seen this happy day at home, and has next been the messenger to bring it hither. I shall not here presume to praise your great wisdom, your learned writings against heresy; that steady courage you have shewn in those many prisons you have honoured for your zeal to the true religion; your prudent conduct, or your other extraordinary qualities: all these are summed up in one; and your character is in fine compleated, by the choice your great master has made of you, to sustain the most considerable affair of his kingdom, the present glorious embassy: in which all the world must own him to be the most competent judge, and you the fittest person."

Mr. Rose relies much upon the mission of lord Castlemaine to Rome, in proof of James's ardent and bigotted zeal for the establishment of Popery in his dominions. See Observations on Mr. Fox's Historical Work, p. 89.

The following account of two Conversations which Dr. Thomas Smith had with the earl of Castlemaine, are extracted from the transcript belonging to Mr. Hargrave, of Dr. Thomas Smith's MS. See the Case of Magdalen College, p. 51, of the present Volume.

"Upon my coming to town, soon after the king's accession to the throne, I went to visit the earl of Castlemaine, with whom I had made an intimate acquaintance in Italy and Turkey, in the year 1668; and discoursing with him about the opposition made by all the true members of the Church of England against the Bill of Exclusion, and then of the great joy they shewed at his peaceable possession of the crown, though he was of another communion; I told him that the Papists in France, and especially the Sorbon and the great bishops, upon the death of king Henry the 3d, opposed the you. First, That you would pardon all tautologies, or want of method, as beginning perchance in the middle, and ending again where I should have begun. Secondly, That you would not take any advantage at my answers, for I shall be ingenuous to the utmost, and he-succession of Henry the 4th, merely because he was a Protestant, and kept up their impious league, and would not own him for their king; he answered that the church of England men were infinitely loyal in their principles, practices, and behaviour; but, withall, added, that some of our church were not so, and instanced in my lord Russell, and the other exclusion men, as he called them, who were as guilty as those Catholics in France. I told him, I could not own them to be true sons of our Church. Then he went on and asked me, what I could say for Cranmer and Ridley, and the other Protestants, who, upon the death of king Edward the 6th, set up the lady Jane Grey to be queen, and signed the commission of the duke of Northumberland to head the army then raised to oppose queen Mary's title; which argument I answered. He replied, that what he said was without the least reflection on the loyalty of the present members of the Church of England, or the principles of our Church, concluding that there were ill men of all religions. But, said he, setting aside all further disputes upon that head, Doctor, you are a man of moderation, why now may not there be an accommodation and a reconciliation of the differences between the two Churches of England and Rome? I told him that there could be no terms of reconciliation offered, which we could admit, without violation of our consciences and of the true Catholic religion which we profess.

"E. of C. Why the Pope (Innocent the XI.) is a good man, and mighty desirous of an union amongst Christians, and you do not know what condescensions he will make, and what terms he will offer, in order to the effecting so good a design.

"T. S. My lord, if you intend to offer only the Sacrament in both kinds, prayers in English, and the marriage of the Secular Clergy, this is not enough, this will never do.

"E. of C. How do you know but that more will be offered?

"T. S. My lord, give me leave to ask you a fair question; do you believe that the Pope, who, you say, is so good a man, has power to dispense with the Articles and Canons of the Council of Trent?

"E. of C. [After some pause, taking time to consider of an answer.] No, said he, I believe he has no such power.

"T. S. Then, my lord, all other proposals signify nothing: down with your infallibility; down with the Pope's pretensions to the pastorship of the universal Church, renounce your damning anathemas, which you thunder out against all other Christians, who will not own transubstantiation, and the other articles of sitate at nothing you shall ask. And lastly, if, through inadvertency or haste, I should say what might shock you, that you would not stand upon the rigour of the words, but upon the sincerity and clearness of my explanation.

Be pleased then to know, Sir, I was so far from seeking this employment, that I did not so much as dream it was designed me; and when I knew it, I used my utmost endeavour to avoid it. My ignorance of the king's intentions appear by this, that, in the year I went to Rome, returning out of the country, according to my usual custom after Michaelmas, I found a Protestant, a person of note, at my house, who told me, that before I spoke with any man, he was to bring me to my lord Sunderland, and from thence I was to go to his majesty; nor would he scarce afford me time to put myself in a tolerable order to attend them. My lord Sunderland soon hinted to me what the king's intentions were; and when I recurred to his friendship, I had this answer, or words to this purpose: that if subjects should refuse their king's service in every thing that was troublesome or contre cœur, all kings would be in an ill condition; that my request was your new creed, established in that council, and then there may be some hope of union; and let there be a free general council called by the king and the other princes of the Roman communion, to reconcile the differences now on foot, and let the Pope be content with his priority of order and ancient jurisdiction.

"E. of C. Now I see you are as fierce, and of as irreconcilable a temper as the rest.

"T. S. My lord, there can be no ground or hope of a reconciliation but this, all other methods are vain and ineffectual.

"So the discourse fell, and we diverted ourselves with the news of the town. T. S.

"Coming to London again, I went to visit, on the 8th of December, 1685, the earl of Castlemain, going then upon an embassy to Rome, and to wish him a good voyage. Among other things I asked him how he would look upon me if I came to see him at Rome, and whether he would protect me. He answered, smiling, that the first day I entered into Rome he would take care that I should be sent to the Inquisition. Upon which I told him, smiling also, that he would be wonderfully kind then to his old friend. Here he fell into a great fit of laughter, out of which having recovered himself, he chid me for having such ill thoughts of a place where was all imaginable liberty for Protestants, and then told me very gravely, that we had known one another in Turkey, wondering that my curiosity and genius had not carried me also to Rome; and that if I would come there during his stay, not only his attendants and servants should shew me all possible respect, but that he himself would do me honour. I told him it was not unlikely but that I might wait upon his lordship the beyond his power, and that he believed I should find his majesty very positive; and so I did, Mr. Speaker, I will assure you. Nay, to satisfy you yet more fully of my backwardness to this journey; can you think, Sir, that I, that had been at Rome more than once; that had seen the grandeur of so many Roman embassies, and knew they exceeded in splendor and expense three times those to any crown'd head whatsoever, should not be extraordinarily concerned at an employment which had for its subsistence, as the lords of the treasury well know, no other establishment than to Spain or France, which (being 100*l.* a week) amounts only to 5,200*l.* per annum?

Having thus, Sir, shewed you how little fond I was of the thing, let me now, with submission, ask you, what could I otherwise do in my circumstances? For first, I call all that is good to witness, I never heard of law against it, nor know of any to this very day: and yet, on the other side, I was not only commanded by the king, but knew his royal and legal power of commanding the service of his subjects, and most particularly in embassies, as appears by many old examples; nay, by a fatal one in this very century; I mean the case following year: and nothing indeed but want of money to furnish out the expence of the voyage hindered me from performing that intention.

"In the heat of discourse he fell very foul upon Burnet's History of the Reformation, and said it was a rhapsody and full of lies, and that he could shew in almost every page, great and wilful mistakes. My lord, said I, shew them, and expose him for them; but he instanced only in the story of the emperor Charles the 5th, being reported to turn Protestant before he died, which he said was a lie invented long after his death; that the bishop of Burgos and his confessorins, were put into the Inquisition upon other accounts, as at this very time, added he, there is a Spanish secular priest, one Molinos, otherwise a very holy man, imprisoned at Rome for inventing new-fangled doctrine about the worship of God.

"I asked him what opinion he had of the book of father Crossi, a Franciscan, and one of the queen dowager's priests, then newly published, of the Glories of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God. He told me plainly (for all the sober Romans were ashamed of the gross absurdities and fooleries of that author) that it was an idle book, that when he first looked into it, he threw it into the fire, that there were ten thousand scandals in it, and that for aught he knew, the book was put out in that priest's name, to render their devotion odious and ridiculous. Here I interposed, and told him, that a great many bigots of the Roman communion maintained the same superstitious and blasphemous phantasies. He replied only, that none could be so silly. Then we fell into discourse upon other matters more agreeable."

of Overbury, to which nobody here, I am sure, is a stranger. In the next place, Sir, what did I go to Rome for? Why only with a letter; with a compliment from a professed and open Catholic king to his holiness, as all princes of that communion do in the beginning of their respective reigns. Besides, Mr. Speaker, as I know no law that forbid my obedience, so I must needs say (and this without cramping, or putting any bounds to the legislative power), that no such law can be made: for, Sir, the pope is a very considerable temporal prince, whose territories border on two great seas, the Mediterranean and Adriatic: if then our merchants should be by storm, or other necessities, driven into his ports; if Englishmen should be surprized by any Roman party as they travel in a neighbouring country, shall our government (not to mention a hundred other greater accidents) want power to send a messenger to ransom and compound for them? What law therefore was there ever yet framed, or can be enacted (let the commerce or intercourse between nations be never so much broken and prohibited) but that a commander in chief, a general, and much more a king, may beat a parley, dispatch a trumpet; nay, send and receive letters as often as occasion does require?

Now, Mr. Speaker, for religion, I neither had any commission concerning it, nor transacted with his holiness about it; and as nobody ever did, or could lay any thing of that nature to my charge, so for some confirmation of it, I will appeal even to the Aqua-Fresca houses of Rome, and to all the Protestant gentlemen of our nation there during my embassy; for though what I tell you, Sir, be a wonder, yet the honourable persons who have resided in those parts, know it to be true, that for a dish of chocolate, or a dish of lemonade, one may know the measures and particulars of an embassy in that city, as well as we do what passes within these walls at our coffee-houses. I am sure my under servants have often smiled at the grimaces and mysteries which my secretaries used in the beginning to make before my audiences; for they have told them, within few hours after my return, almost word by word what had passed. Give me also leave, Sir, to add one truth more, which will assure you that I had no dangerous intrigue in hand; and this is, that notwithstanding his holiness never had the least imagination or thought, but that I was as real and sincere a Catholic as any man living; and the same thing also I can say of all the cardinals, and in fine of the whole court in general; yet none of them (and every Englishman in town knew it) but looked upon me as one, that if any immunity of the crown were in question, or any temporal concern of the kingdom touched, would stand as much in the gap, and be in as diametrical an opposition as any person of the reformed religion whatsoever.

You see then, Sir, both how and why I went; nor have I done any thing certainly to merit any man's unkindness or ill will; nay, to lay yet further before you the hardship I am under, I shall state you a case not fetched out of old forgotten records, or transacted in an age distant from our's, but of a man attainted in this very house, in the memory of several now sitting, and even whilst I myself had the honour to be a member of it. The case, Mr. Speaker, is Axtel's the regicide; one whose crime, I dare say, my greatest enemies think I abhor in the highest manner; nor do I mention the thing in favour of the criminal, but in honour of his grave and worthy judges. Axtel, you know, Mr. Speaker, was indicted for the murder of Charles the first;* and to shew that he maliciously contrived and abetted it, the king's counsel urged his commanding in the hall at the trial; his placing the centinels all about; and in short, his performing there the whole office of captain of the guard. The prisoner answered, (but pray, Mr. Speaker, let me beg pardon, if the interval of almost thirty years has made me forget his words, I am sure the sense of them I have not. I say, Sir, the prisoner answered) 'My lords, I am under great oppression, I am hardly dealt with. Has Charles the second been so gracious as to pass over the ordinary transgressions of his strayed subjects, and to look upon the obedience of soldiers to their then superiors, as if the authority had been more legal? and shall I now die (who was under military discipline) for that which I must have presently died for, had I not done it; to wit, had I not drawn up my regiment, kept the post ordered me, and performed the other duties, the concourse being great and troublesome?' Upon this the judge replied; 'I confess (considering the king's merciful resolutions) that your argument is strong; it has great weight in it: but, Mr. Axtel, did you no more? Did you only perform the duty of a commanded soldier? Who was it, I pray, that animated the rabble? Who beat the soldiers for not crying 'justice!' Who encouraged spitting in the king's face? And who barbarously reviled and threatened a noble lady, that in the transport of her zeal (when she saw her sovereign abused, when she heard such blasphemy against him, and all this fathered upon the nation) made a noise or stir in the court?' These things therefore, Sir, being proved against him, he was convicted, condemned, and so paid a debt to justice, and to the sacred ashes of that great and just man.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to application: and first (after a little glance on the tenderness of these judges, when any necessity could be pretended) let me, with your pardon, ask you, Shall I suffer as a transgressor of the law, were there any, when I must have suffered by the law, had I refused his majesty's orders and commands? But, Sir, if you demand, Did I no more than carry a letter, or go with a ceremonious 'How d'ye' from the king? I must answer, Yes, and a great deal more too. For my house was an asylum, a place of refuge to all distressed or oppressed fellow subjects. If seamen mutinied, or had any contest with their captains, here a reconciliation was made, and here they returned to their obedience; if the captains themselves, fraughted for the Camera, were delayed their money, or misused by under officers, they quickly found redress; and often, by my interest, received more than they themselves expected. And if the question happened about quantity, or how goods were conditioned at delivery, the verdict I am sure went still on their side. Nor was my care confined to Rome only, but reached to all the factories of Italy: for the consuls themselves, nay every private person, found both an easy access to me, and an indefatigable zeal in their concerns: so that the merchants in general that had to do in those parts, were far from being behind-hand in their thankful acknowledgments. Nay, one of the greatest companies in our nation, I mean that for Turkey, not only returned me their thanks very heartily by letter, but did it again by word of mouth after my arrival home.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, if the employment I submitted to were a fault, I have already not a little suffered for it; for I never put bounds (as our travellers, as well as my own officers, fully know) to any expence that could be imagined for the dignity of the nation. And give me leave to tell you also, Sir, that though the name of Rome may be harsh and ungrateful to your ears, yet what I did was with a good intention, and like a true and faithful Englishman. For had I been sent with a character to Constantinople, where they are Mahometans, or to China, where Gentiles, the eclat or figure which I should have endeavoured to make, would never be considered by you as an honour to their religion, but our country; therefore since it is a disparagement and great reflection to a kingdom, to come below, or short of others, in any thing that is public and of note, I cannot but have at least faint hopes, that you will have some consideration, some opinion of an ambassador, though at Rome, that kept up, to his power, the glory and grandeur of England.

But, Mr. Speaker, not to trouble you longer on the present head, I will end when I have told you this: that if I have done amiss in obeying the king's commands, no consul that has pursued a pirate or banditti at Rome; no private factor that has followed a debtor thither, nor in short, any man that has written so much as one letter to that city, though it were to demand his own, but is a far greater criminal than myself, and lies at the mercy of every enemy, to be indicted as a contemner and breaker of the laws.

Your second charge, Mr. Speaker, is my being a privy councillor, without taking the appointed oaths; to which I can truly say, they were never offered me; though I must also confess (for I shall be sincere with you in every thing) that I believe, nay, that I am certain, I should not have taken them, had they been offered: so that I do acknowledge the omission a fault against law——

[Here the Speaker, thinking that his lordship had made an end, desired him to withdraw; but being informed that he had not done, he excused the interruption, and then his lordship went on.]

I say, Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge this a fault against law, were there not several things of weight that will, I hope, justify me to you: and here, Sir, I must entreat you not to conceive that I come now to defend, or make good the dispensing power, but only to shew you how necessarily I was driven and induced to the aforesaid omission; for, Mr. Speaker, in controversies and disputes, what can one do, but recur either to his own observation, or to the opinion of learned men, and professors in the science?

In the first place, then, when I began to examine myself as to the right the king claimed and asserted, I saw non obstantes deemed legal, which signified to me dispensing: I found the power of continuing sheriffs owned for many ages to be undoubted law, and yet I knew there was a positive statute against it: nay, I remembered an act which I myself had in this house given my vote and consent to, viz. that about 'the Regulation of Carriages and Waggons;' or if this be not the exact title, I must beseech you to pardon my treacherous memory, and it is, I will assure you, the only traitor I ever yet succoured or supported. I say, Sir, I remembered this very act, almost as soon as made, suspended by Charles the 2nd's Proclamation, without the least question or murmur; and I took so much notice of it, as to make even then this reflection (and I do assure you upon my honour it is true) that though our monarchs could not impose and abrogate laws of themselves, yet they had the power, I perceived, to respite them.

In the second place, Mr. Speaker, if I went abroad; I mean, if I consulted the thoughts and sentiments of others, I found not only great men of the long robe, but the judges also themselves declaring in favour of this prerogative; and the interpretation or determination of these sages was always told me to be law, till a new law, or a new explanation, should be enacted. What would you then, Mr. Speaker, have me to do, who was called to the board by the king, who could not in conscience take the oaths, and yet had no reason to think I committed, in not taking them, a crime, seeing the law was thus openly expounded and published?

And now, Sir, since I have been forced to mention my religion, which I know is a legal fault, and of a high nature, I must not forget also to celebrate the goodness of this house, which has pardoned the fault, even in the solemnest way, and by the solemnest act that ever passed since Magna Charta; to wit, the great Act of Oblivion. Give me leave, Sir, to say this too, for I can justly do it, that being so faithful and so true an Englishman, I neither should, nor could, I am sure, have ever, during my life, offended my country, but in my religion. Pardon also, I humbly beseech you, this digression, and together with it the incoherences and disjunctions all along; nor shall I any ways doubt of it, since you so well know how uneasy and troublesome a long discourse (which my circumstances have now required) must needs be to one that wants both eloquence and practice.

But, Mr. Speaker, to return where I left, and so conclude: how, Sir, I pray you (and I demand it again of you with great respect), could I think the omission, as I said, of the oaths a breach of the laws, when our guides, who had the laws in their keeping, told us explicitly, and without reserve, the said oaths were not necessary? Shall I then suffer, that had neither buoy nor mark to direct me? Certainly no; for if there were a fault, it is not I must suffer, but the judges, and those knowing and deputed pilots, that hung out, it seems, the wrong flag and signal. I have, Sir, but one word more to trouble you with, and this I speak in behalf of all here; nay, in behalf of all the people of England; that if I now undergo your severity, and that single persons (notwithstanding the determinations and judgments of our courts of justice) must be still responsible, no man can be safe, no man can be at rest, for nobody that acts can know (as accidents will often happen) whether he be innocent or guilty.

Mr. Speaker, I am in great disorder for imposing thus on your patience; and especially seeing I must yet presume to do it, one thing more occurring to me, as I hope, for your further service, or at least satisfaction: and it is to let you know how I came to be a prisoner, and why I continued so thus long. Be pleased then, Sir, that I tell you, that as soon as the king first left Whitehall, I thought it decency to go out of town; and therefore three days after I took coach for Montgomeryshire, where of late I used to reside in the summer time. On the borders of that county, at a small corporation called Oswestree, I was first stopped by the rabble, and afterwards detained with a strong guard, at my inn by the mayor; though nobody, as he confessed, made any oath against me; and though he had no orders, as he said, from London for it, nay, after a month's restraint, he denied me my liberty upon bail, notwithstanding two neighbouring lawyers, whom I sent for, assured him he could not justify the refusal by law. I do not, Sir, complain of any incivility, either from him or the people; for I was used with respect enough; but I judge it extremely fit to let you see how the liberty of a subject was wilfully invaded by a magistrate, and how little conscious I was of any guilt, since instead of flying, I went to a place where I was known by every body.

In fine, Mr. Speaker, after a confinement of seven weeks, I was sent for up, and brought hither by a party of horse; nor was I ever questioned or examined by any body, but kept (upon the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act) at a messenger's house for three months; and when the said act was suspended the last time, I was committed by my lord Shrewsbury's warrant to the Tower, 'for suspicion of treasonable practices.'

[His lordship having ended, retired with the serjeant at arms to his room, where after a little stay, he was sent for in again; and then the Speaker told him, That since he said his journey to Rome was with a letter of civility to a temporal prince, and not about religion, the House (to be more fully satisfied of it) desired to see his Instructions. To which his lordship thus answered:]

I hope, Mr. Speaker, though I shall readily acknowledge my own natural weakness, you will not yet think me so imprudent, as that, in a time of such troubles and distraction, I would keep papers by me; and especially about Rome, to render myself liable to every malicious man's extravagancy and comment. This therefore caused me, Sir, the night before I went towards Wales, to burn all papers that came to hand; and truly, some among the rest that I have since wanted: Nay, this I can also justly aver, that I remember not now one word of those Instructions, having, I am confident, never read them twice; only this I remember, they were things of course, words of form, and needed no further consideration. Yet, Sir, that you may plainly see my sincerity, and how far I am from any design of illuding and deceiving you, I shall shew you how you may retrieve them, when I tell you, that Mr. Monstevens brought them me, and that they were drawn, as I take it, by Mr. Bridgman; for I am certain they came from my lord Sunderland's office.

But, my lord, replied the Speaker, had you no private Instructions? None, answered his lordship. What, none at all? said Mr. Speaker again. None, I'll assure, Sir, replied his lordship; unless the king's orders, to demand a cardinal's cap for prince Reinaldo of Este, were private Instructions; nor do I certainly know, whether those commands were in my fore-mentioned Instructions, or whether I had them by word of mouth.

My lord, said the Speaker, I have another question to ask you; to wit, Who of the long robe told you of the king's power of dispensing, and that there was no necessity of taking the oaths?

I am, Sir, answered his lordship, infinitely troubled, if I have, through want of care, or by any improper expression, given you occasion to misapprehend me; for I never asked any particular man of that profession about this affair. But my meaning was (and I hope my words are not contrary to my meaning) that the said power was manifestly and openly declared to be law by judges and lawyers; so that I deemed it no solecism in discourse to mention it as if they themselves had told it me.

Then his lordship retired again, and after a long debate, the House passed this order, "That the earl of Castlemaine stand committed to the Tower by a warrant from this House of high treason, for endeavouring to reconcile this kingdom to the see of Rome, and for other high crimes and misdemeanors."

As soon as his lordship was informed of this Vote, he entreated a member to let the House know, that he had a word or two more to trouble them with: so that being brought in, the Speaker told him, that the House having notice he had something further to acquaint them with, was very willing to hear him.

Mr. Speaker, replied his lordship; I have nothing more to say about the former matters; but understanding your pleasure, I thought it my duty to let you know, how the custom of the Tower, as to prisoners, is changed; for in course heretofore, unless there were a particular order of state to the contrary, they had the liberty of the Tower; that is to say, they could walk about at seasonable hours with a warder: but now as soon as one is committed, though it be upon bare suspicion, as I was, he is confined to his lodging, and hindered from the consolation of seeing his friends, till, after much solicitation and trouble, leave be granted by the secretaries. Therefore, Sir, being morally certain that I shall be confined again as soon as I return, I humbly desire the favour of this freedom; it being also what I hitherto enjoyed after I had been restrained for some days in the aforementioned manner.

This said, his lordship went out, and then was carried to the Tower, where he was made a close prisoner, as he foretold; though what he moved, occasioned the following Vote:

"That a Committee be appointed to bring in a Bill for the better regulating the Imprisonment of the Subjects of this Kingdom, and to settle the Fees of Gaolers." And it was likewise referred to them to examine into the abuses of gaolers towards their prisoners which have heretofore been committed.

On Wednesday the 5th of the following February, his lordship moved for his Habeas Corpus, and was brought by the lord Lucas, the present governor of the Tower, to Westminster, on the 10th. So that appearing at the King's-bench, his commitments were read, and Mr. Attorney having nothing to object against his being bailed, the court awarded it upon the security of 30,000*l.*; that is to say, a recognizance of 10,000*l.* for himself, and 5,000*l.* a-piece from his four sureties, who were, John earl of Bath, Thomas earl of Ailesbury, Thomas earl of Sussex, Charles lord Lansdown.

house in the county of Wicklow, at Ballinderry, 24 miles from Dublin, did for the safety and preservation of himself and family; obtain the lord deputy Tyrconnel's protection, as many more of the English Protestants living in the country at the same time did. For the late king James going away for France, and the administration of the government being put into the hands of his present majesty, the lord Tyrconnel gave out commissions, for the raising a mighty army, to any Irish Papist that would take one, and promise to subsist, maintain and clothe their men for three months. Most of these new officers are men of mean fortunes, not capable of subsisting themselves; their men live altogether on the English, coming into their houses in the day-time, and commanding from them their meat and drink; and often robbing them in the night, stealing away their cattle. Likewise the priests of every parish obliged all their people to furnish themselves with half-pikes and skeans, and bring them to mass, or not presume to appear there, on the penalty of excommunication, or a severe punishment; which caused all the Irish to arm themselves with the aforesaid weapons; upon which, robberies, thefts, and other outrages were daily committed upon the English; particularly in the county of Wicklow, wheresome hundreds were got together for that purpose, who gave themselves the name of Merry Boys, and had very great success in their thievish attempts upon their Protestant neighbours, that lived hitherto secure in their own houses. It is observable, what great power the Romish clergy have over the Irish; they arm themselves immediately at their command, and yet to this day have neither kept them from robbing of the English, nor restored them any thing taken away; which if they had been so minded, they might have done by the same power. Several of Mr. Price's neighbours repaired to Ballinderry, to preserve themselves and goods; but an order coming out soon after, for the taking away all horses and arms from the Protestants, both in city and country, colonel Toole, with a party of his men, came to demand what arms and horses they had at Ballinderry. Mr. Price and the rest having the aforementioned protection, refused to obey their orders; and complaint coming to Dublin, colonel Sheldon was immediately sent away with a body of horse and foot against Ballinderry. Mr. Price, upon his approach, presently submitted to him, who thereupon was made prisoner, and all the rest of the men that were in the house: But the prison of Wicklow not being able to contain them, several of them were admitted to bail, until the following assizes, which began March the 5th last past, and ended the 8th, 1689.

Lord Chief Justice KEATING's* Charge to the Grand Jury:

Gentlemen; You that are here returned to serve on this grand jury, you have this day before your eyes the greatest example, and the firmest proof that a gracious prince can give to the best of subjects. You see his sacred majesty king James the second (whom God long preserve for the protection of all his good and dutiful subjects, and for the subversion and irradicating of all those who desire the subversion of his government, either by foreign force or inbred conspiracy) notwithstanding the great troubles on his own person, yet he is not wanting in his care towards you; and I dare boldly say, it is the last thing he will relinquish in the world, after that of his own conscience, the care of his subjects. He hath sent us with his commission to inquire into all the maladies, diseases, and sores within your county. He has likewise given us command to apply the healing balsam of the laws, which will preserve the subject most entirely in his property. And I am sorry I must tell you, that there was never more need than now at this time. I am glad at the same time that I can say, that the mischiefs fallen on a great part of this kingdom, and on no part more than on this county, that is under the very eye of the government; I say, I am glad it can be said to have arisen, for the most part, from a rabble of people, who have armed themselves without any direction from the government, and that with unusual weapons. I mean half pikes and skeans. Gentlemen, I must tell you plainly, it looks rather like a design to massacre and murder, than any thing else. They do not belong to the army, neither are they any part of them: but these are the vultures, kites, and ravens that follow armies. Soldiers that have travelled abroad say, such are not known among them there. I am told, and very well assured, that in foreign parts, where these vultures and birds of prey are, it is hard for an army to lie concealed, without being discovered by them; for it is odds, but that a horse or a man drops where such multitudes of people are. I am very far from laying this to the charge of any that are under command; though it is possible that some of them, under the scarcity they are in, do give their assistance, or at least encouragement to these robbers; otherwise it could not be, that whole flocks and droves of cattle are daily driven away, and yet no one taken or brought to justice for it. The king is not wanting in his care; he has given directions to have the laws put in execution, that criminals may be brought in and punished; and the government has issued out many proclamations, but they are grown too familiar with them. You are to inquire into this matter, in order to bring to punishment, not only them that steal, but those that receive. I am told that open markets are set up in this county of Wicklow: a fat bullock for five shillings, and a fat sheep for one shilling; but it will fall heavy on them at last. Divines say, that God Almighty oftentimes makes the very crime to become their own punishment; and I verily fear, that a few months will produce a famine in this kingdom; and, what succeeds, a pestilence, and the worst of all pestilences; for it is observed, that a starved rot is the worst of all rots; it falls out unhappily at this season of the year, when the cattle are breeding. Under the old law the Jews were not to seeth the kid in the mother's milk; but these unmerciful wretches go further than that, sparing none, but destroying old and young, the increase and all. Pray, gentlemen, consider of it, and search the houses of such as you have reason to suspect, that had not any thing to eat the last year; go now into their houses, and you will find whole carcasses of beef powdered up: nay, it may be for want of salt, or money to buy it, lying rotting and stinking. Let me tell you, it will be your turn next, when they have robbed and spoiled your Protestant neighbours, they will come to you, unless you take speedy care to prevent it. The king has done what he can, and the government what they can; in vain is the law made, if offenders be not brought to condign punishment. You all know there has been an invasion in England of a foreign enemy, the prince of Orange; and the same is designed on this kingdom: the effects of an invasion are not known. Defence is natural to all kingdoms and states, and therefore the government has given directions for raising a greater army than at any time heretofore this kingdom ever had. It was so among the Romans of old, who in cases of necessity did things clear contrary to the fundamentals of their laws. The same necessity has put the king on arming here (in France they have their ban, and with us our commission of array, from sixteen to sixty), but without any design that the effects should be to arm the country with half-pikes and skeans. They are fit indeed for the mountains, or to guard a man's house, but not to go abroad with at noonday. Gentlemen, you that are justices of the peace, and officers of the army, wherever you meet, you ought to secure them, and bind them over, and know by what authority they dare go abroad with such weapons. I need not say any thing to you in defence of the king, for it is really and truly your own defence; and therefore I shall proceed into the heads which are prepared for your inquiry at this time. Our business here is like to be very great, and our time short, and therefore I shall not trouble you with small things; we have greater matters than assaults and batteries. We have desolations and ruins to shew you, and set before you, and without your care, we are like to fall into the gulph of misery and destruction. The first thing we have to speak of, is high treason; we have no petty treason in Ireland. If any shall go about to conspire the death of the king, queen, or the heir apparent, the prince of Wales, this is high treason at all times; it was so at common law. You must look to this betimes, for if a blow be once struck here, there can be no retrieving of it. If any one should go about to seize the king's person, or imprison him, this, gentlemen, is treason; there is but few steps between the prisons and graves of kings; and by all the observation that I can make out of the English, or Scots, or Irish histories, where we have had swarms of murdered kings, that if once they went into prison, they seldom ever escaped with life. Our king has more reason than any to dread this. His father, who now is a glorious martyr in heaven, lost his life; and the king himself, ever since his escape with colonel Bamfield from St. James's, has had so many miraculous deliverances both by sea and land, that we may conclude he is preserved for some mighty matter, or else Providence had not done such great things for him; and it is but of late that he himself is escaped out of prison. I am told by authority, and am ordered to tell you, that he is expected in this kingdom very suddenly, as a place of refuge. He is the first king, I think, since Henry the second, except Richard, that has been in this kingdom. It is a great misfortune that he should be forced to it, but we may look upon it as a great blessing, that he should think himself safe here, when he cannot be so elsewhere.

* In the Letters of Henry earl of Clarendon, frequent mention is made of the Irish judges, their characters, and behaviours, during the period of his lieutenancy in Ireland, in the reign of James the Second. He represents Keating very favourably in several letters. In that dated April 6, 1686, to Lord Chancellor Jefferies, he writes of Keating as being one whom "all parties will own to be a good man." Clarendon likewise writes favourably of Price. With respect to the administration of justice in Ireland, see also archbishop King's account of the state of the Protestants of Ireland under the government of James the second. As to the judges of England and Scotland at that period, see in this Collection, vol. 12, p. 257.

To seize any of the king's forts or ships of war (for these are the bulwarks to defend him against his enemies) this, gentlemen, is treason.

To hold correspondence with any of the king's enemies, or with rebels in actual rebellion, or to join with them, this is treason. You are not to inquire into the punishment, but to open a door for the petty jury to inquire into the matter of fact, and what the law is, shall, by the blessing of God, be our business.

To counterfeit the king's coin, or clip it (and you have very little of it at this time, therefore you had need be careful in a more especial manner), this likewise is treason.

It is likewise treason to counterfeit the great seal of the king; for it is the common security, by which many hold their estates, and some their lives.

The killing of the chancellor, or any of the judges or justices of oyer and terminer, in the doing of their duty, this likewise is treason, not so much with regard to their persons as to the work that they are about, they representing the king's person. The meanest constable there, if he has his staff in his hand, and doing his duty, he that kills him shall die the same death as he that kills the best man that wears scarlet on the bench. Gentlemen, I must tell you another crime, and it looks like a mark of infamy on this kingdom. Murder in England is but felony, but it has been thought fit to make it treason here, and they that go out on burning and robbing houses, they shall be indicted for treason: and clerk of the crown, if any such be here, now take notice, I will have them indicted for treason.

The next thing for your inquiry is felony, that concerning the life of the subject. For a man to kill his fellow subject, this is felony, if he does it on a sudden passion and heat; a man may kill another in his own defence; for it is natural for a man to kill rather than be killed, and therefore he shall have his pardon of course. But, gentlemen, this is not in favour of duels, and only where there is a great provocation: there is not a man but has some passion about him; but for a man to go to bed with malice, and arise the next morning and go meet his fellow subject and kill him, this is murder and treason in Ireland.

The next thing that is felony, is concerning the goods of the subject; for an honest labouring man, that by the industry of his whole life has gotten a fair stock for the maintenance of himself, his wife and children, at night goes to bed, and next morning when he arises, he is a beggar and wants bread. Gentlemen, it would make every honest man's heart bleed to hear what I have heard since I came into this country. It is ill in other parts of the country, but here they spare not even the wearing clothes and habit of women and children, that they are forced to come abroad naked, without any thing to cover their nakedness: so that besides the oath you have taken, and the obligation of Christianity that lies upon you as you are Christians, I conjure you by all that is sacred, and as ever you expect eternal salvation, that you make diligent inquiry. Let it never be said by any of you, that it was your neighbour, or your neighbour's servant did it, and you are sorry for it, but will not trouble yourselves: I tell you it is every man's business, and I beseech you look into it.

To break into any man's house after night-fall, is felony. It is a sound sleep that the labouring man takes, but the idle rogue that lies lurking and sleeping all the day, at night he arises and seeks whom he may devour. If you were to do the most charitable work, as building of a bridge or chapel, or mending a highway, how many do you think of these men with half pikes and skeans would come to your assistance? Not one of them, I will engage. But if a house or town be to be plundered, they all run thither. All riots and routs are to be inquired into. Numbers of people may meet for their own defence, if they should hear or see the country robbing and spoiling, by a riotous multitude coming to burn and rob their houses. In this case they may meet and defend their goods, and apprehend the robbers, in order to bring them to justice; but after all this, they are not to contest with the government, nor do any thing to the prejudice of that. I told you, I would not trouble you with unnecessary matters: all are lost in the greatest of crimes and outrages that are committed daily in the country round about.

If I should go through all the heads of this charge, it would take up more time than we have to spend here; and therefore I should shut up all and say no more than this, that every man do apply himself to his husbandry and tillage, to prevent that imminent danger of an approaching famine that seems to be coming upon us, and that you make it your business to search after, and bring to judgment those robbers that live on the mountains; and while you continue to do your duty, you shall have all the protection the government can give you. So upon complaint of any justice of the peace that shall be backward or unwilling to appear against them, care shall be taken to punish such, and make them examples. Go together, gentlemen, and consider of these things.

[The Prisoners brought into Court.]

Clerk of the Crown. Set John Price to the bar, Thomas King to the bar, W. Lewis, James Beacon, William Heatly, Thomas Burroughs to the bar, &c. Hold up your right hands.

Clerk. John Price, Thomas King, &c. You stand here indicted, for that you, on the 25th day of February, in the 5th year of the reign of our sovereign lord king James the 2nd, at Ballindary, in the county of Wicklow, with divers other wicked traitors and rebels, in a warlike manner then and there did assemble yourselves, and a cruel and open war and rebellion against our sovereign lord the king, and his faithful subjects of this his majesty's kingdom of Ireland, did raise and levy, and did intend our sovereign lord the king to death and destruction to bring, and to depose him from his kingly authority and government of this his kingdom of Ireland; and to fulfil and accomplish these your said traitorous intentions and designs, you the said persons, with others said wicked traitors and rebels, the day, year, and place aforesaid, did arm yourselves with divers warlike weapons, as well offensive as defensive; and did move and excite divers others the subjects of our sovereign lord the king, to join themselves wickedly and traterously, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, and the duty of your allegiance, and the statute in that case made and provided, &c.

Clerk. How sayest thou, John Price, art thou guilty of the treason that thou standest here indicted, &c. or not guilty?

Mr. Price. Not guilty.

Clerk. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Prisoner. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

Note. The Prisoners were brought into Court in several parties, to be arraigned, as many as the dock would hold at one time.

[The second time the dock was filled.]

Clerk Cr. Set William Fulham to the bar, &c.

[Thady Brine, the High Sheriff, stood up and said, my Lord, Fulham was cleared.]

Baron Lynch. Pray, Sir, who cleared him?

High-Sheriff. The chief commissioned officer that was here; colonel Sheldon did acquit him.

Baron Lynch. He acquit him! how could that be? If there be nothing against him, we shall acquit him.

L. C. J. Clerk of the crown, is he indicted?

Clerk. Yes, my lord, a bill of indictment is found against him.

Pendergrass, the Sub-Sheriff. My lord, I will tell you, Mr. Sheriff is mistaken; there was some boys discharged, and he thinks Fulham is one of those boys.

Baron Lynch. Sir, you do well to reflect on your employer.

High-Sheriff to the Sub-Sheriff. You have done this to get money for yourself. My lord, Fulham was not concerned at all, and therefore was discharged.

Prisoner Lewis. My lord, we are so crowded with a file of musqueteers and a serjeant, that they take up our chairs, that we cannot sit down; and they come with their lighted matches to our very noses; and last night a piece went off in the room among us. We have not the conveniency of quiet repose, nor our friends the liberty of seeing us. My lord, we were not born lawyers, therefore desire we may have our friends come to us, and counsel to advise with.

[This Lewis and lord Galmoy are brother and sister's children, and was offered a troop if he would turn Papist.]

L. C. J. Mr. Lewis, you have been bred to the law; but you shall have counsel allowed you; and you, Mr. Sheriff, you are not to keep them with fire-arms, nor with your soldiers. I saw a sentry at this door yesterday, and forbade it. I remember that when Warren, Jephson, and Thompson were tried in 1663, for a design to surprize Dublin castle, because this was a great matter, forsooth, they must be guarded with soldiers——(they were tried at the King's Bench; and several persons desirous to see or hear, being gotten up into the arch in the wall next the court of Common Pleas) as they were going up stairs, a piece went off, and shot a man through the head. I tell you, Mr. Sheriff, that brown bill is your guard [pointing at one in court]; the law knows nothing of fire arms; [speaking to the prisoners] gentlemen, I must tell you plainly, that I received directions from my lord deputy, by the Attorney General, that you should have all the justice imaginable.

Baron Lynch. Mr. Sheriff, you must command those soldiers to be civil, they are your guards when you employ them.

Seventy prisoners were arraigned and returned back to prison; 31 more that were indicted, and upon bail, did not appear.

Thursday, March 7. They were again brought to Court to their Trials, and the Jury was impanneled, whose names were as followeth; Papists marked thus †; viz.

† Thomas Cowdell.	Daniel Powell.
Philip Cradock.	† Richard Johnston.
John Pew.	† Theophilus Higgens.
† Alexander Higden.	† Nicholas Wall.
† Christopher Talbot.	† Charles Tool.
† Dudley Keogh.	† Charles Birne.
† John Keogh.	† Cornelius Kenan.
† David Toole.	Tho. Elliot.
† James White.	Richard Baker.
† Darby Toole.	† Thady Birne.
† Gerrard Harold.	† Francis Tute.
† Daniel Birne.	† James Moore.
† Patrick M'Donnell.	† Hugh Birne.
† Patrick O'Donnelly.	† Bryan O'Neal.
† Christopher Birne.	† Dennis Cullen.

Jailor, set the prisoners to the bar.

Clerk Cr. You good men that are to try the several issues between the king and John Price, &c. and other prisoners at the bar, that shall be given you in charge, &c. jury, look at the prisoners; prisoners, look at the jury.

Clerk Cr. Thomas Cowdell, to the book.

Prisoner Lewis. I challenge him.

Clerk. What is your cause of challenge?

Deputy king's counsel, Fitzpatrick. My lord, before they begin their challenges, let us know whether they will all agree in their challenges, otherwise we must be forced to try them severally.

It was at length agreed, that if any one made a peremptory challenge, the other prisoners were to be satisfied with it.

[Col. Tool on the bench, speaking to the lord chief justice Keating.]

My lord, Mr. Lewis has been sub-sheriff of the county, and knows all that have freehold.

L. C. J. It is the better for himself that he does know them.

Prisoner Lewis continued to challenge, until they had gone through the pannel, and only two gentlemen that were Protestants, Mr. Craddock and Mr. Pew, were sworn.

Clerk Cr. Mr. Sheriff, a new pannel—The sheriff gave in another of eleven in number, which were all likewise challenged by Mr. Lewis.—Whilst both the high and sub-sheriff were looking about the court, for to make up a third pannel, says

L. C. J. Mr. Sheriff, how many freeholders have you on the grand-jury?

Sheriff. Six or seven, my lord.

L. C. J. You have been sparing enough of your freeholders. The law requires that all the grand-jury should be freeholders, and have you but six?

Sheriff. There is but very few freeholders in the county, my lord.

Couns. Fitzpatrick. In cases of necessity, my lord—

L. C. J. You know the law is so.

Couns. Fitzpatrick. Yes, there is a statute for it.

L. C. J. The prisoner for his life may challenge twenty peremptorily, without shewing cause; and the whole world for want of freehold—And shall I put such a one on for his life? Sir, I will not be hanged for any body.

Fitzpatrick. Was ever a judge hanged?

Mr. Handcock, counsel for the prisoners. Yes, above twenty in a few years.

L. C. J. Mr. Fitzpatrick, I will not be hanged with justice Belknap, nor Tresilian* neither.

Couns. Handcock. My lord, they were hanged at Tyburn.

L. C. J. I think they were. The greatest part of this county is in the hands of two or three men, my lords Strafford and Ross.

L. C. J. Who is here that is concerned for my lord Strafford and my lord Ross?

* See their cases, vol. 1, p. 89. It does not appear that Belknap was hanged; see vol. 1, p. 120.

Court. Here is Dr. Hall on the bench for the lord Strafford, and the sheriff is concerned for my lord Ross.

L. C. J. Dr. Hall, and you Mr. Sheriff, let me tell you I do not know but that their lordships have forfeited their estates for this day's work. In the act for plantation, there was provision made for freeholds, and there were enough before the wars. I fear these great lords have swallowed up the freeholds their ancestors made. I only tell you this.

The Sheriff by this time had drawn up a third pannel, being eight in number.

L. C. J. Mr. Sheriff, have you all your freeholders here?

Sheriff. My lord, we summoned all here.

L. C. J. On the first pannel you might have returned forty, because you do not know how far preremptory challenges will run; and you are obliged after to return a fewer number when you enlarge your pannel; but you can never enlarge it farther than it was at first.

Clerk Cr. Birne, to the book.

Pris. Lewis. I challenge him for want of freehold.

L. C. J. Mr. Birne, have you a freehold in this county?

Birne. My lord, I have a lease of lives.

Pris. Westland. I challenge him preremptorily.

Baron Lynch. What, Sir, do you begin to challenge? This shall not be allowed you, to challenge one upon another.

Couns. Hancock. My lord, you are counsel for the prisoners.

Baron Lynch. Sir, you are not to tell me my duty; I will have you to know, Sir, I shall give an account for myself. I am judge for the king too, as well as counsel for the prisoners; and I am concerned for the king.

L. C. J. [Turning towards him.] And do you think I am not concerned as well as you?

Baron Lynch. Yes, my lord, I speak for you as well as myself.

Couns. Fitzpatrick. My lord, they agreed at first, that one man should challenge for them all. At this rate we are never like to get a jury for them. It is but an ill sign of their innocency, that they are not willing to come to a trial.

Mr. Hancock, counsel for the prisoners. In the peremptory challenges they agreed (but not in the challenges for freehold,) and this peremptory challenge we will stand by.

L. C. J. I will tell you how I understood it: That in their peremptory challenges, if any one of them challenged, the rest should be concluded by it. Mr. Westland has made a peremptory challenge, and they are willing to stand by that; however, Mr. Birne, stand by, do not go away, we may call you again. Clerk of the crown proceed, &c. which he did, until he ended the third pannel.

Sub-Sheriff calls William Baker.

Ans. My lord, he has a freehold.

Baker. My lord, I have no freehold.

L. C. J. You see the Sub-Sheriff is a fit man to be an officer; he is blind—he is indifferent.

High-Sheriff calls Peter Ayris.

Ans. He is on the Grand-Jury.

L. C. J. Mr. Sheriff, why do you call such?

Sheriff. I saw him in court, and so I called him, my lord.

L. C. J. There is already but five peremptory challenges made, so that they may challenge 15 more peremptorily; and there is but two sworn, so that there wants ten.

Cl. Cr. Sheriff, see if you can get any more.

Sheriff. I see never a freeholder in the court.

Couns. Fitzpatrick. My lord, the sheriff ought to be punished for his neglect.

Baron Lynch. Sir, why did you not take care to return a jury of freeholders? You shall be fined for it.

High-Sheriff. My lord, I have returned all the freeholders there is in the county (I sent yesterday about twenty miles for one gentleman here), they are all gone out of the country. I hope you do not expect I should go to the North, or Isle of Man, or England, or Scotland, among the rebels, to summon them.

L. C. J. I do really believe you, Mr. Sheriff; you have done like an honest man. Mr. Fitzpatrick what do you say in this case?

Fitzpatrick. My lord, I cannot tell what to say.

Deputy King's Couns. Hammond. What if there was not one freeholder in the county, must not justice be done?

L. C. J. Can we make a law for it?

Hammond. My lord, I know that in case of an ejectment, a trial has been removed from one county to another.

L. C. J. Can you by law go to another county in case of life?

Hammond. It appears there is not sufficient freeholders in this county, the lands being in some few hands.

L. C. J. You know the law is otherwise, and what would you have us that are judges do? Pray, tell us, Sir, what you would be at?

Hammond. We would have it removed to the next county, or another county.

L. C. J. For God's sake, Mr. Hammond, do not put us on making law.

Baron Lynch. Mr. Hammond, when did you hear that ever a matter capital was tried in a foreign county? In matters civil, by rule of court, or order of Chancery, it may be, but of a capital offence it was never known: and we are by our commission to try offences committed against the law in the counties where the fact was committed. We must try them in this county, and cannot remove them from one county to another.

L. C. J. Mr. Hammond, because I would take you off of this new law that you so much insist on, that in case of an ejectment it may be tried in a foreign county—I tell you it cannot be tried in a foreign county: we have no law for it but that of king James, and the reason was, because of the story that was here on foot; for an heir male, if collateral, he carried it against the heir general. King James he gave direction that in that case it should be tried in a different county. And that my brother tells you of trying in a different county by order of Chancery, is this: a person comes in Chancery and he suggests that such an one was too potent in such a county, and therefore he desired it might be tried in an indifferent county, or get such a rule of court on such a suggestion. And this was the case of the archbishop of ——— when he was bishop of Limerick. And if Walcot might be believed, he said, was the occasion of his running into rebellion.

C. There is a case in Hobart, &c.

L. C. J. I would undeceive you in that particular: as in the case of Austen and colonel Garret Moor. If in the county of Galloway, it was Austen's; if in the king's county, it was colonel Moor's. So that you see, in disputable cases, the law has regard that it be tried by juries in proper counties: and truly I think it one of the most reasonable laws in the world that a man shall be tried by his county, by the neighbourhood; and it has given ground to a good English proverb, 'He that has an ill name is half-hanged.' A man's repute among his neighbours goes a great way in this matter when his neighbours shall say they never knew ill by him. And this man to be carried out of the county of Wicklow, to be tried at Wexford you may by the same rule bring a jury from Tyrone, or the farthest part of Connaught. There is nothing like what you say in the law.

Hammond. I do not say that ever I met with such a thing in the law.

Baron Lynch. And do you think that we will make the precedent?

Hammond. That two or three persons should have almost the whole county!

L. C. J. Before God, I believe they think they have little enough, whatever you may think of their having too much.

Baron Lynch. What you say, Mr. Hammond, if there be any thing in it, we shall advise with all the Judges.

The Judges declaring their opinion, that the prisoners after being arraigned, could not be admitted to bail, Coun. Suxborough to Baron Lynch. My lord, you took bail for captain Ruth, at Kilkenny, after his arraignment.

Baron Lynch. What, Sir, do you reflect on me? There was no evidence appeared, and my brother bailed him as well as I.

Coun. Suxborough. I say he was bailed.

Mr. Hancock. My lord, Mr. Cooper, at Galloway, was bailed by your lordship likewise.

Lord Chief Justice Keating sent privately to Dublin to the Deputy, acquainting him, that if they were left in prison until the next assizes, they would certainly perish, they having lost all they had, and the county was not able to maintain them; upon which he received orders to bail all but seven of the principal; viz. John Price, esq., Thomas King, Richard Westland, William Lewis, James Bacon, Joseph Crichley, and George Crichley; who are kept close prisoners, in order to their trial the next assizes, which will be in this month of July. Upon the taking these gentlemen prisoners, the soldiers and rabble plundered and spoiled all the English families in Balinderry, Redrum, Balina-Clash, &c. and the Irish women, with their skeans, came afterwards and stripped the women and children naked, leaving them in a most miserable and deplorable condition, having not left them either bread, or any food in several towns, but carried all away with them. And as an Irishman, a tanner, declared to several at the assizes, in the hearing of this relator, that one capt. Tool had for his share twenty-six horse-loads, or more, of plunder; and the lord of Lowth's troop of dragoons that were quartered in Wicklow town, had great quantities of woollen and linen cloth, women's clothes, pewter, and other goods in abundance. But the Lord Chief Justice Keating coming there to the assizes, and having an account of the extreme poverty and misery the Protestants thereabouts were reduced to, did encourage their petitioning, and where they could find their clothes, &c. he endeavoured to help them in the recovery of them. And Mr. Richard Lamb having ten fat bullocks taken away by col. Tool's men, and brought to Wicklow, and there killed and eaten by the soldiers, he preferred a petition to the court, col. Tool being present on the bench.

L. C. J. Keating. Colonel Tool, you heard the petition read; do you know any thing of these oxen Mr. Lamb had taken from him by your soldiers?

Col. Tool. My lord, I will tell you how it was: Mr. Lamb had sold the bullocks to Mr. Price, and as they were driving them to Balinderry, the soldiers met them and took them away.

L. C. J. But Mr. Lamb was at home at his own house, and not at Balinderry; the bullocks were to be paid for upon Mr. Lamb's delivering them to Mr. Price at Balinderry; your soldiers took them away from his servant several miles from Balinderry: I see no reason why Mr. Lamb should not be paid for them.

Tool. My lord, colonel Sheldon came down soon after with the king's army, and I advised with him, and he ordered they should be killed for the army, which was done accordingly.

L. C. J. Pray, colonel Tool, however, Mr.

Lamb ought to be paid for them; he was not concerned with Balinderry, but kept his own house.

Coun. Fitzpatrick. My lord, his house was a garrison too.

Mr. Hancock. For shame, Mr. Fitzpatrick, a thatched cabin a garrison! I find you are for making all Protestants rebels that live peaceably at home in their own houses.

Tool. My lord, I have no more to say to the matter.

Clerk of the Crown, calling over the gentlemen of the county, called one — Savil, gent.

Mr. Savil. Here I am, my lord, God knows, a poor gentleman, being robbed of all, and not a penny left me to buy a pint of drink.

L. C. J. Pray, Sir, when were you robbed.

Savil. The last Wednesday; they came and took away what little they had left untaken before, my wife and children's clothes, robbing me of all.

L. C. J. Pray, Sir, what value may your loss be?

Savil. Truly, my lord, I have not yet computed my loss, but they have taken away all; I desire your lordship will discharge me from attending the court, for I have not wherewithal to subsist while I am here.

L. C. J. Sir, I am sorry for you, I discharge you.

L. C. J. Col. Tool, let the officers be sent for into court, to hear this Proclamation read, that is sent down here by the government.

Tool. My lord, they are here most of them. Here is captain Archbold, captain Tool, &c.

Clerk of the Crown read the Proclamation, the substance whereof was, That they should restore the Protestants such of their horses again, as were not fit for the king's service, &c.

L. C. J. calls for it from the Clerk, and giving it into col. Tool's hand, who stood next him on the bench; Sir, pray take this Proclamation, and I hope you will take care that obedience be given to it.

Tool. My lord, we have received other orders; colonel Sheldon, who is our chief commander, has given directions to have them kept for draught for carriages.

L. C. J. Nay, Sir, if colonel Sheldon must be obeyed before the government, I have no more to say, I have done.

Tool. My lord, I shall obey it.

L. C. J. Pray, then, colonel Tool, let the horses be sent for while that I am here, that what horses are not musterable may be returned: I cannot in my conscience go about to fine men for not appearing at the assizes, when they have not a horse left them to ride on.

364. The Trial of MAURICE CAVENAGH, EDMUND POOR, and WM. BOWLAND, in Ireland, for Felony, in stealing Cows: 1 WILLIAM & MARY,* March 7, A. D. 1689.

SEVERAL were arraigned for stealing considerable numbers of cows, sheep, &c. but the evidence against most of them durst not appear to prosecute. Leaghlin Birne, indicted for stealing nine head of black cattle from one Colwell, no person appearing to prosecute, says

L. C. J. Keating to the Jury. Gentlemen, you have nothing against this man; he was born in the state of innocency; but the truth is, the parties dare not appear against him.

Witnesses came in against three fellows; viz. Maurice Cavenagh, Edmund Poor, William Bowland.

Clerk of the Crown calling them to come and prosecute, and they appearing,

L. C. J. You that are evidences against the prisoners at the bar, I charge you, as you will answer it before God, that you neither for favour nor affection be inclined to spare any of these villains; and likewise, that you will conceal nothing of the truth, as you will answer it at the great day; for I tell you, the cries and groans of the poor women and children, and the many families that are ruined, and in great distress, will go up to Heaven against you.

Evidence against Edm. Poor. My lord, when I came to him, and asked him why he stole my cows, he said, the devil did make him do it. I spake him fair, and he gave me money for my cows.

Poor. Ay, my lord, and he promised not to trouble me.

L. C. J. It was an unlawful promise; the law would not justify him in it; he has done like an honest man. If you paid the money out of conscience, you did well; but I fear it was your danger of the halter made you part with your money; for if twenty-two shillings and damnation stood in the way, I believe you would have kept the money. I am sure, without satisfaction, you cannot expect absolution; the priest that gave the other advice for the maddoge or skean, will, I suppose, tell you so.

Two Protestant evidences against Maurice Cavenagh, for stealing several head of black cattle, hearing judge Keating speak against skeans, said, Evidence. My lord, when we seized him, we took a skean away from him.

* In the pamphlet mentioned in a note to p. 613, after the case of Price and others, this case is inserted with the title of "The farther Proceedings at the Assizes at Wicklow, in Ireland, being an account of the trial of several felons, &c. March the 6th and 7th, 1688-9."

L. C. J. Sir, How durst you carry such an unlawful weapon?

Cavenagh. My lord, I am a butcher, it was a butcher's knife.

L. C. J. Ay, I do not question but thou canst butcher upon occasion.

One Hicky spoke. My lord, he is no butcher, but one of the greatest rogues in the county round us. I have been in pursuit of him several times.

Cavenagh. He is a murderer, my lord, do not believe him.

Evidence. My lord, it was near ten inches long, thick at the back, and sharp point, every way a skean.

L. C. J. Is that your butcher's knife? You are a great villain, for carrying such a weapon.

Cavenagh. I was ordered to have a skean, my lord.

L. C. J. Pray, sir, who ordered you?

Cavenagh. The priest of the parish.

L. C. J. A priest, sir! [turning to his brother judge] Do you hear that, brother?

Baron Lynch. What priest, sir? What priest? What is your priest's name?

L. C. J. Hold, brother. Come, sir, I shall not ask your priest's name: I believe you will have occasion to see your priest soon, to do you a better office than to advise you to carry skeans. [And looking towards col. Tool, and two priests on the bench, next sheriff Birne.] A priest, gentlemen! A priest is a minister, and a minister of the gospel; his doctrine ought to be peace, for the gospel is a doctrine of peace. When our Saviour came into the world peace was proclaimed; and when he went out of the world he left it for a legacy to his disciples: 'My peace be with you.' And pray, sir, tell your priest so from me when you see him. It is not for priests to arm or animate such villains as you are for mischief. I shall not ask your priest's name.

Clancy, an Irish gentleman. My lord, he belies the priest; he is a rogue.

Cavenagh. I do not. The priests of every parish did give orders to get half-pikes and skeans; and they were getting together in companies in every parish.

L. C. J. Who were they that were gotten together; such fellows as you?

Cavenagh. No, my lord, better men than I; a great many that are here in court.

The Jury withdrawing, and returning soon again, brought Poor and Bowland in guilty, Cavenagh not guilty.

L. C. J. Gentlemen, you have acquitted the greater villain; at your door let it lie.

The Ordinary being called to give Bowland and Poor the book, for their clergy,

L. C. J. Sir, I expect as true a return from you, as if I were there myself. The times are so, that men must forget bowels of mercy. Ordinary, do your duty. What place do you shew them?

Ordinary. My lord, I shew them the fiftieth psalm.

L. C. J. Let them read the fifth verse.*

* Mr. Justice Foster (Crown Law, chap. 7, p. 306) says, that the scrap of Latin called the Neck Verse, which was commonly made the test of reading, was "Miserere mei Deus." I suppose the beginning of the fifty-first psalm.

With respect to the Benefit of Clergy, much learning is to be found in the cases Searle v. Williams, Hob. 288. Armstrong v. Lisle, Kel. 89, 93. Rex v. Burrigge, 3 P. Williams, 439. See, also, in this Collection the Cases of lord Audley, vol. 3, p. 402; of Mary Moders alias Stedman, vol. 6, p. 281; of lord Warwick, A. D. 1699, and of the duchess of Kingston, A. D. 1776. See, also, Foster's Crown Law, Discourse 2, chap. 7, and 4 Black. Comm. chap. 28, of which last, an abridgement is incorporated into the Law Dictionary, article 'Clergy, Benefit of.'

According to Mr. Barrington (Observations on, 4 H. 7), Benefit of Clergy "is properly the 'privilege of learning,' as clergy," says he, "in the old French, signified science; thus, by the old proverb,

'Un poignet de bonne vie
'Mieux vaut qu'un mury de Clergie.'"

Among other particulars, concerning Benefit of Clergy, Mr. Barrington gives us the following:

"Lord Bacon says, that the bishop was to prepare the book, and the judge was to turn to what part he should think proper, vol. ii, p. 378. This contradicts the generally received tradition, which is, that the criminal was tried in reading a particular verse of the Psalms.

'And if they cannot read one verse
'I'th' psalms, must sing it, and that's worse.'

HUDIBRAS.

"An instance is mentioned in Dr. Grey's notes on these lines, of a criminal who obtained this privilege by reading under the gallows.

"Sir Thomas Smith gives this account of the practice in the year 1565, with regard to the prisoner's claiming the benefit of clergy. 'The bishop must send to every gaol delivery a proper commissary. If the prisoner asks his clergy, the judge commonly giveth him a psalter, and turneth to what place he will; the prisoner then readeth as well as he can (God knows often very slenderly); then he asketh the bishop's commissary, legit ut cle-

This is an act of mercy, and I know not why it should not be in Irish rather, the country language. It was formerly in Latin, because the Romish church hath their worship in Latin.

The ordinary returned them both, non legit.

L. C. J. You William Bowland, and you Edmund Poor, you have been arraigned for stealing of cows, two several thefts: it is a great misfortune and sin to be guilty of such

'ricus? The commissary must then answer, 'legit, or, non legit.' Commonwealth of England, p. 94. Lord chief justice Keeling fined a bishop's chaplain in 1665, for reporting that a prisoner could read, who was not able to do so; and upon the second trial he was refused his benefit of clergy." Eden's [the present lord Auckland] Princ. of Pen. Laws, p. 173.

In his Observations on the Statute of Treasons, 25 Edw. 3, Mr. Barrington mentions the article of counterfeiting the King's Great or Privy Seal, "which," says he, "I should not have taken notice of, as this part of the law cannot be more clearly expressed, did not a writ printed in the original French, at the end of some other statutes (Cay's Stat.) of the same year, give us the intimation of a very great neglect in this part of the act, which in some measure seems to countenance an observation made by Carté, that no lawyer sat in this parliament, when this most constitutional statute became a law. This writ mentions a claim made by the clergy, that a clerk, who was convicted of counterfeiting the Great or Privy Seal, or the king's coin, should have his privilege of clergy: to which the king answers, 'that he is too much pressed by business of the greatest importance to decide this point; but that, if any clerk should be convicted of this offence before the next session of parliament (in which he hopes it will be fully discussed), he shall not be executed, but delivered to the ordinary.' It is, therefore, highly probable, that this point must have been before the legislature, and yet nothing is said with regard to the privilege of Clergy. It might be impolitic, indeed, that this claim should have undergone a discussion in parliament at this time; but as the clergy had, in effect, established this privilege, the opportunity of taking it expressly away should not have been omitted."

Dr. White (Bampton Lectures, Sermon 2) has noticed the gross ignorance which, in very early times, prevailed among the Christian clergy as well as laity, and which we know continued to prevail very long after the period of which he writes, as follows:

"Historians have exhibited to us the most melancholy picture of the universal darkness and ignorance which, at the beginning of the seventh century, had overspread all ranks of men. Even the ecclesiastical orders scarcely afforded an exception to this general descripcrimes at any time; but yours is so much the worse, because it falls in a time when there are such general and vast depredations in the country, that many honest men go to bed possessed of considerable stocks of black and white cattle, gotten by great labour and pains, the industry of their whole lives, and in the morning

tion. Among the bishops, the grand instructors and defenders of the Christian church, few, we are told, could be found whose knowledge and abilities were sufficient to compose the discourses, however mean and incoherent, which their office sometimes obliged them to deliver to the people."—And he proceeds in a Note:

"The want even of a knowledge of the common rudiments of literature was so general among the higher ecclesiastics of those times, that it was scarcely deemed disgraceful to acknowledge it. In the acts of the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon, many examples occur, where subscriptions are to be found in this form: 'I, such an one, have subscribed by the hand of such an one, because I cannot write.' And 'such a bishop having said that he could not write, I whose name is underwritten, have subscribed for him.'"

Alfred (see 1 Hume, 76, edition of 1782), complained that on his accession he knew not one person south of the Thames who could so much as interpret the Latin service; but in the 'Encomium Emmæ,' which seems to have been written about the year 1040, there are, as Mr. baron Maseres has noticed, different allusions and imitations of Virgil and Lucan: and Hume, vol. 3, Note [L] has observed, that the ancient Monkish writers abound in allusions to Latin classics, especially the poets. See, also, what Ingulphus says of his being opposed by queen Egitha, Historiæ Anglicanæ Selecta Monumenta, p. 110, and the allusion by Ordericus Vitalis to the story related by Suetonius and Lucan, of the mutiny at Placentia quelled by Julius Cæsar, p. 227, of the same work. See, too, Barrington, Observations on Statutum de Marlebridge (52 H. 3), cap. 27; and on the Confirmation of the Charters, 25 Ed. 1.

For proof of the excessive ignorance of the clergy, see Espencæus and Hakewill's "Apologie or Declaration of the Power and Providence of God," as referred to in the Biographia Britannica, art. Basinge (John).

Mr. Barrington much doubts whether the parochial clergy could read in the reign of Edward the first. See Observations on 25 Ed. 1. See, too, Nouveau Traite de Diplomatie, vol. 1, p. 377, as there referred to. And Barrington's Obs. on, 1 Hen. 5.

The case, mentioned by Barrington after lord Auckland, seems to have been that, of which lord chief justice Kelyng himself gives the following report:

"Lent Circuit, 18 Car. 2, [A. D. 1666.]

"At the assizes at Winchester, the clerk ap-when they arise not any thing left them, but turned out of all, to go a begging, all being taken away by rebels, thieves and robbers, the sons of violence, that make every thing they lay their hands on their own. On this side the Cape of Good Hope, where are the most brutish and barbarous people we read of, there pointed by the bishop to give clergy to the prisoners, being to give it to an old thief; I directed him to deal clearly with me, and not to say legit, in case he could not read; and thereupon he delivered the book to him, and I perceived the prisoner never looked upon the book at all, and yet the bishop's clerk, upon the demand of legit or non legit, answered legit; and thereupon I wished him to consider, and told him I doubted he was mistaken, and bid the clerk of the assizes ask him again, legit or non legit; and he answered again, something angrily, legit. Then I bid the clerk of the assizes not to record it: and I told the parson, he was not the judge whether he read or no, but a ministerial officer to make a true report to the court; and so I caused the prisoner to be brought near, and delivered him the book, and then the prisoner confessed he could not read; whereupon I told the parson he had reproached his function, and unpreached more that day, than he could preach up again in many days; and because it was his personal offence and misdemeanor, I fined him five marks, and did not fine the bishop, as in case he had failed to provide an ordinary." Kelyng's Reports, p. 51.

I am not aware of any direct evidence, that the judges made a practice of taking upon themselves to select, from among the persons convicted of clergyable offences, particular individuals, with regard to whom the ordinary was to be "directed to deal clearly;" and the existence of such a practice is not to be inferred from the conduct of Kelyng in the case which he has reported as above. (With respect to judicial discretionary powers of such a nature, see the excellent speech of sir Samuel Romilly,* Cobb. Parl. Debates, 1810.) Sir Thomas Raymond, mentioning the death of Kelyng, characterises him as a 'resolute' judge; and, indeed, it does appear, that his resolution greatly surpassed his discretion, his moderation, and his observance of the rules both of law and of decency. See in this Collection, vol. 6, pp. 992, et seq. and the Case of Flower, as there referred to.

See, too, p. xcviij, of Mr. Hargrave's learned Preface to lord Hale's Treatise on the Jurisdiction of the Lords' House of Parliament.

By Stat. 5 Ann. c. 6, the benefit of clergy shall be granted to all those who are entitled to ask it, without requiring them to read: and thus the 'idle ceremony of reading,' as Foster expresses it, is abolished.

* The speech of sir S. Romilly is that which he published in 1810, under the title of 'Observations on the Criminal Law of England.'

is none like the people of this country: nor so great a desolation as in this kingdom, at this day any where to be found, and particularly in this county. It is come to that pass, that a man that loses the better part of his substance, chooses rather to let that, and what he has besides go, than come to give evidence: and why? Because he is certain to have his house burnt, and his throat cut, if he appears against them. Good God! what a pass are we come to! For what has any man, if the stronger hand can take it from him? It is better to live under no law, than in such a place. We have lived to see twenty-nine years of peace pass over our heads, and I have sat on this bench before now. I pray God that my lenity, and others, has not given encouragement to these thieves and robbers. There may be a rogue in the court, or one that is evilly inclined (I know none), but take notice of this, the government is at length tired with mercy; they see it does no good, and examples and punishments of this kind are not intended so much in a great part for the punishment of the offender, as for discouraging of others, to make them take warning by their example, that, seeing what evil courses bring men to, they may reform.

I will not take up time to tell you how the benefit of clergy came; whether in the room of the cities of refuge that were in the old times. I know that restitution was, under the Jewish law, sufficient satisfaction: and if the thief could not make restitution, he was to be sold for a slave, and the money given to the party. But as the world grows old it grows worse, and those lenitives signify nothing for preventing thieving and robbery, for thieves and robbers are like a gangrene in the commonwealth; they are worse than drones in the hive. I cannot tell myself, that under the circumstances we are in, I should advise to pardon any that are taken in this general depredation that we are under; and therefore you Bowland and Poor, that might have lived as safely under the laws as the biggest man in the kingdom, and none of your fellow subjects durst lay his hand upon you, but he was liable to answer for it: and thus you might have lived to a fair old age, and ended your days in peace; but you have chosen the quite contrary, for the law provides likewise for the punishment of wicked and offending persons, among which number you are found by a jury of twelve able men of your country; and therefore the sentence of the law is this,

‘That you be both, and each of you, taken from this place, to the place from whence you came, and there your irons to be struck off, and from thence to the place of execution, and there you shall be hanged by the neck till you are dead, and the Lord have mercy upon your souls.’

And now let me give you advice: your time is short, spend it well, and flatter not yourselves with the hopes of a reprieve or pardon: and for you, Poor, you have shortened the work of your life; you have gone a great way towards heaven, if that restitution you made was out of conscience. Mr. Sheriff, let them have a confessor sent to them, for Saturday is the day of their execution.

‘The women, their friends, setting up their cry in the court,’

The Copy of a Protection or Pass, given by an Irish officer to some notorious robbers of the county of Wicklow.

“I James Byrne, ensign to captain Charles Byrne, do hereby certify to you, Terlagh Kelly, Patrick Byrne, and Patrick M’Teige, and William Doyle, to save you harmless from any misdemeanors whatsoever. As witness my hand this 24th of April, 1689.

“JAMES BYRNE.”

The following Letter being sent by the Lord-deputy to the judges of Assize, was read in court to the grand-jury, &c.

By the Lord-deputy General, and general Governor of Ireland.

“After our hearty commendations, we greet you well. As his majesty was graciously pleased to entrust us with the government of this his kingdom, so upon the invading of England, and upon receiving certain information, that the prince of Orange doth intend also to invade this realm, we have, for the defence thereof, raised a considerable army, far above what could be maintained by the king’s revenue at the best of times, and when the trade of this country was in the most flourishing condition. This we have done by the king’s command, to support his regal authority, crown and dignity, and to preserve the lives, liberties and properties of all his liege people within this kingdom. And since our dangers are at hand, and that we may daily expect the landing of an enemy, who intends the subversion of his majesty’s government, and the total destruction of all his good subjects here, we find ourselves under an absolute necessity to keep the king’s army still on foot, in order to our preservation from the approaching dangers. And though we have hitherto with all the care and industry imaginable, and by the generous concurrence of the officers, supported the new-raised forces without being a burthen to any of his majesty’s people; yet considering the decay of trade, the great fall of the revenue in these distracted times, the great charges the officers have been at in subsisting men, it cannot be expected that the standing forces can hereafter be maintained without supplies. And since the same cannot be done by parliament, we cannot think of a more effectual expedient, than by voluntary subscriptions, by way of loan, from the people; which, if generously done, with what may be made of the revenue, may support the army, and will stop all the disorders that may be committed by the soldiers, which we shall always endeavour to prevent with all the care and industry possible. By this, husbandry may go on as formerly, and we shall be in a capacity to form the army, so as that, with the assistance of Almighty God, we do not doubt to put this kingdom in a perfect posture of defence. We do therefore pray your lordships to recommend this weighty matter effectually at the open assizes in every county when you sit, to all the inhabitants of such counties, and to appoint the respective sheriffs of such counties to procure voluntary subscriptions, by way of loan, from the inhabitants of such counties, of some certain sum of money from each, to be subscribed to their names, to be afterwards satisfied by them respectively, in money, wheat, oats or oatmeal, towards the maintenance of the army, to be paid in, or delivered to the respective sheriffs, or their order, and in such places as the said sheriffs shall respectively appoint, from whom we expect an account of their proceedings herein, and a copy of such subscriptions as shall be made. We do not doubt but every true and loyal subject will, according to his ability, and the excellency of the subject matter, generously and cheerfully contribute towards the carrying on of so great, so necessary, and so glorious a work. We expect your diligent care herein, and so we bid you heartily farewell.

“Your very loving friend,
“From his Majesty's Castle “TYRCONNEL.” of Dublin, March 2, 1688.”

An Answer to the foregoing Letter being drawn up by the Grand Jury and entered into their book, and presented to sir Henry Lynch, setting forth the extreme poverty of their country, occasioned by the daily ruin of the English, &c. that they were not in a capacity to subsist themselves, and therefore not capable to raise any thing considerable for the army (chief justice Keating returning to Dublin, and leaving baron Lynch to go on to the other counties, &c.) the said Lynch told the Grand Jury, before he discharged them, that the writing they had drawn up, was a reflection and scandal to their country, would be taken very ill by the government, and did not question but it would be brought in hereafter as an evidence against them, and therefore ordered it should be torn out of the book; which was done accordingly.

A gentleman, taken by sheriff Power and the Irish army, with the rest of the prisoners condemned at Galloway, having made his escape for England, writ the following Letter to a friend his relation:

“Dear Brother,

“The excuse that I offer for my not writing is this, that my thoughts were so taken up, what with the misery I apprehended my poor helpless father, mother, wife, and children (which are all dear almost alike to me) were in, and an endeavour to procure some employ, whereby I should keep them, if they could make their escape, and myself from perishing; God is all-sufficient, who, I doubt not, will provide for us, if we make but a right use of our afflictions. It was my fortune to meet with some friends, that promised, the first men that should be raised, to procure me some employ; but when that will be, is so uncertain, and to live a drone amongst my friends (who are almost in the same circumstance with myself) I looked upon to be so much below a man, that I chose rather to list myself a private centinel, whereby I proposed to be in the road (if my friends missed) to hew out some preferment in the mean time: As to my private condition, since it pleases God to bless me with health, I hope to rest satisfied. Yet I entertain hopes of a merry hunting-bout of my countrymen, of which sport I had a little relishing taste, which serves to sharpen a greedy stomach, that longs to revenge the murder of my dear sister Burdett, and their outrages to my friends.

“I never knew what sorrow was, till I had the account of my sister's death at that dismal gate of Liscarrol; it seemed such to me, for while I staid at it, I made my observation that there was not the least noise, as if all were dead. The apprehension of which did so overwhelm me, that oft on the road (not thinking what I did) I burst out into exclamations, charging myself with being the occasion of bringing my poor aged father, mother, wife, and family, if not to an untimely death, yet to sorrow and misery; which (to aggravate the crime) I looked upon to be the worst condition of the two. When I reached Moyallow, though many endeavoured to divert me, and I apprehended they might apply it to my cowardice, yet I was not able to lift up my spirits, but being put to bed, where I had the benefit of an hour's troublesome sleep, the next morning I resolved to think of nothing but revenge, but having an account of captain Boiles surrendering, which left us without hopes of making any head in Munster, sir Thomas Southwell, capt. Purdon, and about one hundred more of us, resolved to make our way to Sligo. The first day we met with no opposition, and at night baited at a widow's house about six or ten miles from Limerick, where we staid for three or four hours, then mounting with the moon, we marched on; early next morning, capt. Mills overtook us with a party of horse, soon after riding near a strong castle, with a large bawn well walled in; we understood it was fortified by English, where we took an opportunity to refresh our horses, upon which there went a rumour, that my lord of Clare had taken the castle, which made the sparks of the country think them happiest that could reach us first, to share in the plunder. Having advice of it, we drew up near the gate, to receive about 20 horse, that were riding full speed to us; but when they perceived the mistake, they hung their ears, tamely suffering us to disarm and dismount them; but at the request of the garrison who were loath to leave their families, and understanding by us the state of the country, which might well make them despair of holding out, that they might fare the better, we returned both horses and arms. Thence we marched towards Brian's-bridge, the roads being very bad, we rid scattering, the front at least a mile from the rear, which a party of dragoons perceiving, lay in ambush, and as we moved by, they made about 12 shot at us altogether, which by God's providence did no hurt, most of us that were there being armed with back, breast, and head-pieces; but we soon answered them in their own language, each man firing both his pistols and carbine, before we stirred out of the place, which proved fatal to some of them, two being killed, and a third wounded, which made the rest imagine we were angry, and rudely, without begging our pardon, they run away, but (to little purpose) we imprudently hunted them for two or three hours, their horses being fresh, they got off clear; only one of our bullets happening to overtake the cornet's horse, gave his master an opportunity to exercise his feet for three or four miles with us. The next opposition we met with, was at the bridge in the county of Clare, the end of it being fortified with a strong gate, and near it two houses that commanded each side, but the cowardly soldiers were easily persuaded to set it open, upon our promise that we would do them no hurt, but on the other hand they were threatened (if they did not) to be cut with the gate in pieces. Thence we made towards Killalow, where a company of foot was quartered; when they perceived us coming near, they would fain have fortified themselves in the cathedral, but the poor old bishop refused the key, for which I fear he has sufficiently suffered. Then they bethought themselves to send a messenger to know what we would be at: our answer was, that we designed to hurt none that desired to be peaceable, which they made a promise to be, whereupon we did resolve to make that our stage for that night, so that every man's business was only to find the best quarters he could for himself and his horse. It was my luck to hit where I met a friend, and yet a Papist, who was extremely importunate that I should waive the thoughts of going any further on my design, urging that he did not doubt to make such friends as would protect me and mine with our substance; but if I would not be ruled, my undertaking was so rash, that he feared the next would be of my being hanged or killed among the rest. My reply (with thanks for his kindness) was, that I would make even that doom my choice, rather than it should be said, I flinched for fear; still he was more urgent, till, in short, I gave him to understand, I was so far from having any thoughts of returning home (where I thought I could be no better than a pissing-post to every cur), that if I were at that instant there, I would make it my business, if I could find out any possibility of compassing it, to overtake the party I was then in. Then finding how I was bent, he charged me not to offer to stay there that night, for that, notwithstanding his promise, the captain sent an express to Limerick, and that he did not question but about midnight they would be upon us, which when I acquainted sir Thomas with, we resolved upon a further march. While some were getting ready, others took occasion to disarm a guard that had the bishop's horses in their custody, which trouble we eased them of; Mr. Hawkins the clergyman's brother, and some of the bishop's servants, went along with us. The arms, according to our promise, we returned, and taking the bishop's blessing, we went that night to Mr. Purdon's, near the Shannon side. As soon as we alighted, I advised sir Thomas to procure a trusty servant of the house to go to Killalow to give us an account if there should any follow us thence, and then William Southwell and I stole to bed, but as soon as we had the benefit of the moon, we made ready to move forward, fearing that our enemies should break Scarriff-bridge, there being a company of them in Tomgreny Castle. Next day, James Power, who is high sheriff of the county of Galloway, having an account the day before of our march that way, he raised the country, and riding out upon the hills as a spy, perceived how our men, as well as our horses, were almost beaten out, and how we were at a loss for the road, which made him so kind as to place guides (for they secured what English there were in the country), but with directions to carry us to a certain pass, where not above two could ride at a time, near which they lined a ditch on the right hand with a company of foot; on the other, behind a rising ground, lay another company, in the midst against the pass they drew up a troop of horse with some volunteers. When they were perceived by us at a distance, we resolved to put the best face on it that we could, and when we came up to the spot, we drew up and shouted, which made the volunteers flinch back, and some run quite away. They made proposals of a composition, which at first were refused, but upon second thoughts, considering (our horses being so harassed) the best way was to fight on foot, and that when our shot should be spent, the rabble (who were at least 2,000) would be worse upon us than those of the army. We agreed to the conditions, which were these, That we should deliver all our horses and arms that were musterable, except those that the gentlemen among us then rid, and their pistols and swords; and that our servants should have sufficient nags given them instead of theirs, and that they should give us passes, and procure us protections, and send us a convoy, if desired. The grey horse was so beaten, that I was forced to alight, and lead him to the front, where I was resolved to appear, though on foot; but there were but few in the company that performed so well, till about half an hour before the rabble falling upon our rear (some of them being so besotted for want of rest, that they fell off their horses) they shot one Morgan

Williams in the head, who lately was a student in Dublin-college, whereupon lieutenant Chinery, myself, and about half a dozen more of us faced about, and making at them, they run away, being at least 400 in number, in which pursuit, the poor grey, making what speed he could in a stony place, came down on all four with such force, what with the weight of my iron doublet, cap, and other lumber, that I thought he had broken all his bones as well as mine; but I soon scrambling up, gave him my helping hand, which was hardly sufficient to get him on his feet, for he was almost quite spoiled with it. When I have the same advantage of my countrymen (which I do not yet despair of) I'll return you as good or better horses than your own, with thanks; in the mean time, the latter is all the reward I can give you. That night, for convenience of lodging, we went to Loghreagh, which was their quarters, where we slept without rocking. The next day, instead of a convoy, they secured us with strong guards at the gates, flattering us that they dared not let us go till they knew the pleasure of the government, and that they would write by their quarter-master so favourably on our behalf, that they did not in the least question, but that our conditions should be performed to a tittle; but I soon smelt out their treachery, which made me resolve to venture on making my escape while I had the liberty of the town; but my friends often dissuaded me from it, still hoping the best, and judging it both hazardous and impossible to be done, for that the very countrymen, as well Irish as English, could not stir a mile without passes. The fourth day I could not brook the haughty looks of the villains any longer, which made me resolve to go on with my design that evening; but about half an hour before the appointed time, unexpectedly one Mahony, who is now a captain in the army, altogether a stranger to me, whispered me in the ear, that he would carry me off to sir Henry Waddington's, who engaged him so to do, being formerly his servant. I was glad to carry my captain's coat under my arm, and lead his horses out of the gate, which I looked on to be the best employment that ever I had; but while I was at sir Henry's, I had the honour to pass for the captain's cousin, and by his name. I had several narrow escapes afterwards, which would be too tedious to write. In three or four days after, from sir Henry's, I had the sad prospect of my friends march towards Galloway-gaol, who, as I was credibly told, had severe usage, and were all condemned to be hanged and quartered; but the late king James landing about that time, their execution was deferred; but it proved no benefit to one Brown, a gentleman of 100*l.* a year near Moyallow; he was of our company, but the last state day we had, whether his horse tired, or he had a desire to run all hazards with his wife and six children, which he left behind, making his way homeward, he was taken, and sent to Limerick, from thence to Cork, where the first gracious act the king did, was to see him hanged and quartered. However, at the request of some friends, he strained his conscience to grant sir Thomas and the rest a reprieve, which was sent to Galloway by John Raines, a merchant of Moyallow, who was employed by the gentlemen to follow the king to Dublin, with letters to their friends to make interest for their pardons. He happily took Cloghstokin in his way, where I was preferred fortunately to his service, and gravely carried his cloak-bag behind me to Dublin. The embargo being taken off, the first fair wind I set sail, and just as I was ready to go, I met a friend that told me Mr. Handcock was in town, and that he desired to see me, which immediately I made my business, and finding him in his chamber, was very civilly received by him, but we had not many words together, because of other friends that flocked in, some with the news of fresh losses in his stock, which he gave a patient ear to, declaring, that he did not reckon upon any as his own. My time being short, I told him, that I came just to kiss his hand, and that if I made any stay, I should lose my passage. Then taking my leave, he went to the stair-head, where he kindly pressed two guineas upon me, saying, 'That of a little I must take a little,' for that he judged my hurry from home might hinder me from providing money. It was a seasonable kindness, and shall never be forgot, whilst he lives, that is unfeignedly, your affectionate brother,

"T. W."

 Tho. Warner.

The four last named persons escaped; and Mrs. Katherine Gunn (wife to William Gunn, junior, and daughter to colonel Townsend) was acquitted, because she accompanied her husband, (though mounted and armed as the rest of the party were). And when the enemy appeared so numerous, captain Mylls telling them, gentlemen, we have the sword before, and the gallows behind, she courageously seconded him; giving her advice, rather to fight, and die honourably, than to submit to the mercy of their perfidious enemy: for she had resolved, when she came abroad with her husband, to undergo the greatest hardships and dangers they should meet with, than stay at home, and be subject to the insolent abuses of the unmerciful Irish soldiers. Some whereof coming to the house of a gentleman, one Mr. Burdett, his wife great with child, espying them, endeavoured to shut the door, they forced in upon her, and with their pistols shot her dead.

Sir Thomas, and all the other gentlemen, were condemned to be hanged and quartered: the judge persuading them to rely on the mercy of so gracious a prince, for he did not in the least doubt of their pardon; a reprieve being already sent them, before their trial, persuaded them to comply with it. But to this day they remain under the sentence of condemnation, upon a further reprieve obtained by their friends application to the late king, and promise to get the like number of Papist prisoners sent over from England, in exchange for them.

At Birr, in the King's county, three Protestants condemned to die, viz. Sir Lawrence Parsons, knt. Jonathan Darby, gent. James Rascoe, gent.

The articles that were given to sir Lawrence Parsons, upon the surrender of his own house, were brought in against him at his trial, and was the only evidence whereby they condemned him, there being no other evidence but those articles; the judge declaring it was high-treason to article with the king.

At Mariborough, in the Queen's county, 11 Protestants were condemned to die; two of which were executed, (viz.) Thomas Lewis and George Maxwell, being hanged and quartered: two have since made their escape, (viz.) John Lewis and ——— Flaharty, and are said to be gotten for England. Two brothers of the Lindseys, and some others, died in prison.

After the above-mentioned eleven were condemned, baron Lynch being informed by some person, that the prisoners should say, they durst not put them to death, (if they did, the prince of Orange would revenge their blood) he ordered them to be brought into court in their irons, with ropes about their necks; and examined the jailor, whether he did not hear them say so: he said, he had not heard them say so, since their condemnation: the sheriff taking up the Bible, kissed it, and said, my lord, by the oath I have taken, I heard them say so last night. Upon which Lynch ordered their execution the day following. But their friends, with others, cried out mercy: so Lewis and Maxwell only were executed. Mr. James the minister, and the other six, are reprieved for some time.

365. The Trials of Sir RICHARD GRAHME, bart. Viscount PRESTON, in the Kingdom of Scotland, JOHN ASHTON, and EDMUND ELLIOT, at the Old Bailey, for High Treason: 2 WILLIAM & MARY,* A. D. 1691.

January 16, 1691.

THE king and queen's writ of Habeas Corpora was sent to the governor of the Tower of London, to bring up the bodies of sir Richard Grahme, baronet, viscount Preston, in the kingdom of Scotland; John Ashton and Edmund Elliot, gents. to the Sessions-House in the Old-Bailey, London; where they were brought between the hours of ten and eleven in the forenoon; and being placed at the bar, were arraigned upon an Indictment of High Treason, found the day before by the grand jury for the county of Middlesex, at Hicks's Hall, in manner following:

Clerk of Arraignments. 'Sir Richard

* See 4 Blackst. Comm. p. 361. East's Pleas of the Crown, Chap. 2, Sections 9, 21, 56, 58, 61, and the authorities there referred to.

The Case of Patrick Harding, which happened about this time, involves some points of law which were considered upon these Trials. Harding's Case is reported, 2 Vent. 315, and Holt, 676. Mr. Williams Wynn has furnished me with the following Note of it, which was found among Sir William Williams's MSS.

"Circa Term: Mich. 1 W. & M. att the Sessions in the Ould Baylie:

"Patrick Harding was indicted for high treason, for that he, the 23d November, 1 Will. & M. maliciously and traiterously did compass, imagine, and intend to depose the King and Queen, and also to kill and destroy the said K. & Q.; and that to this end he levied and raised war and rebellion against them, and listed divers souldiers to war against them, and procured these souldiers to gett out of England, to joyn with other enemies and rebels of the K. & Q. and war against them to wage and support.

"Upon this Indictment the petit jury found this ensuing verdict:—That Patrick Harding, to the intent to depose the K. & Q. and deprive them of their royall dignity, and to restore the late K. James, did, for money by him paid, list, hire, raise and procure sixteen

'Grahme, hold up your hand [which he did, 'and so the other two]: You stand indicted by 'the names of sir Richard Grahme, late of the 'parish of St Anne, within the liberty of West-minster, in the county of Middlesex, baronet; 'John Ashton, late of the parish of St. Paul, 'Covent Garden, in the county aforesaid, gentleman; and Edmund Elliot, late of the 'parish of St. James, within the liberty aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, gent. for that 'you, as false traitors against the most illustrious and most excellent princes William and 'Mary, king and queen of England, defenders 'of the faith, &c. your sovereign lord and lady, 'not having the fear of God in your hearts, nor 'weighing the duty of your allegiance, but men, subjects of this kingdom, to fight and wage war against the K. & Q., and them did send out of this kingdom into France, to assist and aid the French king, who then was, and yet is, an enemy to the King and Queen, and in open war, and to joyn themselves with the enemys and rebels of and against the K. & Q. in waging war against the K. & Q.: and if upon this the prisoner is guilty of high treason, we find him guilty; but, if not, then not guilty.

"Nine of the Judges of England mett upon this speciall verdict, whereof seaven were of opinion that this was treason, one that it was not, and one doubted; and it was resolved, "1. That to hire souldiers to joyn with the enemy of the K. & Q. in war against them, to the intent to depose the K. & Q. is high treason.

"2. That declaring by an overt act a design to depose the King and Queen, is an overt act to manifest a conspiracy of their death. Hales' Pl. Cor. 11; 3 Inst. 6, 12. See 29 Hen. 6, cap. 1, being the act of Jack Cade's attainder, and not printed. It was also resolved, that the voluntary confession of the fact before two witnesses, though not upon examination before a magistrate, is sufficient evidence within the statute of 5 E. 6, cap. 11. the latter part of the last section but one, to be given the jury upon the arraignment of the offender. 3 Inst. 25; 2 And. 66."

 ‘ and against the form of the statute in that ‘ case made and provided.’ How say you, sir
 ‘ Richard Grahme, are you guilty of this felony ‘ and high treason whereof you stand indicted, or ‘ not guilty ?

Lord Preston. My lord, I have something humbly to offer to your lordships.

L. C. J. Holt. What is it your lordship would say ?

L. Preston. My lord, I find I stand indicted by the name of sir Richard Grahme, baronet, but I do take myself to be entitled to another way of trial, as being a peer of England, by virtue of a patent before the vote of abdication was made ; and it was in a time when all your processes and all your writs went in the king’s name, and all officers acted by virtue of his commissions. My lord, this is a matter that concerns me in point of life, estate, posterity, and all that is dear to me ; and therefore I desire to know whether your lordships think fit to allow me my peerage ; I offer it, my lord, with all the respect and modesty imaginable.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, I apprehend your lordship to offer against your being tried here, that you are a peer.

L. Preston. I take myself to be so, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, you must make that out to the court.*

L. Preston. I told your lordships the ground of my claim and apprehension : it is from a patent I received before the vote of abdication, when all commissions, and all process, and all the courts of judicature run in that name.

L. C. J. Holt. Where is that patent, my lord ?

L. Preston. It is in the hands of the House of Lords.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord Preston, we cannot take notice of that patent : if your lordship plead that you were made a peer by a patent under the Great Seal of England, you must produce it under the Great Seal, that the court may see what it is, and whether it be sufficient to justify your plea.

L. Preston. I hope your lordship and this court will enable me to do that, by sending an order to the clerk of the House of Lords, to bring the patent hither ; for it is in his hands.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, that is not in our power : if your lordship take yourself to be a peer, and would thereby stop this court from proceeding to try you, you must be ready to make it out.

L. Preston. I am ready to make it out : if I had my patent here, that would make it out.
 Certainly there is some authority now in being (I humbly offer it with all submission and respect) that may order the clerk of the House of Lords to attend this court, and produce this patent.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord Preston, we are not to enable you to plead to the jurisdiction of the court.

L. Preston. My lord, I offer it with all respect to the court : I am concerned in it for my life, and my all, and if that be over-ruled, this I hope you will do before you go on, you will hear me by my counsel.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, it is nothing that you have said ; for if your lordship plead this plea to the jurisdiction of the court, it ought not to be received without shewing your patent.

L. Preston. My lord, I desire my counsel to be heard to this matter.

L. C. J. Holt. I know your lordship has had the benefit of counsel, and I know your counsel must tell you, that what you say goes for nothing, unless you put in your plea, and produce your patent, that the court may judge upon it.

Solicitor General. (Sir John Somers.) My lord, I have observed what my lord Preston has mentioned——

L. Preston. Pray, Mr. Solicitor, will you speak out, that I may hear what you say ?

Sol. Gen. My lord, I say, I have taken notice of what your lordship has offered : it has been most truly observed by the court, that it is your lordship’s part to make good your plea, and it ought not to be expected that any court should help a person to plead to its jurisdiction : but because it should not be pretended that an advantage was taken against the pri-earl of Banbury) in this Collection.

soner for a defect in point of form, or that any thing was insisted on which should have the least appearance of a hardship, that we may proceed in the most clear and unexceptionable manner that can be, I must beg leave to observe to your lordship and the court, how far this matter which my lord Preston has insisted on, has been debated and determined in another place.

L. C. J. Holt. So ; on, Mr. Solicitor.

Sol. Gen. My lord, upon the 11th of November 1689, my lord Preston did make some claim in the House of Lords that he was a peer of the realm. The House of Lords demanding of him upon what he founded his pretence ; he said he claimed by letters patent from the late king James, which passed the Great Seal before the time of the vote of abdication. The lords required that those letters should be produced, which being done, and my lord Preston insisting upon his claim to be a peer of England, the lords thought fit that day to commit my lord Preston to the custody of the Black Rod. The next day being the 12th of November, upon solemn debate of the validity of these letters patents, and consulting with the judges then present, the lords, nemine contradicente, did adjudge and declare those letters patents to be void and null : and by another order of the same date, they did order Mr. Attorney General to prosecute my lord Preston in the King's Bench for a high misdemeanor, in presuming to claim peerage by those letters patents. And by a third, it was ordered, that the letters patents should remain in custody of the clerk of the parliament. Thus you see, my lord, this matter hath had already a solemn determination in a court which had the most proper cognisance and jurisdiction of claims in this nature. And they having pronounced their judgment, I did not think it would have been urged again in this place. I thought it proper to mention these things, to shew how it comes to pass that my lord Preston has not his letters patents to produce, and to satisfy every man that there is no hardship put upon my lord Preston, by trying him here, when he ought to be tried by another judicature. The lords have given judgment against these letters patents, and have ordered that they shall remain in custody of the clerk of the parliament, and my lord Preston is not a stranger to these transactions ; and therefore if my lord's counsel had been of opinion he could have made any use of them, they would have informed him he must have taken another course to have got them, and could not expect this court should make an order for him, contrary to the order of the House of Lords, to take the letters patents out of the hands of the clerk of the parliament, and this, to help him to a plea against their own jurisdiction. I omitted one thing, that upon the 27th of the same month of November, upon my lord Preston's humble submission and petition, his lordship was discharged of his imprisonment, and the House of Lords were pleased to remit the order given to Mr. Attorney, for prosecuting him in the King's-Bench for the misdemeanor : so that I cannot but wonder to hear of this claim of peerage after that submission. But there is nothing offered to the court by my lord, that the court can take any legal notice of. If my lord will plead any thing to the jurisdiction of the court, he ought to have his plea in form, and be ready with his proofs to make it good.

Serj. Thompson. My lord Preston, upon this last order of the House of Lords, has disclaimed any right of peerage when he made his petition, otherwise he had not been discharged.

L. Preston. My lord, I beg leave—

Serj. Thompson. Besides, my lord, what my lord Preston offers is a matter of record, as all letters patents are ; and though out of his hands, he might have had recourse to the record of the enrolment.

L. Preston. For that, my lord, I must humbly beg of your lordships a little time to put myself in a capacity to plead it in form. If you will over-rule it, I can say nothing to it ; I offer it with all the modesty and respect imaginable.

L. C. J. Holt. It shall do your lordship no prejudice, my lord : God forbid but that you should make use of all advantages that you can invent for your defence ! But, my lord, we must tell you, what you have offered is nothing that we can take any notice of, unless you had your patent to produce ; and we cannot give your lordship time to plead to the jurisdiction of the court.

L. Preston. Then if your lordships are pleased to over-rule this matter, I submit ; but I hope you will give me leave to make all the just defence I can make for myself. Does your lordship over-rule me in it ?

L. C. J. Holt. I suppose we are all of the same opinion ; if not, I suppose they will declare their minds.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. That which has been said by Mr. Solicitor, was only that you and all the world may be satisfied, that there is nothing of hardship put upon you. But the court, if this had not been said, yet could take no notice of what you say, unless it were pleaded, and pleaded in legal form. But if the matter be as the king's counsel have represented it, that this patent you now pretend to have, hath already had its determination in a proper place ; this court, which is an inferior court to that of the lords in parliament, cannot intermeddle with it. We cannot help you, nor can we set up what was condemned there. So that you can entertain no hope or expectation of our doing any thing for you in this matter, or any relief or help by such a plea.

L. C. Baron. (Sir Robert Atkins.) My lord Preston, you may remember (I am sure some of us that were there present do) that you did decline further insisting upon this matter in the House of Lords ; and thereupon you had that great favour from the House shewn you, as the king's counsel have opened.

L. Preston. I did decline it, it is true, my lord: when they had declared it a misdemeanor, I made my application to the court, and therein declared I was sorry for having misdeemeaned myself.

Serj. Thompson. If your lordships please, we will read the very orders of the House of Lords, to satisfy my lord Preston, that we put no hardship upon him.

L. Preston. If there be any thing of hardship upon me in this case, it is because I think I have a right to insist upon this matter, and cannot have an occasion or power to have that which I would make my defence by.

L. C. J. Holt. Your lordship shall have a fair trial, if you will please to put yourself in a condition to be tried, by pleading to the indictment.

Baron Lechmere. The lords in parliament have disclaimed you for being a peer, and we cannot make you one.

L. Preston. My lord, I hope your lordships will put no hard thing upon me, but give me leave and your lordships' help to make my defence.

L. C. J. Holt. You shall, by the grace of God, have all the liberty you can desire to make your defence; but you must first plead.

L. Preston. Since your lordships are pleased to over-rule me in this case, I shall say no more of it. I did not intend to offer any thing that might be an offence to the court.

L. C. J. Holt. As I told your lordship before, so I assure you now again, it shall do you no prejudice.

L. Preston. Then, if your lordship please, since the language is different in which the indictment is written, from that in which it was read, and some things may be of different signification in both languages, I desire the indictment may be read in Latin.

L. C. J. Holt. Read it in Latin.

L. Preston. I have one thing to beg of your lordship before it be read.

L. C. J. Holt. What is it you desire, my lord?

L. Preston. My lord, I humbly desire because I cannot retain all the contents in my memory, that my solicitor may have leave to stand by me.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Do you all join in this desire? For if you should each of you severally have it read a great many times over, they that take notes in short-hand may take a copy of it, as it is read, and a copy is not to be allowed.

L. C. J. Holt. If we find they desire to be troublesome, we can over-rule them.

L. Preston. I would be guilty of nothing that may give the court offence, nor offer any thing that should take up the time of the court unnecessarily.

L. C. J. Holt. If they would have it read in Latin, let it be read.

L. Preston. If it be troublesome to the court, I waive it, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. No, we do not think it troublesome.

VOL. XII.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Mr. Ashton, and Mr. Elliot, do you desire to have it read again?

Ashton, Elliot. We all join with my lord, and desire it may be read in Latin.

L. C. J. Holt. Read it. [Which was done.]

Cl. of Arr. 'Juratores pro Domino Rege et Domina Regina, super Sacramentum suum præsentant quod—et contra formam Statuti in eo casu editi et provisi.'

L. Preston. My lord, I am sorry I have taken up so much of your time; I thought the difference of language might have made some mistake, which I thought would be of advantage to me in my trial: and for the same reason, I humbly request you will please to order me a copy of the indictment.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, that we cannot do; it hath been frequently demanded upon these occasions, but always denied. I have always known it denied.

L. Preston. Your lordship will give me leave to say, what your lordship must needs know much better than I: there is a statute in the 46th of Ed. 3. that doth order a copy of any record to any prisoner, or other person, if he demand it: and it has been granted, as I am informed, in other cases, particularly in the case of colonel Sidney.

L. C. J. Holt. No, my lord; it was denied in colonel Sidney's case.

L. Preston. If I mistake, I beg your lordship's pardon. It is a reason in a late law made for the reversal of Mr. Cornish's attainder. The parliament do there say, that it was not a legal trial, because he had not a copy of the indictment, and time given him to prepare for his defence.

L. C. J. Holt. Truly, my lord, I do not know how that matter stands: that reversal of Mr. Cornish's attainder is but a private act of parliament. I never saw it, nor heard it read, nor can we take notice of it. But your lordship is to be tried by the same methods of law that all persons that have gone before you have always been. It has always been the course, that the prisoner should not have a copy of his indictment: colonel Sidney had it not; and I remember, in the case of sir Henry Vane, in the year 1662, he demanded a copy of the indictment, and it was denied him; and it has been constantly denied ever since in such cases.

L. Preston. I humbly desire to know, whether it was not granted in the case of my lord Russel?

L. C. J. Holt. No, indeed, my lord; my lord Russel had it not; I can take it upon me to say that, for I know all the proceedings in that cause.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. No, my lord; never any man had it, in all my experience.

L. C. J. Holt. Some of us that are here were of counsel for my lord Russel at that time; and we did not advise him to demand a copy of the indictment, for we knew he could not have it by law.

L. Preston. I am very tender of taking up your lordships' time unnecessarily, but it stands me upon to do all I can to defend myself; may not I have my counsel heard to that point? because, if it be a point of law, though your lordships are of counsel for the prisoner, yet I beg that I may have my counsel heard to argue it.

L. C. J. Holt. To what point would you have your counsel heard?

L. Preston. To that point, whether I may not have a copy of my indictment, according to the 46th of Ed. 3. That is the point I would have my counsel heard to.

L. C. J. Holt. There is no such statute as your lordship mentions, that gives the prisoner a copy of his indictment.

Mr. Jones. If your lordship please to hear me for my lord Preston—

L. C. J. Holt. Nay, Mr. Jones, you are mistaken in this matter. If my lord himself will shew that there is any such statute, we will consider of it; and if it be a matter that requires debate, we may assign my lord counsel to argue it; but till then counsel are not to be heard. My lord Preston, if your lordship can shew us that statute, pray do.

L. Preston. My lord, I desire none, if it be not so.

L. C. J. Holt. I have heard a discourse concerning such a statute, but I could never find it.

L. Preston. I suppose my solicitor is here with it; there is such a statute, my lord.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. The court over-ruled it in the case of sir Henry Vane.

L. C. J. Holt. And so it was, I remember, in another case; and in none of the trials that have been since king Charles the Second came in, was ever a copy given, that I know or heard of.

Sol. Gen. My lord, this statute that my lord Preston mentions, 46 of Ed. 3, is printed at large in the Preface to my lord Coke's third Report; and has been insisted upon in several cases in the King's-Bench, where the prisoner has desired a copy of his indictment; but a copy has been always denied: and this statute has been taken to extend only to records which may be evidence for the subject.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. 'Twas always ruled, that it did not extend to this matter.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, it is a misconstruction of that statute, that your lordship thinks that it gives the prisoner a copy of his indictment: for that statute says, that all persons shall be free to make use of the public records, and take copies of them, because oftentimes the records are evidences of men's estates, and their titles.

L. Preston. My lord, an indictment, I suppose, is a record?

L. C. J. Holt. But not such a record as is within the intent of that statute.

L. Preston. My lord, I am tender of taking up your lordships' time; but since all that is dear to me is at stake, I desire to this point I may be heard by counsel.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. My lord, I am satisfied

you have had counsel with you; I have heard a great many. Does any one of them tell you, that this has been done? If ever any one of them will come and shew us when it has been done, you say something; but I dare say none of them will, or can. Mr. Jones, there, is as like as any body; but I believe he will not say it ever was done.

L. Preston. My lord, I cannot say my counsel has told me so, but I have read such a statute myself; for it stands me upon it, and I believe there is such a statute, and it will be produced before your lordships. If your lordships will insist upon not allowing me a copy, I desire I may be heard to it by my counsel; for I take it to be a point of law, with humble submission to your lordships.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, we must not hear counsel to debate plain points that have no manner of question in them: it has been always disallowed; and it is a settled point at law, and as plain as any whatsoever, that no copy of an indictment ought to be allowed to a prisoner in felony or treason.

L. Preston. My lord, there is a statute that says, it shall be allowed to all persons to have copies of records, as well for as against the king; and certainly the indictment is a record, and a record of great consequence to me at this time; and though my counsel has not told me when it was done, yet those that I have advised with do say, that the statute is express.

L. C. Baron. If any doubtful words be in such a statute, yet the constant practice must expound it; and since it has been so often denied, nay always, the law is now settled, that it is not within the meaning of that statute.

L. C. J. Holt. We must go in the way of our predecessors; we received the law from them, and must not contradict the received practice or the judges in all ages, nor alter the determinations that have been made in all cases of the like nature.

L. Preston. I hope your lordships intend, and I don't question it, that my trial should be a legal trial. If there be such a statute gives me a copy of the indictment, and the court deny it me, I am not legally tried.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. If you please to name the statute, my lord, it shall be read to you; but you are mistaken if you think there is any thing in that statute that will do your lordship service in this point.

L. C. J. Holt. See the 46th of Ed. 3. Read it.

L. Preston. Here is a copy of the record in court.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. It is not printed, but it is mentioned in the preface to my lord Coke's third Report, and it is mentioned no where but there that I know of; but whether there were any such statute or no, non constat; for it is not printed. But if it be a statute, it does not meddle with things of this nature, such as indictments; for you must consider, my lord, your's is not a case different from all other cases of like nature as to this; but it is the case of all men that are tried as you are to be. And if all people were to have copies of their indictments to make exceptions out of them before they plead, instead of days of gaol delivery, the whole year would not be sufficient, but would be spent before they could be brought to their trial.

L. Preston. My lord, I am to defend myself as I can by law, and not to consider what other people's cases are. It is my particular case now; what the case may be as to any other hereafter, or what the general consequence may be, is not to be considered; but if there be any thing that is legal, that can give me an advantage in making my defence, I know your lordships are too just to hinder me from taking advantage of it.

L. C. Baron. My lord, it is no new thing to demand it; it has been frequently demanded, but it has been always over-ruled.

L. Preston. My lord, it is now desired, and a reason is given you that perhaps was not given before: there is such a law. My lord chief justice says well, it is not printed, but it is a record, and there is a copy of that record in court. I desired there should be, I am sure.

L. C. J. Holt. If you have a copy of any record of an act of parliament, it shall be read, if it be proved.

L. Preston. Nay, we offer nothing if we do not prove it; but there is such a record, and the Solicitor is ready to attest it. Pray swear Mr. Whitaker.

Serj. Thompson. Swear him.

Cl. of Arr. You shall true answer make to all such questions as shall be demanded of you by the court. So help you God. Is this a true copy?

Mr. Whitaker. It is a true copy.

L. C. J. Holt. Where did you examine it?

Mr. Whitaker. My lord, it is a true copy of the record; I examined it at Mr. Pettyt's office in the Tower.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Upon what number roll is it?

Mr. Whitaker. There is the number roll and all upon the book.

Clerk reads. 'Item pria les Commons que come recorde & queconque chose en la court le roy de reason devoient demurrer illeques pur perpetual evidence & eide de tous partie a ycelly & de tous ceux a queux en nul man-ner illis atteignent quant, mestier leur fuit. Et ja de nouvel refusent en la court nostre dit seignior de serche ou evidence encountre le roy ou disadvantage de luy. Que please os deiner per estatute que serche & exemplification soit faitz as toutz gentz de queconque recorde que les touche en ascun manner auxy bien de ce que chiet encountre le roy come autres gentz. Le roy le voet.'

L. C. J. Pollexfen. It is only copies of records that they shall have for evidence.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord Preston, your lordships hears by this record, you may as well pray that an exemplification be made of this indictment as a copy; for so the words of this act run; it is only meant of those records that were to be given in evidence. But this indictment that you would have a copy of, is not now to be given in evidence, nor to be exemplified, and so it does not reach your case.

L. Preston. My lord, this indictment is a record, and a record against me, and I think it is given in evidence against me.

Mr. J. Eyres. No, my lord, it is no evidence, but an accusation; it is no proof at all.

L. Preston. It is always sworn unto.

Mr. J. Eyres. The witnesses are sworn that testify the matter of it to the grand jury, but the indictment itself is no evidence.

L. C. J. Holt. Suppose a statute be doubtful, as truly I do not take this to be, we are to expound the statute as it has been expounded in all ages. It was never thought by any judges in any reign, that this statute did entitle a prisoner to have a copy of his indictment, but always held the contrary.

L. Preston. Will your lordship be pleased then to allow me counsel to be heard to it?

L. C. J. Holt. No, my lord, not counsel in a plain case: if the court apprehend there is any matter that may be debateable, or whereupon a doubt may be made, we may assign counsel, and shall; but never in a plain case, where there is no manner of question.

L. Preston. My lord, here is a doubt in this case.

L. C. Baron. But, my lord, it's not the doubt of the prisoner, but the doubt of the court, that will occasion the assigning counsel.

L. Preston. But the prisoner may offer his doubt to the court, and your lordships are so just, that you will take care that the doubt may be legally resolved.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, it is our duty to see justice and right done, and, God willing, it shall be.

L. Preston. And I am bound in duty to myself, in such a case, to insist upon all advantages I can have by law.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, nobody blames you, though your lordship do urge things that are unnecessary, or improper; and we shall take care that it shall not tend to your lordship's prejudice. We consider the condition you are in; you stand at the bar for your life; you shall have all the fair and just dealings that can be; and the court, as in duty bound, will see that you have no wrong done you.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. My lord Preston, for this thing that you now mention, in all ages, in all our books, it is the same thing, and has been in all men's cases, that have been for their lives, denied; and this statute that you bring is quite of another intent; for it is said, the records shall remain in court for perpetual evidence, and the aiding of all persons to whom they shall belong. My lord, this is none of your case; for God knows, you expect no aid from this indictment: but this is meant of all copies that concern the estates of men, that they may have recourse to their records to make out their evidences to their estates, or to have them exemplified under the seal of the court for evidence: but to have a copy of an indictment, thereby to be enabled to consult with counsel how to make exceptions to that indictment, is a thing that has been denied in all ages, by all the judges that ever were. If any one can say to the contrary, it were something; but shall we now admit counsel to debate a thing that has been in all ages denied, and never admitted so much as once? That cannot be expected from us.

L. Preston. The act says, that it shall be all records that shall be in aid to any person that shall desire it. Here is no distinction made of what kind the records are to be. If it be for the aid of any person, it ought to be granted, and I may be aided by this record, if I have a copy of it; and I think it is hard, when I am so much concerned in this record, that I cannot be helped to it by this law.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Constant experience has gone according to what we say.

L. Preston. If that be law, and it has not been demanded, then they are not entitled to have the benefit of it: but now I demand it, sure it is good law.

L. C. J. Holt. It is no question a good law, but not applicable to your lordship's case: I suppose we are all of the same opinion; if any think otherwise, I desire they would speak.

L. Preston. My lord, I submit to the court, but then I desire one thing. You know my life, my fortune, my reputation, my posterity, and all are at a stake, and all that is dear to me must fall with me if I miscarry: therefore I take leave to represent, that I have had very short notice of my trial. I do assure you, I have not had above six or seven days notice: I hope you will not refuse me a little longer time before I come to my trial; and I have had no copy of the jury yet.

Sol. Gen. If my lord please to plead to the indictment, that will be time enough to move afterwards, and till issue is joined, it cannot properly be moved for.

L. C. J. Holt. It is not proper to desire time yet, till you have put yourself upon your trial, by pleading to the indictment.

L. Preston. It was granted in colonel Sidney's case, he had eight or ten days granted him after he had pleaded; and in the act for the reversal of Mr. Cornish's attainder, it is given as one cause for the reversal, that he had not time to prepare for his defence.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, seven days is very fair notice. Your lordship knew when the sessions would be, and your lordship might reasonably expect, that you should be tried here: I think truly you have had very fair notice.

Mr. Ashton. My lord, we have had seven days notice of our trial, it is true. This day sevennight, at night, we had notice we were to be tried as this day; but three of the seven we had not the liberty of seeing any friend, or counsel, or any body, not till Tuesday night, and that we got with great application, and great charge to get an order for counsel to come to us: so that though we had seven days notice, yet we have had but three days in all to consult with any body; and we never had a copy of our jury till this minute.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. We see the nature of the thing, and I am sorry that I must say it is fit that we should take notice of it. Perhaps the thing that you are accused of is not true; but if it be true, you see what it is, that there are letters and papers preparing for a design to set all the kingdom in confusion. Men that will venture upon such sort of things, are not to condemn the law, if it be a little hard upon them; for it is the common preservation that is principally aimed at in prosecutions of this nature; and if this accusation be true, it is but just and reasonable, that all speed should be used to inquire into, and prevent it; and as it falls out in this case, it is not in our power to do it. This sessions is set before this business is known, and this is an act done in this county, and therefore the sessions is the proper place for the trial; and so you have the same sort of proceedings that all other criminals have, which are very many, though I hope not many of so high a nature. Seven days notice you have had, you acknowledge; if my lords please we will indulge you as far as we can, and give you time for your trial till to-morrow, but you must plead presently.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, we debate the time of your trial too early; for you must put yourself upon your trial first, by pleading.

L. Preston. My lord, I hope I shall always carry myself as becomes me towards the court; but I do not really think that you have any trials that are of so great concernment, and this sure is a fit time for me to offer it; for it may be I have a great many witnesses in the country, and at distance from this place, and one another.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, we cannot dispute with you concerning your trial, till you have pleaded. I know not what you will say to it, for aught I know there may be no occasion for a trial. I cannot tell what you will plead; your lordship must answer to the indictment before we can enter into the debate of this matter.

L. Preston. Will your lordship give me leave to move it afterwards?

L. C. J. Holt. You may offer any thing then concerning your trial: if you can shew any reason to defer it, it will be proper to do it then.

L. Preston. Truly, my lord, I think one reason why my trial ought to be put off is, because I have privilege of excepting against so many of my jury; but if I have not time to look into the pannel, I shall lose that privilege.

L. C. J. Holt. We are not come to that yet, you are to plead now.

L. Preston. Then your lordships are pleased to over-rule my claim of peerage.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, we are of opinion you ought to plead to this indictment.

Clerk of Arr. What says your lordship, are are you guilty of this high treason, or not guilty?

L. Preston. Not guilty.

Clerk of Arr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

L. Preston. By God and my country.

Cl. of Arr. God send you a good deliverance.—John Ashton, What sayest thou? Art thou guilty of the same high treason, or not guilty?

Mr. Ashton. My lord, I have only this to observe, besides what my lord Preston has offered: as to the business of the act of parliament, your lordships have been pleased to over-rule that plea; but, my lord, I am told, that if an indictment be faulty but even in a letter, we cannot be found guilty upon that indictment. Now, if we never have a copy of that indictment, how shall we know whether there be any such fault in it? Your lordships, who are our counsel, I suppose have never seen the indictment, and suppose there be twenty faults, we have not the advantage of them, by not having a copy; and how shall we come to have any advantage, if neither your lordships, who are our counsel, nor we ourselves, can see them. It may turn upon that.

L. C. J. Holt. But we will see it when you come upon your trial.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. That is a misinformation, for it may be such a letter as is not material, and it may be such as is material; as I suppose, your name being Ashton, the A should be left out, it would then be a question, what there would be to charge you.

Ashton. We know that it has been so in several instances.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. It may be such an omission that may make it no crime, but we must not presently conclude that it is so; but you have heard it read, and so have we; if there had been any such letter mistaken, it would have been taken notice of.

Ashton. As to the reading, there may in the reading of the indictment be many words not nicely observed. I suppose the indictment be right; I say it is possible it may, or it may not; but if your lordship never see it, who are our counsel by law, nor you will allow us counsel to look into it, if there be forty faults in it, we have no advantage of it.

L. C. J. Holt. We must not allow you counsel to pick holes in the indictment; that never was done. If you assign any reason, we may assign you counsel to debate any matter of law that may arise; but never was counsel allowed to find out faults in an indictment. When you come to your trial we shall try you upon your indictment, and if there be any thing considerable, you are to suppose we shall observe it for your advantage.

Ashton. My lord, we never had a copy of the pannel of our jury. I pray we may have it.

L. C. J. Holt. That you cannot have till you have pleaded.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Ashton, we have over-ruled my lord Preston about a copy of the indictment: do you think we shall grant it you, when we have denied it him?

Ashton. My lord, I desire we may have a copy of the pannel.

L. C. J. Holt. You must plead first.

Cl. of Arr. Are you guilty of the high treason, or not guilty?—Ashton. Not guilty.

Cl. of Arr. How will you be tried?

Ashton. By God and my country.

Cl. of Arr. God send you a good deliverance.—Edmund Elliot, how say you, Are you guilty of the same high treason, or not guilty?

Elliot. Not guilty.

Cl. of Arr. How will you be tried?

Elliot. By God and my country.

Cl. of Arr. God send you a good deliverance.

L. Preston. My lord, I hope now it may be time to pray that my trial may be deferred.

L. C. J. Holt. Why would you have it deferred?

L. Preston. Because of the distance of my witnesses, and other things that would be necessary for me to have to prepare me for my defence; and besides, we have not had a copy of the pannel of our jury, and the reason of the law does order, that because it gives us liberty to except against them, and that we cannot know how to do, unless we inform ourselves of the men; and therefore I beg that I may have a copy of the pannel.

L. C. J. Holt. As for having a copy of the pannel, the court grants it. Let them have a copy of the pannel.

Cl. of Arr. Here is one ready for you.

Sol. Gen. There was direction given that there should be one ready.

Ashton. We have demanded it every day since we had notice of our trial.

L. C. Baron. You could not have it till there was an issue joined, and that could not be till you had pleaded.

L. C. J. Holt. And as to the putting off your trial, I know not to what time to put it off.

L. Preston. My lord, I am willing to have this matter tried as soon as possible, for it cannot but be uneasy to me to lie under those accusations; but some of my witnesses live in the country, at a remote distance. If it may be, next term, my lord, or the next sessions; for, if I have a copy of the pannel to-night, and am to be tried to-morrow morning, how can I provide for my defence? I cannot be prepared to except against the jury, and I am sure you will be tender, and consider the case of a man, whose life and fortune are concerned in this business.

L. C. J. Holt. To put it off till the next term, is to remove it out of this court; that we cannot do; and to put it off till after the term, will be too long a time.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. We cannot sit here after Monday, because the term begins on Tuesday.

L. Preston. My lord, this term is always a short term, and if I be tried to-morrow, it is trying me without giving me time for my defence.

Sol. Gen. My lord, there has been all the care taken that the nature of the thing was capable of, to prevent any complaint of this kind. Order was given, that my lord and these gentlemen should have notice as early as was possible. As soon as ever Mr. Attorney General had had an opportunity of looking into the evidence, notice was given them, that they should be tried, and that this was the day appointed for their trial. But there shall be no contending in a matter of this nature for a day. If it be desired, and the court please to put it off till to-morrow, we are contented; but there can be no reason to put it off for a longer time. As there is always a tenderness to be used, and I know will be, and as far as I am concerned, always shall be towards persons in these circumstances; so there is a regard to be had towards the government and the public. I am sure, if the accusation that is against these gentlemen is true, the government is highly concerned that this matter should come to a speedy examination, and that persons that enter into such designs be brought to judgment. The charge in the indictment is of such a nature as draws very great consequences along with it; it concerns no less than the life of the king and queen, the destruction of the fleet of the kingdom, and the invasion of the realm by the forces of a declared enemy. These are the things that the prisoners are charged with; and certainly there ought to be no delay in the searching into such matters as these. They have had a week's notice of trial already, and for many days of that week, at least they have had as many counsel to assist them as they desired, and all the solicitors that they had a mind to, have had free access to them; so that they have wanted no opportunity to prepare for their trial, that men in their circumstances could have. As to what has been said with relation to the jury, the law indulges them in the number of their peremptory challenges, without being put to shew cause, and the court hath granted them, at the very instant of their pleading, a copy of the pannel; and there is a reasonable time between this and to-morrow for their making such inquiry into the jury as is justifiable, and fit to be made: but if by time to look into the jury, it be meant, that there may be a time for tampering, that I am sure your tenderness of the government will not permit; you will take care as much that no such thing be done, as you will that they should not be surprized. If your lordships are pleased that the trial be put off till to-morrow, we will be ready to-morrow to attend it.

L. Preston. My lord, it is a very hard presumption that Mr. Solicitor makes of our asking a copy of the pannel, that it is with a design to tamper with the jury.

Sol. Gen. I did not say so, but I said till to-morrow was time enough to make a justifiable inquiry.

L. Preston. But if I be to be tried to-morrow, I am willing to be tried to-day, for I am as ready now as I shall be then.

L. C. J. Holt. It may be so, and as ready as you will be after the term; but I know not what your lordship means by expressing such resentment, that because you can't have what time allowed you would, therefore you will have none, but be tried now.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. You may have time enough to prepare yourself as to the jury, certainly, between this and to-morrow.

Serj. Thompson. My lord, we that are for the king, have given these gentlemen notice long enough to be prepared, if we should try them now; for that is the time we gave notice for: but because we would indulge them as far as we could, we are willing that they should have till to-morrow, and intending them that kindness, are not ready to try them to-day, and there can be no pretence for them to put off their trial any longer; for there can be no want of evidence as to the fact we can charge them with; for all the evidence that we shall bring against them was taken from themselves, or the greatest part of it.

L. C. J. Holt. Well, what time will you be ready then?

Serj. Thompson. To-morrow morning.

L. C. J. Holt. Then to-morrow at eight o'clock, you are to be tried.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. My lord Preston, do but consider you have had seven days' notice, and to-morrow makes eight.

L. C. J. Holt. You had notice for this day, this day seven-night.

Ashton. But we have had only three days' time to consult with our counsel, though we desired we might have our counsel come to us that day.

Sol. Gen. They were told, they must apply themselves to the king for that at the same time.

Ashton. We did so that night to my lord Sidney, then Sunday intervened, which was no day for business, and we could not have our order. On Monday we could not have it till night; so that it was Tuesday before we could get any body to us. My lord, it is a weighty concern, and all such hasty proceedings were thought very hard in the late times, and particularly the denying Mr. Cornish * time; and it is one of the reasons given in the king's declaration for his coming here into England, the hardships that the law laid upon men in their trials, which he came to prevent.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. The hardship that was upon Mr. Cornish was, that he was taken upon the Tuesday off from the Exchange, and tried before that day seven-night, and that was hard indeed: but besides, he was taken about his business off from the Exchange. I know not whether you were about your business, your lawful business, when you were taken, God of Heaven knows that. And pray consider, here is a matter of very great consequence on the one side, and on the other: for if men be plotting against the government, to give them time to carry on their plots will be mischievous on that side.

Ashton. My lord, till that be legally proved before your lordships, that is but a supposition.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. That will lie upon them to prove.

L. C. J. Holt. Mr. Ashton, we are to suppose you not guilty, till you are proved guilty.

Ashton. Then, my lord, the law says, we may except against so many persons; what is the end of the giving us a copy of the pannel? It is not to be presumed we can do it by their faces; for what can I say to the face of one I never saw? We must inquire concerning the men, and that is a work of time; for some of these gentlemen, I presume, live eight or ten miles out of town. Is it possible for me, before to-morrow morning eight o'clock, to send to 35 men to inquire after them?

L. C. J. Holt. No, nor is it intended you should.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Nay, if you intend to send to the jurymen, we have no reason to give you time.

Ashton. I mean to inquire after the men, their lives, what religion they are of, what sort of men they are.

L. C. J. Holt. I suppose they are all Protestants of the church of England; but suppose they are all strangers to you, and yet good and lawful men of the county, and there be no difference between you and them, then they are fit to try you.

Ashton. It is true, my lord, but if I have liberty to except against 35, I ought to know something of them.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Yes, and inform yourself as well as you can of them, but not to send to them, that is not to be permitted.

L. Preston. There is another point to inquire of them, and that is, whether they be freeholders or not.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. We have neither your lordship's affidavit, nor the oath of any other person, only an allegation.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, you must expect your trial to-morrow morning; we cannot put it off, we are limited in time, the sessions can hold no longer than Monday, because of the term.

Ashton. Then will your lordship please to put it off till Monday?

L. C. J. Holt. No, we shall not have time to do it, it may be a long trial.

L. Preston. I protest to your lordships, I cannot be ready to-morrow to make that defence I desire and design to make, and which I may make, if your lordships give me a longer day.

Clerk of Arr. Here is a copy of the pannel for your lordship.

[It was delivered to the lord Preston, who gave it to his Solicitor.]

Ashton. My lord, we shall not have time to inquire into the jury.

L. C. J. Holt. Look you, we are not bound to do this, but you have it as soon as you have pleaded.

Ashton. My lord, it will take up five or six hours in writing of it out, and we must each have a copy.

Sol. Gen. They are all joined in one indictment, and have joint counsel, and joint solicitors, as we are informed.

Ashton. Then I hope you will allow us liberty till Monday for our trial.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. The court cannot allow longer time; the court here can sit no longer than Monday, and here must needs be a great deal of business to do of the ordinary business of the sessions, and when that day comes, perhaps it will not serve to go through with the trial, and then it must be adjourned till after the term, and in the meanwhile some are in hopes the king of France may come and determine the matter.

Ashton. Pray, my lord, let no suggestion against us preposses the opinion of the court before we be tried.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. I do not suggest any thing, but it is in the indictment alledged against you, and that you are to be tried upon, and if such things be there suggested, as we would give you all reasonable time for your defence, so we must take care that the government sustain no hurt by delays.

L. C. J. Holt. It is observed by the king's counsel, that they are things of very great consequence, and therefore they press for the trial.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. I cannot believe but that you will be as ready to-morrow, as you can be on Monday.

Ashton. The government cannot be prejudiced by putting it off till Monday, sure.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. The evidence that is to convict you, lies all on their side that are for the king, and I cannot imagine where your witnesses should be, unless they are in France; but you had reason to expect your trial, being apprehended in the manner as you were, and to provide for it.

L. C. J. Holt. The want of witnesses is only a surmise, and a pretence; for there is no oath of any witnesses that they want, or who they are: Indeed, if we had oath made that they wanted material witnesses, and to material points for their defence, that might be occasion for our further consideration; but shall we put off a trial upon a bare suggestion of the want of witnesses? Sure that was never done.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Name any one particular man that is your witness, and the particular thing that he can prove; for if any of your witnesses do know any thing of this kind, it must be particulars, and not generals; if you will not name them, it is plain it is only a pretence you insist upon for delay.

Ashton. My lord, I insist upon the point of the jury, that we have not time to look after them.

L. C. J. Holt. Then that of the witnesses is waved.

L. Preston. 'Twas I that desired time for my witnesses.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. But you neither name them, nor bring us any oath about them, or of any thing they can prove for you.

L. C. J. Holt. Pray, don't spend the time of the court, nor your own time unnecessarily, you must prepare for your trial to-morrow.

Ashton. My lord, there is not a person in court, I believe, but will think it hard that we are so straightened in time.

L. C. J. Holt. The time you have had notice to prepare for your trial is sufficient.

Ashton. Mr. Cornish's case has been complained of as a very hard case in this very respect, and we would hope, the king that now is came to reform such abuses.

L. C. J. Holt. You have been already told, wherein the hardship of that case lay. I am sure yours is not like it; but take notice we will be sitting here punctually at eight.

L. Preston. Will your lordship please to let us have our counsel come to us, and our friends?

L. C. J. Holt. Yes, sure, you shall have all that is necessary for your defence that we can allow you, but unnecessary delays must be avoided.

[Then the Prisoners were taken away by the Keeper of Newgate to the gaol]

January 17, 1691.

This day, between the hours of eight and nine in the morning, the Court being sat, and those persons who were returned upon the jury were called over twice, and their appearances recorded; then the prisoners were brought to the bar.

Clerk of Arr. You the prisoners at the bar, these men that you shall hear called and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord and lady, our king and queen, and you, upon trial of your several lives and deaths, if therefore you or any of you will challenge them, or any of them, your time is to challenge them as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they be sworn.

L. Preston. My lord, I beg your lordship will inform me, whether, if I have any thing to offer to the court, it is proper before the jury be impannelled, or after.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, I don't know what your lordship has to offer; I think you have nothing to offer why the jury should not be sworn, for now your lordship has put yourself upon your trial, and are going to proceed in that trial, and the jury are going to be sworn. If you have any thing to offer, as to them, you may challenge them.

L. Preston. Truly, my lord, I have something to offer, but it is only what I did humbly offer yesterday, and that is, that my warning was so short, that I am not prepared for my trial. We had not above three or four days wherein we might consult about it, all the former time we have been kept close prisoners; we are now brought here to be tried, without having time to look into the pannel of our jury. The pannel we had not till yesterday, and I humbly beg, that I may have some time to prepare for my defence.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, this is that which you insisted upon yesterday. Your lordship said you wanted witnesses, and your lordship did not then mention what witnesses you wanted, nor was any oath made of any one that you wanted; and therefore the court over-ruled you, and wished you to prepare for your trial, and would not put it off. For if it should not be to-day, but should be put off till another time, it must be the putting of it off till another sessions; for we are straightened with it in point of time, for the session can last no longer than Monday, and you have had convenient notice.

L. Preston. Truly, my lord, I think it is hard, when my life and fortune, and all are concerned, that I should be hurried on to a trial, only because the court is straightened in point of time; and yet that is the only reason that I can perceive why such haste is made. I desire a little more time to prepare myself, and I think it very hard I should be denied. I must submit it to your lordships. If you will not allow me time, I cannot make my defence as I would.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, as to the shortness of the time, that is no objection; you have had convenient notice; as much notice as the law requires, and as much time as, without particular cause shewn, hath here at any time been given in such a case. If indeed there had been any particular reason offered for putting off the trial, and you had made it appear by oath, the court possibly might have put off the trial; but because your lordship only suggested you wanted a witness, naming neither person, nor place, or matter, such witness should prove, they are of opinion no cause appears for such delay of your trial.

L. Preston. My lord, I assure you I am not prepared for my trial.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, the court over-ruled this matter yesterday, it cannot be put off.

Sol. Gen. My lord, I would humbly offer your lordship one thing before the jury be called and sworn. By the law, these gentlemen at the bar have the privilege to challenge peremptorily to the number of thirty-five; which is so great a number, that if each of them severally take advantage of it (as they may do by law, and God forbid they should be denied any advantage the law gives them), it will be next to impossible to have a sufficient number of Jurors appear so as that we may proceed in the trial.

L. Preston. Truly, my lord, we don't hear what Mr. Solicitor says.

L. C. J. Holt. Do you not? Then I'll tell you what he says, when he has done: Go on, Mr. Solicitor.

Sol. Gen. My lord, all that I would know of them is, whether they intend to take the advantage that the law gives them, of single and particular challenges; for then they must be tried severally; or whether they will be content that the same persons that are challenged by any one, shall stand challenged for all three. I leave it to them to take their own choice; let them do what they please in it.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord Preston, Mr. Solicitor tells you what the law is, that every one of you may challenge five and thirty without cause; and if the court should proceed to try you all together, and every one of you should challenge five and thirty, perhaps a sufficient number will be wanting to try you: the number challenged will then amount to 105 in all. If so be you agree in your challenges, that what one challenges shall be challenged by the other two, then the court will go on, and try you all together; otherwise they will be forced to sever you; therefore he desires to know whether you will join or sever in your challenges.

Sol. Gen. Take your own choice, gentlemen; and do what you think best.

L. Preston. My lord, the matter of challenging is so great an advantage to a man upon his life, that for my part I must insist upon that which the law gives me, to challenge as many for myself as I think fit, to the number that the law allows me.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord Preston says he will, as it is fit he should, take all advantages he can: what says Mr. Ashton to it?

Ashton. My lord, I expect the same advantage.

L. C. J. Holt. You must have it; it is not proposed to preclude you from any advantage that the law allows you: if you insist upon that advantage, you must have it, and then you must be tried severally.

Sol. Gen. Then, my lord, since they are pleased to declare they will sever in their challenges, we must desire to sever them in their trial, and to begin with the trial of my lord Preston.

Ashton. My lord, I desire the liberty to be by when my lord is tried.

L. C. J. Holt. No, no, that is not to be permitted.

Serj. Thompson. If you had joined in your challenges, then you had been tried all together.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. That advantage you lose by severing in your challenges; you lose the assistance of each other at your trial.

L. C. J. Holt. That is the consequence; but do as you please; set them by.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. It may be, they do not so well weigh the consequence, therefore call them again. Gentlemen, do you consider the consequence of your not joining in your challenges? You must not be by, if my lord Preston be tried by himself, but must withdraw, and thereby you will lose the advantage of helping one another.

Mr. Elliot. My lord, I desire to be tried alone.

Ashton. And so do I, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. Then, captain Richardson, take them away.

VOL. XII.

Afterwards the Court was informed that Mr. Elliot desired to be tried with my lord Preston, and thereupon they were called again.

L. C. J. Holt. Gentlemen, do you desire to be tried alone, or with my lord Preston?

Elliot. My lord, if you please, I desire to be tried with my lord.

Sol. Gen. Does Mr. Ashton desire it too?

Ashton. No, my lord, I desire to be tried by myself.

Sol. Gen. Then we will try my lord Preston by himself.

L. C. J. Holt. Mr. Elliot, the king's counsel do not think fit to try you with my lord Preston, without Mr. Ashton; and unless you will all join, you must all be tried severally.

Elliot. I can only answer for myself.

Ashton. I am for being tried alone.

L. C. J. Holt. Then my lord Preston must be tried alone.

The other two were carried back to Newgate, and the lord Preston was bid by the Clerk to look to his challenges.

Clerk of Arr. Sir Godard Nelthrop, bart. challenged; Sir Thomas Cooke, knt. challenged; Sir William Hedges, knt. challenged; James Boddington, challenged; Thomas Johnson, challenged; Ralph Bucknal, challenged; Craven Peyton.

L. Preston. I do not except against him.

[Sworn.

Clerk of Arr. Then swear Mr. Peyton.

[Which was done.

Lucy Knightley, challenged; Scory Barker, challenged; Thomas Cuthbert, challenged; Alban Chaire, challenged; John Herbert, challenged; Hugh Squire.

L. Preston. I have nothing to say against him.

[Sworn.

Clerk of Arr. John Tally, challenged; George Ford, esq.

L. Preston. I do not challenge him. [Sworn.

Clerk of Arr. Henry Whitehot, challenged; John Crosse, not appeared; Thomas Smith, challenged; William Withers, challenged; Richard Cradock.

Mr. Cradock. My lord, I know not how I came to be summoned upon this jury; for I am no freeholder.

L. C. J. Holt. Then set him aside.

Clerk of Arr. John Cane, challenged; William Jacomb.

Mr. Jacomb. My lord, I am no freeholder.

L. C. J. Holt. How long have you not been a freeholder?

Mr. Jacomb. Near to four months.

L. C. J. Holt. Give him his oath. [Which was done.] Have you no freehold in the county of Middlesex in your own right, nor in the right of your wife?

Jacomb. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. Then you must go on to the next.

Cl. of Arr. Joseph Dawson.

Mr. Dawson. My lord, I am an ancient man, and not fit to serve upon the jury.

2 X

L. C. J. Holt. Well, now you are here, for this time serve; we will excuse you hereafter.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we challenge him for the king.

L. Preston. My lord, I desire to know when any one is challenged for the king, whether they must not shew cause?

L. C. J. Holt. By and by, if there be not enough, they shall shew cause.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. You shall have all that the law allows you certainly, my lord.

Clerk of Arr. Thomas Austin; not appeared. Richard Paget.

L. Preston. Has this gentleman any freehold?

Mr. Paget. Yes, my lord, I have in the county of Middlesex.

L. Preston. I do not except against him.

Serj. Tremain. My lord, we challenge him for the king.

L. Preston. My lord, I humbly desire they may shew their cause.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, cause is not to be shewn by the king's counsel till all the pannel be gone through; and then, if there be not twelve left to try, then they are bound to shew cause; that is the law.*

L. Preston. My lord, it is a thing of a very tender concern to me; I desire to know, if it be not usual that they should assign the cause, when they challenge any for the king: for if it be not according to law, it may be a prejudice to me; and I desire I may have counsel heard to that point.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, shall we assign counsel to dispute matters not disputable? There is not any more clear case in all our law than that: if your lordship please, you shall have a book to read, that the king is not bound to shew cause till the pannel is gone through.

L. Preston. Then I do not insist upon it.

Clerk of Arr. Walter Bridal, challenged; Samuel Hodgkins, challenged; Thomas Elton.

L. Preston. I do not challenge him.

Serj. Tremain. Then we challenge him for the king.

Clerk of Arr. Arthur Bayly.

L. Preston. I have nothing to say against him. [Sworn.]

Clerk of Arr. John Milner, not appeared. Richard Page.

L. Preston. I do not except against him.

Serj. Thompson. Then we challenge him for the king.

Clerk of Arr. Richard Marsh.

Mr. Marsh. My lord, I desire to be excused; I am not fit to serve upon a jury.

L. C. J. Holt. Why?

Marsh. I am thick of hearing.

L. C. J. Holt. Methinks you hear me very well.

Marsh. Truly, my lord, I do not hear well.

L. C. J. Holt. Well, you may spare him, if there be enough.

L. Preston. My lord, I do not challenge him; I desire he may be sworn.

Serj. Tremain. We challenge him for the king.

Clerk of Arr. Thomas Harriot, challenged; Nath. Wall.

L. Preston. I do not except against him.

Sol. Gen. We challenge him for the king.

Clerk of Arr. Matthew Browne.

L. Preston. I do not challenge him.

Serj. Tremain. We challenge him for the king.

Clerk of Arr. Thomas Crosse, not appeared; Robert Breedon.

L. Preston. I have nothing to say against him. [Sworn.]

Clerk of Arr. James Partherick, challenged; John Baily, challenged; William Bourne, challenged; Henry Gerrard, challenged; Richard Cooper.

L. Preston. I say nothing to him.

Serj. Thompson. I challenge him for the king.

Clerk of Arr. John Bignal.

L. Preston. I do not challenge him. [Sworn.]

Clerk of Arr. James Ferne.

L. Preston. I do not challenge him. [Sworn.]

Clerk of Arr. Robert Longland, challenged; Edmund Salter, challenged; John Howlet, challenged; Richard Fitzgerald.

L. Preston. I do not except against him.

Serj. Tremain. We challenge him for the king.

Clerk of Arr. John Owting.

L. Preston. I do not except against him.

[Sworn.]

Clerk of Arr. Mark Lawne.

L. Preston. I do not challenge him. [Sworn.]

Clerk of Arr. Thomas Battle, not appeared; Francis Chapman, challenged; Gilbert Urwin, challenged; Richard Bealing, challenged; Edward Fuller.

L. Preston. I do not challenge him. [Sworn.]

Clerk of Arr. John Collins.

L. Preston. I do not challenge him. [Sworn.]

Clerk of Arr. Thomas Hollins.

L. Preston. I have nothing to say against him.

Serj. Tremain. We challenge him for the king.

Clerk of Arr. William Silcock.

L. Preston. I do not challenge him.

Serj. Tremain. We challenge him for the king.

Clerk of Arr. John Preston, challenged; Thomas Wright, challenged; Benjamin Boulton.

L. Preston. I do not challenge him. [Sworn.]

Then they were counted, and the twelve sworn were those whose names follow: Craven Peyton, Hugh Squire, George Ford, Arthur Bailey, Robert Breedon, John Bignal, James Ferne, John Owting, Mark Lawne, Edw. Fuller, John Collins, Benjamin Boulton.

Then Proclamation for Information and Evidence was made as usual.

* See in this Collection, Peter Cook's Case, A. D. 1696; and Spencer Cowper's Case, A. D. 1699.

Clerk of Arr. Sir Richard Grahme, hold up your hand——[which he did.]——Gentlemen, you that are sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause; he stands indicted by the name of sir Richard Grahme, late of the parish of St. Anne, within the liberty of Westminster, baronet, together with John Ashton, &c.——prout in the indictment mutatis mutandis——and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided. Upon this indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereunto hath pleaded not guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon God and his country, which country you are; your charge is to inquire, whether he be guilty of this felony and high treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty. If you find that he is guilty, you are to inquire what goods or chattels, lands or tenements he had at the time of the felony and high treason committed, or at any time since. If you find him not guilty, you are to inquire whether he fled for it. If you find that he fled for it, you are to inquire of his goods and chattels, as if you had found him guilty. If you find him not guilty, nor that he did fly for it, you are to say so, and no more, and hear your evidence.

Mr. Knapp. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury; This is an indictment of High Treason against my lord Preston, who is indicted by the name of sir Richard Grahme, baronet, and stands now prisoner before you at the bar; and the indictment sets forth, that the prisoner, together with one John Ashton and Edmund Elliot, as false traitors against our sovereign lord and lady, king William and queen Mary, not weighing the duty of their allegiance, the 29th of December, in the second year of their now majesties reign, at the parish of St. Clement Danes, in this county of Middlesex, did conspire, consult and imagine, to depose their majesties from the throne and government of these kingdoms, and to bring the king and queen to final death and destruction, and levy war within this kingdom, and procure an invasion to be made here; and that to bring their treasons to pass, they did prepare and compose, and cause to be prepared and composed divers treasonable letters, notes, memorandums, and instructions in writing, which were to inform the French king and his subjects, and other enemies of the king and queen, of the number, force and condition of their majesties ships, and how some of them were manned, and the names of several of the commanders of them, and how the castles and forts of Portsmouth, South-Sea, and Gosport, within this kingdom, were fortified, and how they might be seized and surprised by the king's enemies; as also to inform them of the time, places, ways and means how they might invade this kingdom, depose their majesties, and fight with their ships against their majesties ships, and cause and procure great forces to be raised against the king and queen, and send ships to plague the City of London, and war and rebellion within the kingdom to procure; and that they did knowingly and secretly prepare and conceal two several bills of exchange for the payment of money to the king's enemies, and got these bills of exchange, letters, notes and memorandums, into their custody; and afterwards, the 30th of December, for the sum of one hundred pounds, by them, or some of them paid, they did hire a ship to carry them and the said bills of exchange, letters, notes, memorandums, and instructions, into parts beyond the seas, to and among their majesties enemies; and did also prepare a boat, which was to carry them to the ship, and accordingly they went into the boat, and went on board the ship with the bills of exchange and papers aforesaid; and being on board they set sail, and made away towards France with those bills of exchange and papers, with intention to disperse them, and to perfect their said treasons. And the indictment further sets forth, that there was and is a war between our king and queen and the French king, and the people of those parts, under his dominions, who are enemies of the king and queen. The prisoner, together with those other two named before, as false traitors, did adhere to the enemies of the king and queen; and to bring about this treason, they did procure such bills of exchange, letters, notes, memorandums and instructions, and did hire such ship and boat to carry them and those papers into France; and did go on board the said ship, and sailed away for France, with intention to aid and assist the king's enemies in counsel and intelligence, by those papers, and bills of exchange, as I before opened unto you; and this is laid to be against the duty of his allegiance, against the peace of their majesties, their crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided. To this indictment, gentlemen, the prisoner pleaded, he is not guilty; and for his trial hath put himself upon his country, which you are. If we prove him guilty, it is your duty to find him so.

Sol. Gen. My lords and gentlemen of the jury; The indictment hath been opened to you at large, and I do not doubt but you have observed it. It consists of two parts, which are formed upon two several branches of the statute of the 25th of Edward 3. The one is for compassing and imagining the deposing and destruction of the king and queen; the other for aiding and assisting the king and queen's enemies.

Treason, gentlemen, consists in the imagination of the heart; but because that imagination of the heart can be discovered no other way but by some open act, therefore the law doth require, that some overt-act, manifesting that intention and imagination, be assigned and proved. I doubt not but you have observed that there are several overt-acts of both these kinds of treason, assigned in this indictment.

Gentlemen, the general design of the conspiracy (as will appear by the evidence) was this : The king and queen were to be deposed, and this was to be effected by a French army, and a French fleet. It will be easily granted, that nothing more dreadful can enter into the imagination of an Englishman, than the destruction of our fleet, and the conquest of the kingdom by the arms of France. But yet it will be part of the evidence that we shall offer to you, that the prisoners, and others of the conspirators, seem to be of another mind ; for amongst the papers which were taken with the prisoners, you will see one, which is stiled, ' The Result of a Conference,' wherein they pretend to shew the possibility of restoring king James by the power of the French king, and yet to preserve the Protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of the kingdom. They themselves went no farther than to think it possible, and I believe it will be hard to persuade any other Englishman that it is possible, unless one instance could be given, that the French king ever employed his arms for setting up any body but himself, his own religion, and his own government. I never heard that he did pretend to form any part of his glories upon the virtue of moderation, or self-denial. And there can hardly be imagined a greater instance of self-denial, than for the French king, after he had destroyed the Dutch and English fleets, and subdued our forces at land, not to make use of his success, so as to add these three kingdoms to his conquests, and possess himself of the uncontested dominion of the sea for ever, but only to entitle him, at so great hazard and expence, to become a mediator between king James and the people of England, and, by his mediation, to establish the Protestant religion, and the liberties of the people : and yet, as absurd as this seems, you will find this to be the result of one of their conferences. I did never think it was the part of any who were of counsel for the king in cases of this nature, to endeavour to aggravate the crime of the prisoners, by going about to put false colours upon evidence, or to give it more than its due weight ; and therefore I shall be sure to forbear any thing of that nature. But I think it my duty to give some short account of the nature and course of the evidence to be produced to you ; which consisting of several sorts, it will be in some sort necessary to open it, that you may the more clearly apprehend it, and with more ease make your observations upon it.

Gentlemen, we shall produce in evidence, as well living witnesses, as papers and writings, which by a strange kind of Providence were taken upon my lord Preston, and the other two persons named in the indictment, when they were apprehended ; and therein this design that I have opened to you, will be made evident beyond all contradiction. As to the living witnesses, the course of the evidence will be this : one Nicholas Pratt is the owner of a smack, called the Thomas and Elizabeth, he does usually entrust his wife, Jane Pratt, with the hiring out of this smack ; William Paseley is master of the vessel, and has of late been made a part-owner, to protect him from being pressed ; for it is a privilege that the owners of the vessels claim, not to be pressed. Some time since (the witnesses will tell you the precise time) this Jane Pratt was sent for to one Mr. Burdet's house in the city, where she met with Mr. Ashton, who desired to know, whether she could undertake to convey him and some others, with safety into France. She said, she did not doubt but she could do so ; and thereupon Mr. Ashton told her, that he and his friends were merchants and traders, and that they should make great advantage, to the value of a thousand pounds at least, if they could be there quickly. Their discourse went no farther at that time ; but Mrs. Pratt was appointed by Mr. Ashton to bring the master of the vessel along with her, for he had a mind to discourse himself with the master, and they were to meet at the Wonder-tavern in Ludgate-street ; and because there should be no mistake about the meeting, Mr. Ashton gave the woman a note of direction in writing, ready to be produced.

Accordingly, by the 29th of December, Mrs. Pratt and the master, came to the Wonder-tavern, where Mr. Ashton met with them, and there they treated of the price to be given for the hiring of this vessel to carry them to France ; and I think 150 guineas was the sum then insisted upon, but no bargain was made at this time ; but there was a new appointment to meet the next day, which was the 30th of December, at Mr. Burdet's house.

The next day, when she and the master came thither, they found there together Ashton and Elliot, the two other persons named in the indictment, and there this matter was treated of with great secrecy in Mrs. Burdet's bed-chamber. And they came to an agreement that 100*l.* should be the sum to be paid to Mrs. Pratt, for conveying into France Ashton and Elliot, and two other persons. So the contract was originally made for others besides Mr. Ashton and Elliot, and the money was actually deposited by Mr. Ashton and Elliot in Mrs. Burdet's hands, and a sixpence was broken ; one half of which was delivered to Mrs. Burdet to keep, the other half Mr. Ashton was to take along with him, and when the master had safely landed them in France, Mr. Ashton was to deliver his half of the sixpence to the master ; which being brought to Mrs. Burdet, either by him or Mrs. Pratt, upon the joining of the two pieces together, the master was entitled to receive the hundred pounds.

The next appointment was to meet at one Mr. Rigby's house in Covent-Garden, and that was to be on the one and thirtieth of December, when the voyage was to be begun : and the tide not serving to go through bridge till late, the appointment was to meet the later. When they, Mrs. Pratt and the master, came there, they found only Mr. Ashton and Mr. Elliot ; but before that time care was taken to provide a sculler at Surrey-stairs, to be ready to carry them on board the smack, and the waterman was appointed to stay in a little ale-house thereabouts, to be ready when he should be called.

About ten o'clock at night four persons came down together, and went into this sculler with the master of the smack, and made what haste they could through bridge till they came to Pickle-Herring stairs, over-against the Tower, where the smack lay, and there went aboard the master and these four persons, my lord Preston, a servant of my lord Preston's, Mr. Ashton, and Mr. Elliot. The smack set sail immediately after they were on board, and their haste made them carry away the waterman's coat, which he had lent them whilst they were in the sculler, and that accident was the occasion of discovering who the waterman was that carried them from Surry-stairs. After they were on board the smack, they were possessed with great fear of being surprised. They knew the nature of the business they were about, and the danger they were in, if they should be discovered; and therefore when they were to pass by the George frigate, a man of war that lay in the River, they desired the master to hide them, which he did, by putting them under the quarter-hatches, a place where they could not stand or sit, but must lie along on the ballast. When they were passed by the George frigate, they quitted that place; but when they were near the Block-house at Graves, they grew apprehensive, and they desired to be hid a second time, which was accordingly done. And they continued to lie in that place till they were taken; and it was a happy thing they did so. The place was such, that they had not any possibility of throwing away their letters and papers, though they had made preparation for it in case of any accident, having tied them together, and fixed a piece of lead to them, that so if they saw themselves in danger of being taken, they might easily sink the packet: but being so close shut up in this place, that they could not execute their purpose, the papers were taken, and will be offered to you in evidence.

Gentlemen, captain Billop, by the order of a noble lord, now present, was directed to use his utmost diligence to seize some dangerous persons, of whose design of going beyond sea for some very ill ends, an intimation had been given. He got ready a pinnace well manned, and went in pursuit of them down the river; and both as he went and returned, he took care to search suspected vessels. When he came to this, he demanded of the master what number of men he had on board, pretending he came to press men: the master told him he had but three, and for those he had a protection. But the captain said he must be better satisfied, and must search the vessel; and in the search he found these four persons lying concealed in this secret place, under the quarter-hatches. As they were taken out one after another, one of the seamen observed Mr. Ashton to take up a bundle of papers from off the ballast, and put it in his bosom; and near the place where the papers lay, he took up two seals, which after proved to be my lord Preston's seals when he was secretary. Captain Billop being informed of this by that seaman, he put his hand into Mr. Ashton's bosom, and took away from him the bundle of papers with the lead fixed to it. When they were put on board the captain's pinnace, they all pressed him much, that he would let them go on shore at Gravesend, pretending want of refreshment, they not having eaten, and the night having been cold; but he did not think that proper nor safe, but told them, they should go on board the George frigate, and refresh themselves there. When they came on board the George frigate, all the three gentlemen, and my lord Preston in particular, were very earnest with captain Billop to dispose of the bundle of papers, mixing extraordinary promises with great compliments. Not prevailing there, when they were returned to the pinnace, they renewed their solicitations, and one of them told him, it would be easy to remove all suspicion, by fixing the lead to some other papers of little signification, which were found in my lord Preston's pocket, which he might produce, and they would without difficulty pass for the papers that were taken. But the captain was too just to comply with this proposal. When they found he was not to be moved, you will find from the witnesses, that their promises were turned into threats, and they used another sort of language. When they were brought to Whitehall stairs, upon their landing they gave money to the master and the seamen, desiring them to say, they were hired to go for Flanders and not for France.

Gentlemen, these things which I have opened, carry a strong presumption of guilt, for Englishmen, especially one of that quality of my lord Preston, to go into the country of an enemy, without any manner of passport, and in such a manner as they could not expect but to be seized as spies, unless they were assured that their character was so well known there, that they should be looked upon, not as persons coming to get intelligence, but to give it; unless they were well assured of a good reception when they came there. But there is no occasion to leave any thing to conjecture in this case; what is contained in these papers makes the design of the voyage beyond dispute. I think, gentlemen, after you have heard the evidence, you will be very well satisfied, that my lord Preston, and the other two who stand indicted, were equally concerned in the papers; they were all alike earnest to preserve them from being seen; they all solicited for the disposing of them, and promised rewards if they might prevail.

Gentlemen, these papers are of various natures. One I mentioned before, is intitled, 'The Result of a Conference between several lords and gentlemen, both Tories and Whigs;' in which it was undertaken to prove the possibility and methods of restoring king James by a French power, without endangering the Protestant religion, and the civil administration, according to the laws of this kingdom. Another contains heads for a Declaration to be prepared, in order to be published when the French have had success at sea, and are landing; and that is filled with such pretences as they thought most specious, and most likely to amuse and delude the people.

There is another sort of these papers which consists of Letters. These letters are directed in false names, and are not subscribed; and it is not to be imagined it should be otherwise. Yet, gentlemen, (though that is not the present business) the hands of the writers of these letters are very well known, and the subject-matter of them will easily reveal to you for whom they were intended; for though these letters are most of them written under divers cants, some under the colour of trade, some of them under the colour of a law-suit for the redeeming of a mortgage, others under the notion of a match, and a settlement to be made upon that match, yet the real business is so plain, that you need but hear them read, to see through the disguise.

Though they begin generally in the stile of merchants writing to one another, or the like, yet towards the end of the letters, you will observe expressions of duty and reverence (terms which do not usually pass in correspondence between persons of that sort) sufficient to shew that somewhat else was intended to be covered in what went before.

Gentlemen, it will appear to you, that some of the writers of these letters were of the number of those who were secured the last summer, when the French fleet was upon our coasts; and you will observe they complain, that by reason of that restraint the design was very much hindered, though they have endeavoured to redeem that loss of time since their discharge, and have carried on the business with more vigour than ever. In short, the design of these letters is to importune the setting out of the French fleet with all possible expedition: they say they must not suffer such a fit season to be spent unprofitably: that the best time is between this and the first of March to come to a good market; and if they come not before the tenth of March, all will be lost. In another of their letters they say, if the suit be well solicited and managed, it may come to a final hearing before the end of Easter term. They complain, that there are several indiscreet letters came from St. Germain, that turn to the prejudice of the design. Those letters are not enough disguised to deceive the people here, but speak too plainly what is to be expected from themselves, and from the French. You will take notice, that the letters, all which you will hear, are all bills with high characters of the bearer; for which reason they write in such general terms, because the bearer was entrusted with the whole. Some of the letters say, no particulars are or need be expressed, because he will inform them of every thing: others, that they could not write so much as he could say; and that nothing was wanting, but to allow him a full and fit season to give an account of all the business; and that they entirely depend upon his account of them, and their condition.

And, Gentlemen, in one of the letters the bearer is stiled a lord; and to whom can that be applied unless to the prisoner at the bar? In another letter, when they speak of sending the copper and the linen (the goods pretended for carrying on the trade) it is added, and what the meaning of that is, they must refer to the bearer, who was able to give them a particular account. I have mentioned so much of the papers only that you might have a general notion of them; that so when you hear them read, you may more readily make your observations. I assure you, I have been as careful as I could, not to exceed the truth in opening any part of the evidence: but it is your part to see whether what I have opened be made out in proof. There is another paper that gives an account of their majesties fleet to be sent out this summer; and there is an observation at the end of it, that it was hoped it may be out in March. But you will find by other papers (and particularly by one of my lord's own hand-writing) that he was of another mind, that the fleet would not be out before June.

Gentlemen, the last sort of papers which I will mention to you, are some Memorandums and Notes written by my lord Preston, wherein he gives an account of several things of great moment; which, as his memory served him, are put together without connection or method, being only to remind him of them when he should have occasion to mention them. He therein gives an account of the number and strength of the English fleet; how they are manned, and who are the principal officers and commanders, and in what time they will be out. He likewise gives an account of the number and state of the Dutch fleet, and how that is to be divided and disposed of.

And with relation to the French fleet, there is a particular memorandum, that they must be out at farthest in April; that they must be out so as to separate the Dutch fleet and our's; that they must be sure to look in at Spithead as they come by, and secure what ships should be in that harbour from joining the rest.

There is also a hint given of those that were most likely to come in to them: and there is advice in what place their fleet should fight our's. They must not come so high as Beachy, where they fought the last year, but rather choose to fight in the chops of the channel. There is an account of Portsmouth, how fortified and garrisoned, that it has but 500 men; that Gosport had nothing but pallisadoes about it, and South-Sea-Castle very weak. There are memorandums of other heads proper for a declaration. There are the names of several persons, some of them with particular characters, and some without; and amongst the rest, there is the character given of the clergy of the city of London, that they are the worst of all others.

Gentlemen, we shall proceed to the Evidence, and first call the living witnesses, and then read the papers; and when you have heard what the one can say, and what the other contain, we must leave it to your consideration, and submit all to the direction of the court.

Serj. Tremain. Pray swear Mrs. Pratt, Jane Pratt. [Who was sworn with seven or eight more.]

Serj. Tremain. Mrs. Pratt, pray will you tell us what you know concerning the hiring of a vessel, and whither it was to go, and by whom it was hired, and for what? Pray tell your whole knowledge in this matter.

Mrs. Pratt. Mr. Burdet, may it please your lordship, sent for me to his house, to hire a vessel to go for France, and asked me, if I could carry them secure. I told them I could let them have a smack that would carry them; and, if it please you, my lord, we met several times at his house, and at last there was Mr. Ashton there, and Mr. Ashton appointed to meet at the Dog-tavern upon Ludgate-Hill; I think they call it the Wonder-tavern.

L. C. J. Holt. Mistress, pray begin again, and speak out.

Mrs. Pratt. Mr. Burdet sent for me to hire my smack to go for France, and they asked me if I thought it would carry them secure. I told them yes, I thought it would; and I came several times about it to Mr. Burdet's house. The smack was not then come to the Tower, as it did afterwards; and then after they sent for Mr. Ashton, and he met me at Mr. Burdet's, and meeting at Mr. Burdet's, he gave me a note, to meet at the Dog-tavern upon Ludgate-Hill, and there Ashton met, but Mr. Burdet did not come.

Serj. Tremain. Who was with Ashton, when you met at the Dog-tavern?

Mrs. Pratt. None but a man of his, as Mr. Ashton said: there we sat about an hour and a half and did nothing. At length we went away, and appointed to meet at Mr. Burdet's house the next day at seven or eight o'clock, and there we met, and the bargain was made.

Serj. Tremain. What bargain?

Mrs. Pratt. I asked 150*l.* and they told me that was too much. Says Ashton, I will give you fourscore; says Mr. Burdet, pray encourage them, offer them 100*l.* Thereupon he did offer 100*l.* and we agreed for 100*l.*

Serj. Tremain. What day was that, can you remember?

Mrs. Pratt. We met on the Monday, and the Tuesday we agreed.

Serj. Thompson. What money was paid?

Mrs. Pratt. Ninety-three guineas and sixpence.

Serj. Tremain. Who was by when the bargain was made?

Mrs. Pratt. Mr. Elliot was along with them, Mrs. Burdet, and the master of the vessel, at the agreement.

Serj. Tremain. What is the master's name?

Mrs. Pratt. His name is Paseley; and there was sixpence broken, and Mr. Ashton took one of the sixpences, and Mr. Burdet ordered him to give his wife the other, and so he did; and when the money was paid, Mr. Ashton brought in a paper wrapped up, and said, we should see it told out, and he told it out there, and it was 93 guineas and the sixpence.

Serj. Thompson. Who did they tell you they were to carry into France?

Mrs. Pratt. Truly, my lord, they said three, that was all.

Serj. Tremain. What followed then? Did they give you any note where you were to come for them?

Mrs. Pratt. Mr. Ashton bid Mr. Elliot write a note where they should come; it was at Mr. Rigby's in Covent Garden, at the Seven Stars, and there we were to meet at eleven o'clock at night; and when we came there, Mr. Ashton was within, and went out and fetched in some company. Mr. Elliot came, and two other gentlemen that I never saw in my life before.

Serj. Thompson. Mistress, you speak of the breaking of a sixpence: what was to be done with that?

Mrs. Pratt. My master was to bring the half of the sixpence that Mr. Ashton had, to Mrs. Burdet, and then we were to have the 100*l.*

Serj. Tremain. Had Mrs. Burdet the other piece?

Mrs. Pratt. Yes, Mr. Ashton had one half, and she had the other.

Serj. Thompson. Was there any provision carried on board this smack?

Mrs. Pratt. Yes, there was a hamper and a trunk, which were fetched from Mr. Burdet's house; my man, John Fisher, carried the trunk, and a porter carried the hamper, and I took care to see it put in the vessel.

Serj. Tremain. When you came to Covent-Garden that night, what discourse had you? and what inquiries were there made, and by whom?

Mrs. Pratt. Mrs. Ashton comes in, and she said Mr. Ashton was her husband, and said there was some news from court, of having papers in a hat, and that they had chosen some lord or other: something it was, I remember, I can't tell what; but says one gentleman that stood by, and said, I was chosen the last year, that signifies nothing; and another said, I missed it; it is only a Christmas gambol, it signifies little.

Serj. Tremain. What further discourse had they?

Mrs. Pratt. Mrs. Ashton said she was afraid they should have no very good luck, for the cock crowed.

Serj. Tremain. Was there any discourse what advantage they should get by going, or you by carrying of them?

Mrs. Pratt. They said they would help us to the earning of 1,000*l.* before Lady day, if they went this time safe.

Serj. Tremain. Pray, mistress, recollect yourself; were they to go to Flanders, or where?

Mrs. Pratt. They were to go for France; they were not to go for Flanders.

Serj. Tremain. What time of night did you depart from Mr. Rigby's?

Mrs. Pratt. About eleven o'clock.

Serj. Thompson. How did they go away from Mr. Rigby's?

Mrs. Pratt. I did not go with them: Mrs. Ashton kept me, and gave me a leg of a goose, and some drink.

Serj. Tremain. Do you know any thing further?

Mrs. Pratt. No; I think I have told you all.

Serj. Tremain. Were you hired for France or Flanders; I ask you once again?

Mrs. Pratt. We were hired for France; any place there where we could touch.

Serj. Tremain. Was there any particular port mentioned?

L. C. J. Holt. If you have done with her, will my lord ask her any question?

L. Preston. My lord, I desire she may be asked, whether she ever saw me before?

Mrs. Pratt. No, never, my lord, but in the Tower.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. But she says, when they were at Rigby's, there came in two gentlemen with Mr. Elliot that night.

L. Preston. I desire to know of her whether I was one of them two?

Serj. Thompson. My lord, she does not say your lordship was one of them.

Mrs. Pratt. No, my lord, you were not one of them.

Serj. Thompson. Then set up Paseley. Paseley, what do you know about hiring of this smack to go for France? I think you are master of the smack called the Thomas and Elizabeth, are you not?—Mr. Paseley. Yes.

Serj. Thompson. Then, pray, give an account of the whole matter.

Paseley. The smack was hired of the woman, and not of me; and when I came up to London, she told me she had got a voyage over to France, if I was minded to go; I said, yes; and she appointed me to go along with her to this mistress what-do-you-call-um's house, this Mrs. Burdet; and when she came to this house, there was nobody within but Mr. Ashton; presently after came in Mr. Elliot. After they came in they told us the things were not ready yet, but they would be ready presently to carry on board. When these things were ready, John Fisher carried the trunk down, and the porter carried the hamper, and I went along with them to Billingsgate, and carried them on board; and when I carried them on board, I went to Billingsgate again, and so we went along to this Mr. Burdet's house; and so when we came up to Burdet's house, Ashton and Elliot were not there present; but we had been there but a little time ere they came in; and then they came and said to my owner and me, you shall see the money told: it was all in gold but one sixpence; there was ninety-three guineas, and after the money was told, there was a sixpence, that was broken in half, and the guineas he rolled up in a paper, and gave them to Mrs. Burdet, and bid her lay them up; and he gave her one half of the sixpence, and kept the other half himself; and when I brought that other half that he had, or my owner, then she was to give the money to her or me.

Serj. Tremain. Pray what room of the house was this in at Mr. Burdet's?

Paseley. It was on the left hand going in.

Serj. Tremain. Was it a bed-chamber?

Paseley. Yes, it was.

Serj. Tremain. What time of night was it, pray?—Paseley. About eight o'clock.

Serj. Tremain. What discourse had you with them there, pray?

Paseley. They asked me, if I thought they might get well over? I told them yes, I believed they might.

Serj. Thompson. Did they tell you what part of France they were to go to?

Paseley. No, they named no place, but any part in France.

Serj. Tremain. Well, go on, tell us what they said further.

Paseley. So, Sir, they gave us direction to meet them at the Seven Stars in the Little Piazas, in Covent-Garden. When we came there it was eleven o'clock at night, and they were not in the house when we came in, except it were Mr. Ashton; but presently after Ashton and Elliot came in, and they sat down; and so in came two gentlemen more, but what they were, or who they were, I do not know; and they discoursed about papers shaking in a hat, and said they should have no good luck, for the cock crowed: and after this Elliot and Ashton came out of the house, and called me to go with them; and after we were gone out, Mr. Ashton leaves Elliot, and went away from him, and Elliot bid me go along with him; says he, Come, master, come along with me. He did not name any place whither they were to go; but it happened to be Surry-stairs, and going down, he calls in at the corner-house, which is an alehouse, for the waterman, and bid me go before to the water-side; and when we came thither the waterman steps into his boat, and I after him; and when I was in the boat I went into the stern, and by that time I was seated in the stern, there came down four men; but I never saw my lord and his man before they came into the wherry.

L. C. J. Holt. Who came in the wherry?

Paseley. There were all those four, Mr. Ashton, Mr. Elliot, my lord, and his man.

L. C. J. Holt. Where was this, do you say?

Paseley. At Surry-stairs, there the boat was.

Serj. Tremain. Was the prisoner at the bar one of them?

Paseley. Yes, he was.

L. C. J. Holt. Well, what did you do then?

Paseley. After we were seated in the boat at Surry-stairs, we put off, and went down through bridge, and going through bridge we came on board, the vessel riding just against the Tower almost, and we went all on board; and when we came on board, my men were all asleep, and being asleep, I called them out of the cabin to haul up the anchor; and there being very little wind stirring, we could not get very far, but came just below the Half-way Tree, and then we stopped, and I ordered them to drop the anchor for fear of the vessels in the river; and the next morning about eight o'clock we weighed our anchor again, and went on till we came near the George man of war, and there they all of them hid.

Serj. Tremain. Who?

Paseley. All of them, my lord. There was Ashton, and Elliot, and my lord Preston, and his man.

Serj. Thompson. In what place did they hide?

Paseley. In the quarter-hatches, under the hatches where we lie.

Serj. Thompson. Did they desire you to hide them?

Paseley. Yes, they did.

Serj. Thompson. What did they say?

Paseley. They said, that if there should come any boat on board to press, I should shew them my protection; and so there came no boat then.

Serj. Tremain. How big is this place they hid in.

Paseley. It is in the quarter under, near the cabin-hatches.

Serj. Tremain. I ask you what kind of place it is?

Paseley. They cannot sit upright, nor stand upright, but they are fain to lie along, or lean upon their elbows.

Serj. Thompson. Well, go on, what happened afterwards?

Paseley. After that we were passed the man of war, they came up and sat in the cabin, where we used to eat our victuals; and when we came to Gravesend, over against the Block-house, they would go down again and hide, and did so till we passed the Block-house, and then they were for coming up again; and then I saw a boat coming about Tilbury, which made towards us, and thereupon they ducked down again, and the hatches were laid down upon them, and there they remained till they were taken.

Serj. Tremain. Where were they taken?

Paseley. They were taken between the north Block-house and the Little—Serj. Tremain. But I mean in what part of the ship?

Paseley. They were taken in that little place where they were hid.

Serj. Tremain. Were the hatches shut down upon them?

Paseley. They were.

Serj. Tremain. How long had they been hid before they were taken?

Paseley. A quarter of an hour, or thereabouts.

VOL. XII.

Sir W. W. Did they desire to be hid there?

Paseley. Yes, they did; and they were hid there.

Serj. Thompson. Now tell us, after such time as they were taken, what they said, and what you observed?

Paseley. After they were taken they said nothing to me, my lord, nor none of them did speak to me after the boat had taken them.

Serj. Thompson. But what happened after they were taken?

Paseley. After they were taken, captain Billop ordered them to go into the boat, and us with them; and when we came to Whitehall-stairs, one of them said to me, Master, when you come upon your examination, say you were bound for Flanders, and not for France.

Serj. Thompson. Which was that that said so?

Paseley. It was Elliot, and he gave me half-a-crown to bear my expences that night, and said he would remember to take care of us afterwards.

Serj. Thompson. Did they give any money to the seamen?

Paseley. Yes, Ashton gave one of my men half-a-crown, and bid him say he was bound for Flanders, and not for France; and my lord's man gave my other man half-a-crown.

L. C. J. Holt. Was my lord Preston by when that money was given?

Paseley. My lord was upon the bridge, but not near me.

Serj. Thompson. If my lord have any questions to ask him, we have done with him for the present.

L. Preston. No, my lord, I have no questions to ask him.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Was my lord Preston by when the direction was given you, to say you were to go to Flanders, and not to France?

Paseley. I say, he was upon the bridge, but was not near me.

Serj. Tremain. What discourse had you on board with any of them?

Paseley. Very little. They asked me if I thought they should go clear, and I told them, yes, I thought they might.

Serj. Tremain. Clear of what?

Paseley. Clear of the vessels searching. They examined me that night I was at the Seven Stars, if I knew the way of the Swing, on the back of the channel, to go clear of the town; I told them I did not know the way by the back of the sands by Margaret's, but the Swing would not keep them clear of the town.

Serj. Tremain. Was there a note written whither you were to come?

Paseley. Yes, there was a note written to meet them at the Seven Stars in the Little Piazzas.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Whereabouts is Burdet's house?

Paseley. That is in Queen-street, in the city.

Serj. Tremain. You, Paseley, did the waterman that brought them on board, leave two coats behind him?

Paseley. Yes, the waterman did leave two coats, and I put them into my chest; and afterwards they broke open my chest, and took them out, and brought them to my Lord Chief Justice's.

Serj. Tremain. Then we will next produce that waterman. Set up Charles Betsworth.

Serj. Thompson. Come, will you give us an account who you carried on board a smack, and what happened?

Betsworth. I was going over the water from Surry-stairs about seven or eight o'clock, and a gentleman at the stairs called sculler, and asked me if I would carry him down the river. Said I, How far? Says he, To the Tower. Said I, It is against tide, and I can't carry you down so low. He said, he would stay till the tide turned. Said I, If I be out of my bed so long, I deserve to be well paid for it; if you will give me half-a-crown, I'll carry you down. Says he, I'll give it you. So then I came ashore, and he asked me what my name was. I told him, Charles Betsworth. Says he, Will you be sure to stay for us? Yes, said I, if you will be sure to come. If I be not at the stairs, I'll be at that alehouse there in the corner. So I staid, and carried a fare or two over the water; and then about eleven o'clock, as I was sitting in the house, a gentleman comes, and calls Charles—and so out I went to my boat, and took them in. There was one man, as I suppose, in the stern, and he that called me out followed me down; and by and bye came three more into my boat; one of them had a whitish cloak on, and the other a grey loose coat, and a red bag of the quantity of a peck; and so we put off, and rowed away; and just under the Temple-wall, which was all the words I heard from them that I can remember, says one gentleman, When do you hear the king goes away? and another made answer, and said, On Tuesday. So we rowed down through bridge; and when we were through bridge, they asked where the vessel lay; and he that was in the stern said, it was Southwark side, over-against the Tower, and bid me row over thither. And when we came just below Battle-bridge, that man said, That is she that rides a-head of us. I looked, and she had a pennant up. So they were put on board; and as soon as they were on board, she went off; and I rowed up to the bridge, and went through bridge, and came up as far as ——— and there I stayed, and took my sculls and my staff out of my boat; and when I took them out, I missed my clothes. Says I, God bless me, I have lost my clothes; but then I thought it was but a still tide, and therefore I would try if I could overtake them; for I thought they could not be got far, there being little or no wind; so I went down to the place where the vessel lay, and she was gone; and I inquired of several smacks that lay there, but could hear nothing; and I rowed as low as Limehouse-Reach; and about Blackwall and Limehouse-Reach I came up to a smack that I supposed was she, and cried out, Ho the smack; and they answered me, So. I asked them, if I did not bring a fare aboard that smack awhile ago? Then they said, No. I told them, I had brought a fare aboard some smack that lay about Horsleydown and Pickle-Herring-stairs, and they had got two coats of mine, which I had forgotten; and it had a pennant up when they went on board, but this had none; so I rowed on further, till I came as far as Barkin-Sherf; and I thought, there being so little wind, that none could be gone beyond me, and therefore waited to see a smack with a pennant coming down, but I could not meet with it; and there I lay all night in my waistcoat, and the next day I came back to Greenwich; and as I came along, I went on board several vessels to inquire, because I took her for an attendant upon a man of war; but I could not hear of my clothes, till last Friday was seven-night two watermen came, and brought me the clothes I lost.

L. C. J. Then you have your clothes again?

Betsworth. Yes, I have.

Serj. Thompson. Pray look upon that gentleman there, my lord Preston, are you sure that he was one of them that was in your boat?

Betsworth. I can't tell that ever I saw him in my life before.

Serj. Tremain. You, Paseley, I ask you, was my lord Preston one of the gentlemen the waterman brought on board your smack?

Paseley. Yes, he was.

Serj. Tremain. Is that the waterman?

Paseley. Truly, my lord, I can't tell; but the waterman's coat was left on board.

Serj. Tremain. Then let me ask you another question, had you a pennant?

Paseley. Yes, I had when I came on board.

Serj. Tremain. Did you take in your pennant?—Paseley. Yes, I did afterwards.

Serj. Tremain. Why did you take it in?

Paseley. They asked me if there was a pennant, and I told them yes; and they bid me take it in.

Serj. Tremain. Who bid you take it in?

Paseley. Elliot did; so we took it down.

Serj. Thompson. Will my lord ask Betsworth any questions?

L. Preston. No, I have nothing to say to him.

Serj. Tremain. What did they carry on board with them, Paseley?

Paseley. They had nothing on board but the trunk and hamper that were brought down before from Burdet's house; and there was nothing brought in the boat but only a leather bag.

Serj. Tremain. Then set up Fisher. I think his name is John Fisher. You was one of the seamen that did belong to the smack, I think?

Fisher. Yes, I was.

Serj. Thompson. Pray then tell us, who were brought thither, and what happened upon it?

Fisher. About six hours before they came on board us, our master came himself on board, and took me along with him ; but whither I was to go then I did not know. He carried me to a house in the city, and there gave me a small trunk to carry, and a hamper to a porter ; and we went away with them ; and he bid us at Billingsgate carry them on board, which we did.

L. C. J. Holt. When was the trunk and hamper brought on board ?

Fisher. About six or seven o'clock at night, on Wednesday, I think.

L. C. J. Holt. Well, and what followed ?

Fisher. My lord, and Mr. Ashton and Mr. Elliot, and my lord's man, and the master, came on board between eleven and twelve: there was no more came on board that I know of; but we were asleep when they came on board; and immediately our master ordered us to haul up the anchor. Now there was but little wind stirring; and by that time we were fallen down as low as the Half-way-Tree, it being still flood, we could go no farther: so there we were ordered to stop, and we lay by till morning: and about eight in the morning we weighed anchor again; and about nine, when we came to the George man of war, they hid; they desired to go down into the quarters, and we laid the hatches upon them.

Serj. Tremain. What kind of place is it that they hid in ?

Fisher. They could not stand upright, nor sit upright; but they must lie, or lean upon their elbows. So when we were got below the ship, they came up again into the cabin: and when we came at Gravesend near the Block-house, then they hid again till we were below the Block-house; and then we spied a boat coming, which made them to keep below; and there they continued till captain Billop took them.

Serj. Tremain. Were they all four there ?

Fisher. Yes, all four.

Serj. Tremain. After they were taken, what said they ?

Fisher. After such time as they were taken, and come up to Whitehall stairs, captain Ashton gave me a half-crown piece, and bid me say, they were going to Flanders, and not to France.

Serj. Tremain. But whither were you going ?

Fisher. Truly, I did not know where we were to go, till since we came on shore. I understood nothing till they hid; and then indeed I thought we were going to France.

Serj. Tremain. When did any body tell you, you were to go to France ?

Fisher. Since we came on shore.

Serj. Thompson. Will my lord ask him any questions ?—L. Preston. No.

Serj. Tremain. Then the next witness we call is one Amonds. Pray tell us what you know of this matter.

Amonds. May it please you, my lord, I know nothing concerning my master's business; but all that I know of this business is, that they came on board about twelve o'clock at night; and I was then asleep in the cabin, and hearing some come on board, and my master call, I looked out, and there were three or four gentlemen, and my master; and he ordered us to set sail immediately, and make our way down as fast as we could. There was little or no wind: so that when we came down to the Half-way-Tree, we were forced to come to an anchor; and there we rid at anchor till it was broad day, when there was a brave gale to the westward; and by that time we got down to Long-Reach, about nine o'clock, we came to the George frigate, a man of war; and they understanding that, desired to hide these gentlemen.—L. C. J. Holt. What gentlemen ?

Amonds. My lord Preston, Mr. Ashton, and Mr. Elliot, and the other gentleman that was with them.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Look upon my lord there, was he one ?

Amonds. Yes, that gentleman was one.

L. C. J. Holt. Well, go on.

Amonds. And so, Sir, after we were passed the frigate, they came up again, and did not design to go down any more till they see some other danger. When we came almost to Gravesend, they went down again: when we passed the Block-house I was at the helm; and they were resolving to go to dinner, and bid that man, my fellow, to reach them some victuals out of the hamper: and while he was reaching them some victuals, I see the pinnace coming towards us: said I, here is a pinnace coming aboard: says my lord, and they, we must go down again and hide; and so they did go down again; we apprehended that they were coming aboard to press us, and they had no mind to be seen. When the pinnace came near, they waved to us in this manner, as much as to bid us stay: so we laid the sail by, and staid for them till they came up; and when the captain came on board, says he, this is worth our coming on board; here are a couple of brisk seamen will do the king service; I must have them, I think. Says I, I hope not so, noble captain: says he, have you any thing to keep yourselves clear? Yes, says our master. I am sorry for that, says the captain. What is it? Says the master, I have a protection. Says the captain, let us see your protection: so the master pulls out his protection, and shews it. Well, says the captain, I must look a little further; and away he goes into the cabin, and takes up the hatches, where these gentlemen were. Says the captain, hye, hye, who is here? Turn out, says he: but I suppose they did not make so much haste as the captain expected; so he called some of his men on board; and when they came on board, my lord came out, and the rest of the gentlemen; and says my lord to the captain, I hope you will be so kind as not to take any thing from us. Says he, I will meddle with nothing but papers; it is papers I look for; and put his hands in both his pockets, and pulled out papers, and put them into his own pocket; but whether they were new or old, I cannot tell: and there was a watch likewise, but that he gave my lord again, and said, I will meddle with nothing but papers. Then he searched Mr. Elliot; and Mr. Ashton was the last that came out; and there was one of the captain's watermen in the cabin with him; and says he, and please you, noble captain, that gentleman put something in his bosom. Says the captain, what did you put in your bosom, Sir? Nothing, says he, but my handkerchief.

L. C. J. Holt. Who said so?

Amonds. Mr. Ashton, and shews him his handkerchief; and afterwards the captain put his hand in Mr. Ashton's bosom, and pulled it out.

Serj. Thompson. What did he pull out?

Amonds. A roll of papers, with a piece of lead to it.

Serj. Thompson. Did you see the lead fixed to the papers?

Amonds. I did see it fixed to the packthread that tied the papers.

Serj. Tremain. What sort of place is it in which they were taken?

Amonds. They could not sit, nor stand upright in it.

Serj. Tremain. Had you any money given you?

Amonds. I had half-a-crown given me by my lord's man.

L. C. J. Holt. Who was it gave you the money?

Amonds. It was my lord's man; he that was on board the ship: he gave me half-a-crown in Whitehall, and said, I should say we were bound for Flanders, and not for France; but who the half-crown came from I cannot tell, my lord said nothing to me at all.

Serj. Tremain. Did you hear any discourse as they came down?

Amonds. No, I did not mind any thing of discourse; for I never came among them, unless it were at the hour of watching.

L. Preston. Pray did I say any thing to you at Whitehall?

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, your way is to propose your questions to the court, and they will ask them for you.

L. Preston. My lord, I desire to ask him, if I said any thing to him at Whitehall?

L. C. J. Holt. What say you, did my lord Preston say any thing to you at Whitehall?

Amonds. No, my lord, he never said any thing to me at all; it was his man that gave me the half-crown, and spoke to me.

L. C. J. Holt. Will your lordship ask him any other questions?

L. Preston. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. Then call your next witness.

Serj. Tremain. Swear capt. Billop.

[Which was done.

Serj. Thompson. Come, captain Billop, pray will you tell my lord and the jury, where you did apprehend my lord Preston, and the circumstances of what happened at their taking.

Capt. Billop. Sir, I met with them at the upper end of the Hope.

Serj. Thompson. Pray give us an account, from the beginning to the end, what passed; how you came with the boat, and all that happened at that time.

Capt. Billop. About two o'clock, or between one and two, upon the last of December, my lord Danby came to me at one of the doors of the House of Lords, and told me his father would speak with me; and he carried me to my lord Lindsey's chamber, where immediately my lord president came, and told me there were some persons going for France about business of dangerous consequence, and he desired me to use some means to get them apprehended. I then proposed what I should have to enable me for the undertaking. My lord Danby said, there was such a boat that he would procure me, and my lord president gave me a letter to another person, who was to instruct me further about this matter. My lord Danby got the boat ready, and some men and arms in it, but I thought there were not arms enough; so I borrowed some arms of my lord Lucas, and about eleven o'clock, as near as I remember, we put off from Tower-wharf. It being very calm, I thought we should be swifter than any vessel, and should have the advantage of them all; and therefore run down as far as Gravesend, and I brought several vessels by the lee, in which time I pressed some Barkin men, two or three of them; and amongst them one that knew the vessels that lie in the river, having been on board several; and we did board divers, and took out some men, having a press-warrant; and he that I had taken of the Barkin men, after he had passed by several vessels, seeing this vessel sailing, told me that was the Thomas and Elizabeth: whereupon we made up to them, and waving towards them, they staid for us. When we came up, there was standing by the master two lusty sailors, and I told him I would take but one of them: he said he had a protection; I bid him shew it me. When I was come on board, and had looked upon his protection, I told him I must look a little further, and went down into the cabin, and took up the hatches, and there I found them all four lying together.

Serj. Thompson. What four?

Billop. My lord Preston. I did not know him then, nor till afterwards.

Serj. Tremain. Who else was there?

Billop. Mr. Elliot was there, and Mr. Ashton, who were both my former acquaintance; but my lord Preston I had forgotten, till one of them called him my lord, and I asked them what lord it was; and they said it was my lord Preston; so then I saluted my lord: so we rowed up.

Serj. Thompson. Pray, captain, tell us what happened in the vessel before you went out of it, after you found them there?

Billop. I handed my lord Preston up first; and after he came out of that little place, which he was forced to creep out of on his knees, I turned my lord about, and told him I must search him. He said, he hoped I would not meddle with any thing ; I told him I would meddle with nothing but papers ; so I put my hand in his pocket, and took all the papers I could find, and put them in my own pocket ; and taking out a watch, I delivered it to my lord again. The next was Mr. Elliot, and I searched him, and found nothing at all upon him. After that Ashton came up, and one of my men told me, that gentleman had put something in his bosom : whereupon I gave him a sudden turn, his back being towards me, and asked him, what it was that he put in his bosom ? He told me nothing but his handkerchief, and plucked his handkerchief out ; with that I clapped my hand in, and got the packet, and took it out, with the lead fixed to it. I have the lead now in my pocket.

Serj. Tremain. Pray will you produce it, Sir ? [Which he did.]

Billop. This is the lead, several of my men saw it when it was fixed to the packet.

Serj. Thompson. What did you do with the packet ?

Billop. I put it immediately into my pocket, as soon as I had searched Mr. Ashton further, and then commanded these gentlemen all into my boat, and took all the people that belonged to the smack with me, after I had brought her to an anchor, and left two of my men on board of her, and there she rid till next day, when I sent two more of my men to bring her up ; and those two men I ordered to search all the parts of the vessel, and take what they could find ; and whatsoever they found, they should carry it to the Tower, to my lord Lucas ; which, I supposed, they did.

Serj. Tremain. Well, captain Billop, after such time as you had taken these papers, and brought these gentlemen into your boat, pray what discourse had you with them ? What said they to you concerning the papers ?

Billop. It was a pretty while before we talked of any thing : the beginning of our talk was, I remember, they desired to go ashore at Gravesend to refresh themselves, for it was cold, and they had not eaten any thing. It was my lord that desired it ; but I begged his pardon for that, and told him there was a man of war that lay at Long reach, where, as I believed, his lordship would be very well accommodated with any thing he wanted.

Serj. Thompson. Well, what said they afterwards ?

Billop. My lord Preston, after I had saluted him, upon knowing who he was, and Mr. Ashton and Mr. Elliot telling him I was of their acquaintance, he said he was glad he was fallen into the hands of a civil gentleman ; and they said they were glad they were fallen into the hands of an acquaintance. I told my lord, I hoped he should never find any thing otherwise than civil from me. My lord was very civil to me in complimenting, and assuring me he would acknowledge my favour and kindness to him.

Serj. Thompson. Aye, what did he say to you ?

Billop. My lord Preston told me, if ever it lay in his power to do me service he would, and he did not doubt but he might ; and he used a great many words and expressions of kindness, and his readiness to do me service ; and amongst the rest, my lord said once to me, if I would dispose of the packet——

Serj. Thompson. Pray speak that again.

Billop. My lord Preston, in one of his discourses of his kindness in doing me service, had this expression, as near as I can remember, if I would dispose of the packet——

Serj. Tremain. What would he do for you, if you would dispose of the packet ?

Billop. He did not come to any particular instance of what he would do ; but he said he would serve me in any thing that lay in his power. Mr. Elliot and Mr. Ashton discoursed me several times about it : they courted me, and desired me to throw the packet overboard ; but I told them I would not do any thing of that kind : And Mr. Elliot said, that I might take the papers that I took out of my lord Preston's pocket, and tie the lead to them, and say that was the packet, and throw the other overboard. I told him, he took the king's counsel to be odd people, and very indiscreet, that could not find out such a thing as that. After this was over, we had a little interval, and there was a hamper in the boat's stern, and there was some bottles of wine taken out, and we drank several times ; and by and bye we had some discourse a little further about the same thing, and they pressed me to throw the packet away ; and one time particularly Mr. Ashton, I remember, said it would be a generous thing, Billop, if you would go along with us, I think you may do as well there as here.

Serj. Tremain. Whither would he have had you gone with them ?

Billop. He did not name any place, as I remember.

Serj. Tremain. What promises did they any of them make you ?

Billop. Mun Elliot whispered me several times, dear Billop, throw the packet overboard ; what good would it do you to injure so many honest gentlemen ? And Mr. Ashton and Mr. Elliot said, I had it now in my power to make myself as great and as rich as I would be.

Serj. Tremain. What did any of them say about the tide turning ?

Billop. Mun Elliot also said, it was impossible the current or the tide could run long this way or always this way.

Serj. Thompson. When you had refused this that they desired of you, notwithstanding their promises, pray tell us how they turned their discourse into threatenings.

Billop. Elliot told me when nothing would prevail, that every dog had his day ; but I answered, I hoped never to see it your day : but however, said I, pray desist from any such language, for I cannot bear it. After that they never asked me any thing about it.

Serj. Thompson. Now tell us what you did with these gentlemen and these papers afterwards.

Billop. I brought these gentlemen up to my lord Nottingham's office, and delivered the packet with the lead fixed to it, and stood by my lord Nottingham in the room till he had opened the papers, except while my lord Preston was examined; and when he opened the papers I stood by, that I might see him make them up again; and I think I took some of them in my hand, and he said I might read them; but I was uneasy, and not disposed at that time to read many of them; so I did not read them all.

Serj. Tremain. They were all by when Ashton said you would do generously to go along with them, were they not?

Billop. Yes, they were all in the boat.

Serj. Tremain. Did not one of them say to you, I know if captain Billop do serve us, he will do it generously?—Billop. Yes.

Serj. Tremain. Who was it?

Billop. It was Ashton.

L. Preston. I desire I may ask captain Billop a question.

L. C. J. Holt. Pray, my lord, put your question to the court, and they will ask it him.

L. Preston. I desire to know, my lord, where it was I said this to captain Billop, that he would dispose of the packet?

Billop. Just after I had first saluted your lordship, you said you were glad you were fallen into the hands of a civil gentleman.

L. Preston. Was it aboard the boat that I desired you to dispose of the packet?

Billop. Yes, and before we came on board the George frigate, when we drank about, upon the opening of the hamper; it was in the boat I am very sure, and before we came on board the George.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord Preston said to you, you say, he would do you all the kindness that lay in his power, if you would dispose of the packet; how would he have you dispose of it? What did he mean by it?

Billop. I do not remember he used any other word but that, dispose of the packet.

Serj. Thompson. But Ashton and Elliot did desire of you a great many times to throw it overboard?

L. Preston. I desire he may be asked this question. You said you carried these to my lord Nottingham; did you see them opened?

Billop. Yes, I did see them opened, and I saw my lord, as he opened them, lay them one by one, and read them over, and put them up again. And I looked upon several of them, while my lord Nottingham was reading others; and I stood by the fire, and I see my lord make them up, and he tied them with a piece of twine, and he clapped his seal upon them, and delivered them to me; and I went immediately and delivered them to my lord president.

L. Preston. Were you all the while by, while my lord Nottingham was reading the papers?

Billop. Yes, I was by when he opened them, and read them, and staid till he put them up again; and as they came from his hands, I presently carried them to my lord president.

L. Preston. Are you sure, or can you swear that these are the same papers which were taken on board the smack, that you carried from my lord Nottingham to my lord Danby?

Billop. So many of them as I looked into, I marked; and all that I marked I can swear to, and no more than them I cannot.

Serj. Thompson. I think you say that all those papers that you delivered to my lord Nottingham, you saw my lord Nottingham seal up, and all them you carried to my lord president?

Billop. Yes, I did so; all that my lord opened at that time were put together again, and his seal put to them.

L. C. J. Holt. But my lord asks you whether you can swear to the particular papers?

Billop. What I read I marked, and them I can swear to.

L. C. J. Holt. You say you carried all those papers to my lord Nottingham sealed, after he had opened them, to my lord president?

Billop. Yes, my lord, I did see my lord Nottingham open them; I see him make them up again, and when they were made up, he put his seal to them, and I carried them to my lord president.

Juryman. My lord, I desire captain Billop may be asked one question.

L. C. J. Holt. Ay, what is it you would ask him?

Juryman. I desire to know whether the papers were sealed when he took them and brought them to my lord Nottingham?

Billop. No, they were all tied up together with a tape, or a twine, I think with both, very fast together.

Juryman. There was no seal on them when he took them?

Billop. No; but there were several letters within the packet that were sealed.

L. C. J. Holt. Was not the outside of the packet sealed?

Billop. I do not remember the outside was sealed: there was a cover, but as near as I remember, they were folds of paper fast tied together.

Serj. Thompson. You delivered them as you took them to my lord Nottingham?

Billop. Yes, I never took them out of my pocket, after I had taken them from Mr. Ashton, till I came to my lord Nottingham's office, where I delivered them to him.

Serj. Thompson. Had you ever opened them, or seen them opened, before they came to the hands of my lord Nottingham?

Billop. No indeed.

Serj. Tremain. Then set up Johnson. [Which was done.] Pray tell us what you know of this matter.

Johnson. I was in my lord Dunblain's barge, and I went down with this captain Billop, and we were on board several vessels; and we light upon a ketch, where we pressed some men. We thought it had been only some seamen that were to be pressed, we did not know of any thing else. When we had rowed down as far as you have heard, we rowed up again, and searched several little vessels and smacks that were in the river, when a fisherman that we had pressed said, that that was the vessel the captain inquired after: and then the captain bid us take some small arms, and I took a pistol and went on board. The captain read the protection, and then said, he must look further. When the captain looked into one of the cabins, and took up the hatches, I saw a great piece of roast beef, and my lord Preston by it, and a mince pie, and a fowl, and we took the beef out; but my lord's man said, he missed his knife, it lay upon the bench: and then came my lord up, and his man, and Mr. Elliot; and when Mr. Ashton (the man with the pock-holes) came up, he went down again, and pretended to look for his hat; but when he was down I see him cram something into his bosom, and I told the captain I had seen him put something into his bosom; and the captain took him hold by the buttons of his coat, and turned him about, and asked him what he had put into his bosom? He said nothing but his handkerchief; and pulling it out of his bosom, he shewed it to the captain; but the captain put his hand into Mr. Ashton's bosom, and pulled out the packet.

Serj. Thompson. You say you see him put something in his bosom, when he went down. Did you observe whence he took it?

Johnson. It was upon the gravel, and there were a couple of seals, which he afterwards took up, lying by; and I believe he took up the packet and forgot the seals.

Serj. Tremain. Pray let us see the seals.

Sol. Gen. Your lordship observes, the packet was not at first in Mr. Ashton's bosom.

L. C. J. Holt. No, it was not.

Sol. Gen. But he took it up from the place where the seals lay, and put it into his bosom. Pray in what place did this packet and these seals lie?

Johnson. Upon the ballast, for they had shoved away the board.

Sol. Gen. Was my lord Preston upon the ballast?

Johnson. Yes, my lord lay almost upon his back; he was the first that we saw, and he came out first. They were all four lying together there.

Sol. Gen. Who lay next my lord Preston?

Johnson. My lord's footman; Mr. Ashton lay next, and Mr. Elliot lay next.

Sol. Gen. Where were the seals then?

Johnson. My lord was the first that I see come up.

Sol. Gen. But I ask you where the seals were?

Johnson. The seals were down upon the ballast; whether they were my lord's or no, I cannot tell, or whose they were?

Serj. Tremain. Now that we will ask captain Billop. Are these the seals?

Billop. Yes, these are the seals this man gave me.

Johnson. I took them from off the ballast.

Serj. Thompson. Did my lord own these to be his seals?

Billop. I did not ask him, that I know of.

Serj. Thompson. Well, Johnson, go on, tell what you know further.

Johnson. After we came to Long-Reach, a gentleman that had a long perriwig, a black gentleman, Mr. Elliot I think they call him, had a pair of whiskers on when he was taken, and he took a pair of scissars and cut them both off; and he said, if ever he lived, he should remember me, having a tooth out, because I was so sharp upon him as to make him come out: and when we came on board the George frigate, in Long-Reach, my lord's man came to me, and said he would give me something to drink, if I would deliver him the seals.

L. C. J. Holt. Had you any discourse with my lord Preston himself about them?

Johnson. No, it was his footman that came to me, and said there was no body there but myself and him: I had them, and he would give me something to drink, if I would deliver them; but I delivered them to captain Billop.

L. Preston. My lord, may I ask a question or two of this witness?

L. C. J. Holt. Yes, my lord, if they have done with him. What say you, brother Thompson?

Serj. Thompson. We shall have done with him presently, my lord. Pray had you any money given you?

Johnson. No, but my lord gave the ship's company ten shillings to drink, and one piece was a brass half-crown.

Serj. Thompson. What did they say as they went along, as you remember?

Johnson. They had a great deal of discourse while we rowed. I was at the next oar to them, but I cannot tell what it was.

Serj. Thompson. Who did discourse?

Johnson. Ashton, Elliot, and the captain.

Serj. Thompson. Cannot you remember what they said, any of them?

Johnson. They did talk together several times; Elliot said he was a-cold, and came and rowed at the oar awhile; and Elliot swore an oath; says he, they row all as if they were rowing to prison; but truly I did not much mind their discourse, I minded my rowing. There were some victuals handed to us, which we did eat.

Serj. Tremain. Did Elliot seem to be angry? What did they say?

Johnson. Elliot wished that a thunderbolt might drop into the boat several times, and sink it; and when we went through bridge against tide, he wished that London-bridge might have fallen upon our heads.

L. Preston. Now I would ask him, if your lordship please, did you see Ashton take up the packet?

Johnson. Yes, I did, as it lay by the seals.

L. Preston. I perceive there seems to be some stress laid upon my lying next to Mr. Ashton, and seals lying by the packet.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, there has been no inference made from that yet by the king's counsel.

L. Preston. My lord, it is in vain to deny we were all together there.

Johnson. You were the first that I see, my lord.

L. Preston. We were all together; but there is no such thing to be gathered from thence as they would insinuate; but I suppose it would be deduced from hence, as if this packet, because it lay near these seals, should be my packet.

L. C. J. We have not yet heard, my lord, what use they will make of it.

L. Preston. But I desire to take notice of it, my lord; and I think it is a very hard presumption, because we were in one place, and the seals a little distance from the packet, therefore the packet must be presumed to be mine; I hope it shall not be presumed against me.

L. C. J. Holt. Since your lordship mentions it, I will take notice a little of it too: It is only a circumstantial evidence that is made use of against you; how far it will weigh, is to be left to the jury, when all the evidence is heard. The packet is found in the place where your lordship lay, and by it seals that belong to you; one is the seal of your office, as secretary of state, the other is your own proper coat of arms.

Juryman. With submission, my lord, I desire this witness may be asked this question, Whether he saw captain Billop take the packet out of Ashton's bosom?—Johnson. Yes, I did.

Juryman. And whether he saw Billop deliver the same packet to my lord Nottingham?

Johnson. No, I did not.

L. C. J. Holt. You gentlemen of the jury, consider this; he was not then by. Captain Billop tells you, that very packet which he took out of Ashton's bosom he carried to my lord Nottingham; and he tells you, my lord opened it in his presence, and he is sure he put all the papers together again, and set his own seal upon them, and then he took them from my lord Nottingham, and carried them to my lord president.

Johnson. As soon as I came to Whitehall, I was set centinel over those three men that came out of the smack, and was not admitted into the room.

Sol. Gen. Then we must desire my lord Nottingham may be sworn.

The Earl of Nottingham sworn.

Serj. Tremain. Where are the papers?

E. of Nottingham. Mr. Bridgman, I think you have the papers.

Sol. Gen. Pray, my lord, does your lordship remember captain Billop brought a bundle of papers to you, and what became of them? Will your lordship be pleased to give the court and the jury an account of it?

E. of Nott. My lord, all that I have to say in this matter is, captain Billop brought to me a bundle of papers tied about with a packthread, to which was fixed a piece of lead, I believe the same piece that was now produced; at least it was one very like it. He brought also a signet, which I presume I can know again when I see it.

Serj. Thompson. Pray shew my lord the seals. [Which was done.]

E. of Nott. This is the signet I presume which he brought to me; I am sure he brought just such a one, if not the same. Those papers, when he delivered them to me, I opened in his presence, and when I had so done, I read them, and put them up together again, and sealed them with my own seal, and delivered them to him back again. What the papers are, and what he did with them, I suppose he will give you an account.

L. C. J. Holt. But your lordship says, the bundle of papers he delivered to you, you sealed up, and delivered to him again.

E. of Nott. All those papers that he brought to me I did seal up, and deliver back to him again.

Serj. Thompson. Pray, my lord, were they ever out of captain Billop's sight while your lordship had them?

E. of Nott. Not after they were opened. There was a little paper that was tied to the bundle, which fell loose upon the taking away the lead, and I opened that while he was by, and the bundle lay upon the table while I examined my lord Preston; and after my lord Preston was gone out, I called in captain Billop (who went out while I examined my lord), and I opened that great packet in his sight, and read the papers, and he read some of them; and all the papers in the great packet, and the little paper that was stuck in, I delivered, sealed up, to captain Billop.

Serj. Thompson. Pray, my lord, were the letters in the packet sealed?

E. of Nott. Yes, there were some of them sealed; and all that I received from him I delivered to him, and no more.

L. C. J. Holt. The gentlemen of the jury hear what my lord says.

E. of Nott. The very same, all, and no more, I say.

Serj. Thompson. Captain Billop, when you had them back from my lord of Nottingham, pray to whom did you deliver them?

Billop. To my lord president.

Serj. Tremain. Then we must desire my lord president would be pleased to be sworn.

The Marquis of Carmarthen, Lord President of the Council, was sworn.

Sol. Gen. We must desire the favour of your lordship to acquaint the court, when captain Billop came to your lordship, what he said, and what he brought with him.

L. President. Captain Billop did bring me a bundle of papers, and he told me he brought them from my lord of Nottingham, and they were sealed, wrapped up with a packthread, and sealed with a seal, which I knew to be my lord's seal. He delivered them to me myself; and these papers I kept till I shewed them the king the next morning. And after I had shewed them the king, the king delivered them up back to me, having read some of them, and commanded they should be delivered to the cabinet-council. A cabinet-council was called, and accordingly there I did deliver them, paper by paper, and they were all marked by my lord Sidney, and some I think by my lord Marlborough; and so I delivered them altogether to my lord Sidney.

Sol. Gen. Then we desire my lord Sidney would please to be sworn.

The Lord Sidney sworn.

Serj. Thompson. Will your lordship please to acquaint the court and the jury, what papers were delivered to you, and by whom, and where those papers are?

L. Sidney. The papers that were delivered by my lord president, I have kept them, my lord, ever since. As soon as I had them, I read them, and marked them with the letter of my own name, the letter H. I have kept them ever since, only one morning I gave them to Mr. Bridgman to be copied out as soon as he could, and he delivered them me back again, and they have not been out of my custody since; only the night before last night they were sent to Mr. Solicitor to read, and brought immediately to me again.

Sol. Gen. To whom did your lordship deliver them to be copied?

L. Sidney. To Mr. Bridgman, I tell you.

Sol. Gen. So that they were never out of your lordship's hands till now, but only in Mr. Bridgman's hands?

L. Sidney. No, I kept them in my pocket ever since, only the night before last, when they were sent to you.

Sol. Gen. Did your lordship mark them before they were delivered to Mr. Bridgman to copy?

L. Sidney. Yes, I marked them when I received them.

L. Preston. My lord chief justice; your lordship does observe that captain Billop swears that they were never out of his possession till he delivered them to my lord Nottingham; my lord Nottingham says he never opened them, but left the packet upon the table while I was examining.

L. C. J. Holt. Pray, my lord, will you speak a little louder, that I may hear you?

L. Preston. My lord, I am saying, my lord Nottingham says, that while he was examining me, the packet lay upon the table unopened, and were never out of his eye till he sent them sealed by captain Billop, and so they come to my lord president, and they were kept by my lord president. My lord president says, my lord Churchill saw the papers, and they were in his possession.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord Preston, your lordship does mistake my lord president: he does not say that they were in my lord Marlborough's hands; but he did communicate them at the cabinet-council, where my lord Marlborough was. He said, indeed, they were in the king's hands, but he was by all the while.

L. Preston. From that time they came out of my lord president's hands, I know not what may be put in, nor what taken out. These papers were not sealed, as I hear of, afterwards; and passing through so many hands, nobody knows what may be done to them. Truly, I think it very hard to swear, after all this, that these are the papers that were on board the smack.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Will you please to ask any questions to satisfy yourself of any of these noble lords?

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, I'll put your lordship right.

L. Preston. With all my heart, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. Your lordship hears what captain Billop says. He says, he brought them as he took them out of Ashton's bosom, to my lord Nottingham; my lord Nottingham opened them before him, and did deliver them to him again, having made them up: my lord Nottingham says, the same papers captain Billop delivered him, he delivered back again, all, and no more; and Billop says, he carried them to my lord president; my lord president shewed them to the king, and afterwards carried them to the cabinet-council; there the same papers were opened, and there they were marked, some by my lord Marlborough, and all by my lord Sidney.

L. Preston. Your lordship will please to observe this: my lord Nottingham was pleased to say, he opened no papers till I was called in and examined, and then captain Billop withdrew. Now, my lord, I don't know whether the captain can say that these were the very same papers that he took in the smack?

L. C. J. Holt. Captain Billop says, that he saw the papers opened by my lord Nottingham.

Billop. My lord Preston observes a thing that is very right, my lord, that after I had delivered the packet to my lord Nottingham, while my lord was examined, I withdrew; but my lord Nottingham has given your lordship an account, that he had not opened the packet then, but only the small letter or note that lay apart from the rest: but, my lord, the packet was in the same condition when I came in again, upon the table, as when I left it: my lord Nottingham, as I believe, had not opened that packet; for I found it just as I left it, upon the table.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. My lord Nottingham says, he delivered back to captain Billop all the papers that he received from him: they were never out of my lord Nottingham's presence; nor were they opened, as my lord says, but in Billop's presence, nor opened till after my lord's examination, except the little paper that was stuck in, and was loose upon taking away the lead.

Sol. Gen. Pray swear Mr. Bridgman. [Which was done.]

Serj. Thompson. Pray, when you received the bundle of papers from my lord Sidney, to whom were they carried, and to whom were they delivered?

Mr. Bridgman. My lord Sidney gave me these papers to have them copied, and I copied some of them with my own hand, the others I delivered to Mr. Poultney, and were copied in my presence in the office: they were never out of my sight; and as soon as ever they were copied, I carried them back to my lord Sidney, and delivered them to him myself.

L. Preston. Were any of them taken from you, Sir?

Mr. Bridgman. My lord, I say I copied some of them myself, the others were copied in my sight and presence, in the office.

Serj. Thompson. Pray, Sir, let me ask you one question? Were the same papers that were delivered to you by my lord Sidney, re-delivered back again and unaltered?

Mr. Bridgman. I am very sure I gave them all, the same back again, because I read them every one before they were copied.

Serj. Thompson. Did you observe my lord Sidney had marked them before you had them?

Mr. Bridgman. Yes, they were all marked before I had them.

L. Preston. My lord, I desire to ask Mr. Bridgman this question: pray, Sir, were they sealed up when you sent them to my lord Sidney?

Mr. Bridgman. No, they were not sealed, they were tied up; but about the seals I remember when I was in my lord Sidney's office—

L. C. J. Holt. The question is asked you, whether you carried them back sealed or no?

Mr. Bridgman. No, they were not sealed when they were delivered to me; but I can safely swear they were never out of my custody till I delivered them back again; for what I did not copy myself, were copied in my sight.

Serj. Thompson. But your lordship is pleased to observe, they were all marked by my lord Sidney before they were delivered unto him.

Sol. Gen. Then, my lord, we have done with our living witnesses for the present, and will read the papers.

Mr. Bridgman. One thing, my lord, I do remember; as soon as my lord Sidney received the papers back again, he looked over every one of them, and read them, and looked upon the marks.

L. Preston. If your lordship please, I would beg the favour to ask one question of my lord Sidney: pray, my lord, did your lordship number the papers?

L. Sidney. No, my lord, I did not number them.

L. Preston. But your lordship says upon your oath and honour, that those are the very marks upon them that your lordship set there?

Sol. Gen. We are indeed to produce them, and then we shall ask that particular question.

L. C. J. Holt. My lord Sidney will see them, and then he will answer your lordship's question.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. My lord Preston, my lord Nottingham is here a witness, and his occasions call him away, have you a mind to ask him any more questions?

L. Preston. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. What say you, gentlemen, have you any farther occasion for my lord Nottingham?

Sol. Gen. My lord, we must beg his lordship's patience, we do not know what occasion there may be: I desire this paper may be shewn to my lord Sidney. [Which was done.]

L. Sidney. That is my mark; that paper I know is one of the papers.

Serj. Tremain. Here are two of them; one of these is the copy of the other: both were taken in the same packet; the one is fairer written than the other.

Sol. Gen. Gentlemen, the paper we are now offering to you is that which I mentioned before; it is the result of a conference: there were two of them taken in this bundle; the one of them seems to be the first draught, the other is a copy more fairly written; but I think they are both in effect the same: however, they were both taken in the same packet, and you shall hear them read.

L. Preston. My lord, I desire that before it be read it may be shewn to captain Billop, to know whether it be the very paper that he took.

L. C. J. Holt. Ay, let captain Billop look upon it.

Billop. My lord, I do not remember that paper.

L. Preston. Your lordship observes that captain Billop cannot swear that this was one of the papers that he took.

Billop. All the papers that I looked into I marked, and all the papers that I marked I can swear to, and no others.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Did you look into all the papers?

Billop. No, I did not.

L. C. J. Holt. But he swears, all that he brought to my lord Nottingham were sealed up by my lord Nottingham, and carried by him from my lord Nottingham to my lord president; and my lord president swears, he delivered them all to my lord Sidney; and my lord Sidney swears, this is one of those papers.

L. Preston. Certainly, my lord's swearing to a paper in this manner cannot be a good proof. My circumstances, my lord, are very hard; and your lordship, I have heard, ought to be of counsel for me in any point of law; and, my lord, I humbly desire to know, whether this can be a proof of a paper that he says was taken in a packet, and yet he cannot swear it?

L. C. J. Holt. My lord, he does not swear that this was one of the papers; but the question is, Whether all these witnesses together do not prove it? You see how the evidence runs: all the papers taken were delivered to my lord Nottingham; all that were delivered to him were sent back by him sealed, and delivered to my lord president; my lord president brought them all to the cabinet-council, and delivered them to my lord Sidney; and this, my lord Sidney says, is one of those papers.

L. Preston. My lord, I have a very great honour for that noble lord; and I am sure, if he had not been upon his oath, he would have said that which was truth; but in this condition that I am in, I must crave leave to observe every thing that I can for myself; and I cannot but say, these papers are very oddly managed, and delivered up and down from one hand to another; I desire your lordship would please to observe, that these papers are here brought after a very odd manner.

Serj. Thompson. My lord Preston, you are not to sum up the evidence to the jury till we have done, nor to make your observations.

L. C. J. Holt. Brother, my lord opposes the reading of the paper, as not well proved.

L. Preston. I do so, my lord; and I hope your lordship will advise me, whether you do think it a sufficient evidence and proof of these papers. They are papers that have been copied out, and sent unsealed from hand to hand by some messengers from one to another; and which now appear to be unsealed, and some of which he that took them cannot swear to.

Juryman. My lord, we cannot hear one word that is said.

L. Preston. That is my misfortune; but I am urging to my lords the judges, whether this paper ought to be read; and I desire your lordship to advise me, whether it can be admitted as evidence, being thus oddly proved.

L. C. J. Holt. It is evidence, surely, my lord; but the question is, what credit the jury will give to this evidence? The jury are judges of that: but certainly it is evidence to have the paper read.

L. Preston. I doubt not but your lordship will do me justice, and I readily acquiesce in what your lordships do appoint.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Pray, my lord, see how the evidence stands about this matter. First, it is sworn by Billop, that he took a bundle of papers; though it is true, the particulars he does not undertake to swear to. Well, what is next? Why, says he, all that was in that bundle I carried to my lord Nottingham, and I received from my lord Nottingham all that I carried to him. What says my lord Nottingham? He swears I delivered back again to captain Billop the same papers he delivered to me, and all, and no more, sealed up with my seal. When he has sealed it up, what does he do with it? Why, he carries it to my lord president. Is there any possibility of creeping out of this evidence? Well, he delivers them to my lord Sidney, and my lord Sidney says, this is one of those papers. Can there be a plainer evidence than this? When he says, all he had he carried to my lord Nottingham; and my lord Nottingham swears, all he did receive he sent back, sealed by him, to my lord president; and my lord president swears, all he received, so sealed, he gave to my lord Sidney; and my lord Sidney swears, this is one of those papers.

L. Preston. But your lordship will please to observe, they were carried to the king, and they were in the hands of my lord Marlborough.

L. C. J. Holt. No, my lord, not out of the sight of my lord president. My lord president says, my lord Marlborough marked some of them, but they were delivered to my lord Sidney; and my lord Sidney does say, they are the same papers that he had from my lord president; and my lord president says, they are the same that were brought him by captain Billop from my lord Nottingham; and my lord Nottingham swears, he sealed them, the same papers, all, and no more than he received from captain Billop.

L. C. Baron. Your lordship should observe where the defect of the proof is, and then it may be supplied; for truly, put it all together, I cannot see how there could be a plainer proof given.

L. Preston. My lord, I desire to be heard as to this: my lord president was pleased to say, that some of them were delivered to the king.

L. C. J. Holt. No, they were shewn to the king; but my lord president was by all the while that the king did read them.

L. Preston. My lord, where a man's life lies at stake, and all that is dear to him, your lordship will certainly allow him to make what observations he can for himself.

L. C. J. Holt. Ay, in God's name, by all means: you shall have all the liberty you can desire.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we desire my lord president will be pleased to look upon those papers. [Which was done.]

L. President. This is one of the papers that I received from captain Billop, and which I shewed to the king, and which I brought to the cabinet-council; and this is another of the papers.

L. Preston. Pray, my lord, was your lordship by when his majesty read those letters?

L. President. Yes, my lord, I was.

L. Preston. My lord, I ask it for this end, to know whether they were out of your lordship's sight.

L. President. No, never; I was in the King's-cabinet; his majesty read some of them, and then put them up again, and gave them me; and I delivered them at the cabinet-council to my lord Sidney.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we desire this paper may be read.

L. C. J. Holt. Read it.

Clerk of the Peace reads.

"The Result of a Conference between some Lords and Gentlemen, both Tories and Whigs, in which it was undertaken to prove the possibility and method of restoring by a Fr. Power, without endangering the Protestant Religion, and Civil Administration, according to the laws of this kingdom.

"1. F. must either oblige or conquer us: if the last, he will find few helps here; but a bloodier resistance than ever the Romans, Saxons, or Normans found: it being incredible, how unanimous and obstinate that very thought renders the people; so that it may make us a heap of ruin, but no nation that can ever help or import any thing to F.

"2. If K. L. desires to oblige us, and make the work easy, that he may be at leisure to ply the empire or Italy, or to have an advantageous peace, he must take off the frightful character we have of him, and shew us he has no such design as returning our offended K. a conqueror upon us, but that he can, and will be our friend, and mediator; upon which terms he will find, that many lords and gentlemen will speedily shew themselves to his satisfaction; especially if he makes haste, and loses no approaching opportunity.

"3. If he incline to this sort of sense, he must over-rule the bigotry of St. G. and dispose their minds to think of those methods that are more likely to gain the nation; for there is one silly thing or other daily done there, that comes to our notice here, which prolongs what they so passionately desire. The methods thought upon are these:

"First, To prevent dangerous and foolish intelligence, by forbidding all in that court to write any news hither, and that K. J. only have his correspondence by whom to hear from, and speak to people here; since letters so often miscarry, and are filled with nothing but what we should not hear; and what we have are arguments for the most part against the K.'s restoration.

"Secondly, Since there is a great body of Protestants that never defected, and that many thousands are returning, and that they are the natural weight and power of these kingdoms, by having the heads, hands, and wealth of their side, to the odds and advantage of at least two hundred Protestants to one Catholic; the K. may think of nothing short of a Protestant administration, nor of nothing more for the Catholics than a legal liberty of conscience; for much e mutt is against all other notions, to which all private passions, and artificial frames in government, must yield or break. He may reign a Catholic in devotion, but he must reign a Protestant in government. Cromwell could not, yet on a broader bottom, with a victorious army, subsist or keep what he had got.

"Thirdly, He must give us a model of this at St. G. by preferring the Protestants that are with him above the Catholics; one being loyal upon less ties of interest; and to tell the nation here what they are to hope for when he comes.

"Fourthly, He must give encouragement to lords and gentlemen here to come to him, at least seven or nine for a standing council; which will make us here think he is in some degree ours again, and that we have a relation to him, and some interest and share in him, by the men of quality of our own religion that are with him. This will incomparably facilitate the matter here; nor will they, when they come, come empty, and in their own names, which is still better, and will be more satisfactory there.

"Fifthly, To induce this, English Protestants should be encouraged by an edict of liberty from the K. of F. to have chapels at their own costs, in which to worship God after their respective ways; by which that K. will make us reflect upon his conduct towards his Hugonots, rather to flow from the hazard he thought himself in by their antimon. and resisting principles, than a desire of persecution.

"Lastly, All other requisite measures depending upon the acceptance this finds, an answer hereunto is impatiently desired by those that have discoursed the king's business to this maturity. So ended with an unanimous consent, both Tories and Whigs upon this occasion, that are in a way of closing in his interest."

L. Preston. I can very safely swear, my lord, that I never saw that paper in my life.

L. C. J. Holt. Come, go on with your evidence.

Sol. Gen. This is another paper of the same; but the words that are written short in that, are written at length in this.

[The Paper was read accordingly, and in the first blank there was written K. J. in the first paragraph (France) twice, in the third paragraph (St. Germain), in the fifth (Mathemat. for much e mutt); the rest are obvious, and need not be supplied.]

Sol. Gen. Pray shew my lord Sidney that paper. What says your lordship to it?

L. Sidney. This is one of the papers that I marked, and that I received from my lord president.

Sol. Gen. Pray, will my lord president be pleased to give himself the trouble to cast his eye upon that, and see if that be one of the papers?

L. President. My lord, I remember it well, it is one of the papers I received from captain Billop.

Serj. Tremain. This paper is what Mr. Solicitor mentioned as Heads of a Declaration.

L. Preston. My lord, I think it necessary to offer one thing to your lordships before it be read. I desire captain Billop should swear it to be one of his papers.

Sol. Gen. If your lordship pleases, you observe what has been done already. My lord president says, 'tis one of those papers that was sent him by my lord Nottingham; and my lord Sidney hath sworn, it is one of the papers he had from my lord president.

L. Preston. I shall not give your lordship any more trouble than needs; I only offer it to your lordship; I waive it.

L. C. J. Holt. There is evidence enough to have the paper read.

Clerk of the Peace reads.

“That the king will return with the design of making an entire conquest of his people, is so ridiculous, as well as difficult, that it needs not be spoken to.

“That the king’s declaration be worded in general terms, that he will govern by the laws; that they shall be the rule of his actions; that he will endeavour to settle liberty of conscience by law; that whatsoever things were formerly done by him, which occasioned jealousies in the minds of his people, shall be left to the determination of a parliament, to be formally and regularly called as soon as is possible.

“That he has given sufficient evidence of his unwillingness to bring an army of strangers into this kingdom, by refusing the succours of the king of France offered him, and which were even ready to be embarked upon the first notice of the prince of Orange’s intended invasion.

“That he brings with him such an army only as is necessary for his own defence, and for the security of such of his loyal subjects as shall resort to him; that he will dismiss them as soon as he shall have rid the nation of those foreigners who have invaded it, and trampled upon the laws and liberties of his people.

“The king’s large exercising his dispensing power gave the great alarm to the people, and contributed most of all toward the general defection. Yet when that power came to be debated in the last convention, there appeared so many difficulties in the limiting of it (every body, even the present judges believing it necessary, that a dispensing power should be in the K.) that it was let fall, and that point remains as it was. And without mentioning that, or any other particular, the K. can be in no danger, by leaving all things which have been the occasion of jealousies, to the determination of parliament, where, besides the king’s professed friends and servants, there will not want others who will be glad of opportunity to ingratiate themselves.”

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Gentlemen of the jury, if you desire any thing to be read again, or any thing doubtful in it should be explained, tell us, and it shall be done.

Juryman. No, my lord, there is no occasion for that. I believe we apprehend these three papers that have been read.

L. Preston. My lord, it is necessary the gentlemen of the jury should be satisfied in this point.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Ay, in any point; and if they desire any scruple should be cleared, the court will do it for them.

Juryman. My lord, I desire to know whether captain Billop signed that paper or no?

L. C. J. Holt. No, he did not sign half of them; but unless it be proved, you ought to take it for granted that it is not signed by him.

L. Preston. My lord, I think it fit the jury should be satisfied in any scruple they raise.

L. C. J. Holt. They asked this question, Whether captain Billop did sign the paper? And I told them captain Billop did not say so; and therefore they are to take it for granted, that he did not.

Juryman. My lord, we take this last paper that was read, to be a paper that was delivered in the bundle taken from Mr. Ashton to my lord Nottingham, but not signed by captain Billop.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. Then you take it right.

Sol. Gen. Then the next paper that we produce is a List of the English Fleet that these gentlemen were carrying over into France.

L. Preston. That is printed, and to be found in every coffee-house.

Serj. Tremain. Shew that paper to captain Billop. [Which was done.] Can you take it upon your oath, captain, that that paper was in the packet that was taken in Mr. Ashton’s bosom?

Billop. That paper I have marked, and that paper I swear was in the packet I took away from Mr. Ashton on board the smack.

L. C. J. Holt. You are sure of it?

Billop. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Holt. Then read it.

“Brought in by admiral Russel to the House of Commons, December the 24th, 1690, the fleet whereof 60 Dutch.

“Memorandum, the new ships building, are expected will be ready to be launched by the end of March.”

Serj. Tremain. Pray shew this paper to captain Billop. [Which was done.] Pray, was that paper there among the others that were taken with these gentlemen?

Billop. Yes, it was.

Sol. Gen. Can you take it upon your oath, that that paper was in the packet that was in Mr. Ashton’s bosom?

Billop. Yes, my lord, I can.

Serj. Tremain. Pray shew him that paper too. [Which was done.]

Sol. Gen. And can you take upon you to say, that that was one of the papers in the packet?—Billop. Yes, it was.

Sol. Gen. My lord, we desire these may be read.

Clerk of the Peace reads: "New-year's eve," and it is directed, "For Mr. Redding."

"Sir; though the bearer of this will do us the justice to assure you, we are as full of duty, as unfeignedly and unconcernedly your's, as yourself could wish, yet this gentleman has undertaken.—You will forgive the presumption, if I do myself the honour to give you this fresh assurance in a few words, which I hope we do by our accounts. I shall omit no occasions, not neglecting the least, and making zealous wishes for the greatest, to shew ourselves such as we ought to be.

"Sir, I speak in the plural, because I write my elder brother's sentiments as well as my own, and the rest of the family, though lessened in number; yet if we are not mightily out in our accounts, we are growing in our interests, that is in your's. He that delivers this, will, I hope, entirely to your satisfaction, represent us, and me in particular, as with all the devotion imaginable, and unchangeable affection—Your's, God grant the happiest new-year."

Serj. Tremain. Read the other paper.

Clerk of the Peace. This is dated Dec. 31, 1690. "I must not let this bearer depart, madam, without assuring you——"

Sol. Gen. Hold, Sir, do not read that yet. Here, shew this paper to captain Billop [Which was done.] What say you, captain Billop, is that one of the papers taken from Mr. Ashton?

Billop. Yes, this is one that I read, and marked.

Sol. Gen. Then read it.

Clerk of the Peace reads: This is directed for Mrs. Redding.

"As it is impossible for me to express that extraordinary great satisfaction it gave me this time twelvemonth, when I had the honour to receive that mark of your favour and goodness under your own hand; so I have lived in some pain for an opportunity to write you my humblest acknowledgments and truest duty, from which, by the grace of God, I am no more capable of swerving, than of renouncing my hopes of heaven. I say this in behalf of my elder brother, and the rest of my nearest relations, as well as for myself. You may entirely depend upon us, not only for a constant adherence to so well chosen a principle, but for our utmost activity to promote your interests, which are inseparable from our own. I need come to no particulars by this bearer, who can, and will tell our whole heart; and I wish you could see them, how sincerely they are devoted to your service. God grant you a most happy new-year, and many, very many, and very happy. Our young master hath all our best wishes; he daily gains more friends, and we get ground of his adversaries.

"New-year's Eve."

Sol. Gen. Now read your other paper of the 31st of December, 1690.

Clerk of the Peace reads. "December 31, 1690.

"I must not let this bearer depart, madam, without assuring you of my best respects. I have written by him to a friend of your's, but depend upon you to give my note credit.

"Though my creditors were no friends to the match which has been so long in treaty, for your relations have been very hard upon me this last summer, yet as soon as I could go safely abroad, I pursued the business, and do beg you to believe, that no endeavours of mine shall be wanting to perfect the settlement. You once put me in hopes of seeing you before this Christmas: your friends are sorry for the disappointment, pray lose no more time than is of absolute necessity. The bearer will tell you all things may be now easily settled, if the right way be taken. I long to hear how your young daughter does; she will find many friends, and I hope her portion will be well secured. God send you a happy new-year, and that I may be merry with you before it be far spent: and I beseech you keep me in the good opinion of your friend. I will always make good what I promised to you." [It is directed for Mrs. Charlton.]

Juryman. My lord, I desire to know who that is directed to.

Clerk of the Peace. It is directed to Mrs. Charlton.

Serj. Tremain. Shew captain Billop those two papers. [Which was done.] What say you to them, captain?

Billop. My mark is on the outside, but there is nothing written in that; I believe it is taken off from the inner paper.

L. Preston. Pray, my lord, is this any proof? I beseech you for God's sake to have regard for a man's life.

Sol. Gen. Pray shew the paper to my lord Sidney. [Which was done.]

L. Sidney. This was one of the papers I received from my lord president.

Sol. Gen. Then we must beg my lord president would be pleased to look on it. [Which was done.]

L. President. This was one of the papers brought me by captain Billop from my lord Nottingham, in that bundle.

L. Preston. Captain Billop does not know the paper, though his mark be to it.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. It is not indeed very material whether he does or no, because he did not read all; but I would observe, that it is sworn by lord Sidney, that this was delivered to him by my lord president, and sworn by my lord president that he had it in that bundle from captain Billop.

L. Preston. But, my lord, it does shew that there may be some alteration in the papers; because he having marked it, and marking none but what he read, he does not now own that to be the paper.

Sol. Gen. Pray, will your lordship be pleased to take it as it is? These are two papers; the one is only the cover, the other is the writing; captain Billop has only marked the cover, and not the writing; but my lord Sidney he has marked the paper itself, as delivered him by my lord president, and my lord president has given you an account, that it is one of the papers he received in that bundle from captain Billop.

L. Preston. I only mark, that there may be alterations made in these papers since they were taken.

Serj. Tremain. Pray read it.

Clerk of the Peace reads. "December 31, 1690. [It is directed to Mr. Jackson.]

"The bearer can give you so full an account of all things relating to your estate here, that I need not have troubled you at this time, but that I am desirous to lay hold of any opportunity I think safe to assure you of my service, and that I will never quit your interest, whatever the rest of the freeholders do. Your adversary has been so hard to his neighbours, that he has extremely disoblged all the old tenants, and a little matter would redeem the whole estate, if you would appear in Westminster-hall yourself; the best counsel have a good opinion of your title, and will zealously pursue your instructions. I only beg you would hasten them to us, and that you will appear yourself as soon as is possible: no time should be lost, and the cause may be brought to a final hearing before the end of Easter term, if it be well solicited. I heartily wish you a happy new year, and beg you to tell Mr. Charlton, that I long to know wherein I may serve him; and that I will follow his directions to the utmost, while I live. God keep you and your's."

L. Preston. Pray, Sir, to whom is that letter directed?

Clerk of the Peace. To Mr. Jackson, my lord.

Serj. Tremain. Pray shew that paper to my lord Sidney. [Which was done.]

L. Sidney. This is one of the papers I received from my lord president.

Then it was shewn to my lord president.

L. President. This is one of the same papers that I received in the bundle from captain Billop.

L. C. J. Holt. Read it.

Clerk of the Peace reads. December the 31st.

"The interruption of the former correspondence had a very ill effect many ways; but for that reason no opportunity ought now to be lost, and I hope this will prove a happy one.

"In trade, as well as in government, schemes must be laid; for there is no living from hand to mouth any more in commerce than in politics: lay therefore your designs probably, and pursue them diligently, and with vigour; though it be a hazardous time, yet by venturing boldly, where venturing is advisable, it often returns great profit.

"There is nothing more to be said, but to give the bearer fit and full seasons to tell what he knows, both as to goods fit for our market, and when and where to be sent. The sea will quickly grow so troublesome, that unless you dispatch what you intend for us, you will lose a great opportunity of advantage. I hope the account he has to give of our negotiations here with the merchants that deal with us, especially those that have lately brought us their custom, will both encourage a larger trade, and excite the utmost diligence. I will say nothing of myself, it shall be enough that I can live in the good opinion of one I bear so great a reverence and affection for; but for this honest factor, I must own, I can hardly say enough. Truth and boldness are excellent qualities in a servant; and he has shewn both, as occasion has required him to shew them.

"I have but one word to add, and pray take it as the truest mark of unalterable respect: choose well, but have to do but with a few; for a multitude may give, but can never keep counsel.

"I shall with more impatience than becomes me, wait the result of this, and it will be a great mark of goodness to let us have it in the best and safest way.

"Once more; let not the season spend unprofitably, for a more likely one can hardly come than between this and the 1st of March. Interpret this, I pray, as no private interest of my own, or partial motion of any other person. It is my sense, my duty, and my friendship, which will not let me prevaricate, nor suffer those I love and honour to lose so happy and pressing an occasion of advantage. With the best wishes I close up this, and am, &c."

L. Preston. Pray, my lord, who is that paper directed to?

L. C. J. Pollexfen. This is directed to nobody at all.

Sol. Gen. Shew that paper to my lord Sidney. [Which was done.]

L. Sidney. This was one of the papers I had from my lord president.

Then it was shewn to my lord president.

L. President. This is one of the papers I had from captain Billop.

L. C. J. Holt. Read it.

Clerk of the Peace reads. This is dated December 31, but is not directed to any body at all.

"It is a presumption incident to those that are any where upon the spot, to think that they know better than those that are not, what is fittest to be done in any occurrence. This makes me say, that now is the time to make large advantages by trading, the sea being freer than two months past, or we can hope it will be two months hence. This gentleman is well instructed in our markets, and what the goods are we want, and when and where they should be sent. It is most earnestly desired that this happy opportunity may not be lost, especially by the late undertakers, and I would not for much they should receive the least disgust. They are somewhat positive in their terms; but they also say, they will be good and constant customers; and I have more than once seen the mischief of over-rating, and overstaying the market. Opportunities are to be used, they cannot be given by men.

"The bearer needs nothing from me to recommend him, but he is deserving in our opinion here, and many will take their measures by the usage he finds there; and indeed the pressing posture of our trading affairs will not permit more experiments. If the several parcels arrive not, that have been promised, before the 10th of March at farthest (especially the copper and linen, of which the bearer will be more particular,) I am satisfied we shall lose this summer's profit. I am the more pressing, because I am well assured of what I write; and if ever I judged right, it is upon this occasion.

"I have said nothing of another gentleman that takes this opportunity to see those parts; but he has shewn a zeal and a sincerity in this affair equal to most. Jo. is not yet gone, by a misfortune, but he will follow with a good postscript in this affair. Of myself I will say nothing; I hope I need not, for nobody without vanity can be more sincerely and affectionately a friend and servant to the company than myself. I writ at large yesterday, and cannot write what the hand that gives this can say; and therefore will write no more, but that with the greatest respect, I am, &c."

Serj. Tremain. Pray shew this paper to my lord Sidney. [Which was done.]

L. Sidney. This is one of those papers I received from my lord president. [Then it was shewn to the lord president.]

L. President. This was one of the papers in the bundle I received from captain Billop.

L. C. J. Holt. Then read it.

Clerk of the Peace reads.

"Sir; I vow to you, I do not repine at having lost all for your sake, which I got by your favour; but it grieves me extremely that there is not that left which can secure me from being troublesome to you; for that is the thing in the world I would not be. I have told my lord my condition. What I desire of you he thinks very moderate, I hope you will. Pray, sir, be not backward in settling my little affair, for I have deserved your care. Your daughter and I must starve, if this government can make us. I hope our interests are not divided, that is, you have an equal tenderness at least for both. If you think fit to speak what I would have you to this bearer, he will give me a just account of it. You know he is obliged to be my friend, and I believe him grateful, since he ventures so boldly for you. He brings with him some merry papers. Adieu, for I dare write no more; but pray send a messenger on purpose to me, that I may know exactly what you will do, and would have me do. If you send upon no other business, there will be no danger. Pray, sir, ask my lord, and he will tell you how I have been used, and upon what account. I believe you know it not.

"December 29.

"Your daughter is very well, very tall, and very pretty, as I am told."

L. C. J. Pollexfen. That is not directed to any body neither.

Serj. Tremain. Pray then shew these papers to my lord Sidney, and my lord president. [Which was done.] They were two.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. These papers my lord Sidney swears he received from my lord president, and my lord president swears he received them in the bundle from Billop.

Serj. Thompson. We pray they may be read.

Clerk of the Peace. December 31, 1690.

"Was my condition more desperate and uneasy than it is, I desire no greater satisfaction than to have done my duty to so good a master: I wish it was of more use to him; that is not my fault, nor of those I have acted with. Let it be looked into what has been foretold both as to England, Scotland, and Ireland, and see if most of it is not come to pass already, and the rest will follow, if not prevented. I wish it may also be considered what usage we have met with from men employed, and how they have left your business and friends; how they managed it you will know from all hands: things they could not do, nor durst not undertake, were better undone than not done by them. Men in this place, and in these times, must have some courage as well as sense to do any thing with people here. It is not my own ill usage makes me say this, but my concern for one I wish the best to in the world, and will give my proofs of this upon all occasions. I need not enlarge, since all our grievances are known to him that brings this. For my own part, I will stay here so long as I can be safe if with never so great trouble; but it would be some comfort to know men (when driven from hence) may be so; therefore the reports of people's usage are terrible as well as of the indiscretions of St. Germ. family: we feel the smart of it by ridiculous letters falling daily into the hands of the government. Their master and mistress are little obliged by it no more than we: if there is any thing, sir, you do particularly command me, or depend upon me for, let me know it. I cannot undertake much, nor furnish more. I have still helped every body, and paid to every thing I could; and if a twelvemonth ago my condition was what I then represented, you best know if it has been mended. Use, and considering that of others, makes me grow more contented; and if the prospect of misery to us all was any satisfaction, that is now plainly seen. Pray God bless us all, by restoring every man his own, and you with long life. He that gives you this, hath furnished for your use to me, &c. 200*l.* which I desire may be repaid."

Sol. Gen. Read the other; it is in the same hand, and was inclosed in the former.

Clerk of the Peace reads. "I only beg, madam, no ill malicious report may take any place in your thoughts, in regard to me. I value your good opinion, and will endeavour to deserve it. I can do little towards, but wish most heartily for your happiness. I know no interest, madam, but my master's and your's, nor do I think they are to be made two: if you command me any thing, I will faithfully obey you, as I have ever done him. We all depend upon this bearer's accounts of us, and our condition. His faith and courage hath been enough experienced."

Serj. Tremain. Here is another paper, shew that to captain Billop. [Which was done.]

Billop. This paper I did mark, and this was one that was in the bundle.

L. C. J. Pollexfen. What is it, brother? pray open it.

Serj. Tremain. It is a draught of a cypher, with an alphabet of names, for carrying on the correspondence.

Serj. Thompson. Your lordship observes these matters were designed to be carried under several sorts of cants.

L. C. J. Holt. What says captain Billop to that paper?

Billop. That was one of the papers that I read at my lord Nottingham's, and marked it there.

L. C. J. Holt. Then read it.

Clerk of the Peace reads. "For Mrs. Anne Russell, to be left with Mrs. Richeson, at the Blue Boar, in Ryder-street, near St. James's.

Serj. Tremain. Then the next papers we produce are the bills of exchange; pray shew them to captain Billop. What say you, captain Billop, were those among the other papers?

Billop. Yes they were, I remember very well.

Serj. Tremain. My lord, they are in French, and therefore we must swear a gentleman that we have here, to interpret: call Mr. Humphry Levermere.

Levermere. Here I am. [He was sworn.]

Serj. Tremain. Pray how much do they all come to ?

Levermere. They come to 500*l.* wanting but twelve-pence.

Serj. Tremain. My lord, we have shewn your lordship part of the papers that were taken in this paquet, but we have reserved three of the papers till the last place ; and these three papers, if we had no other, were sufficient to maintain this indictment, for they are written all with my lord Preston's own hand, wherein he gives an account how the French should invade us, how the forts may be taken, how London should be plagued, and what a sort of rascals the clergy of London are ; these are the contents of the papers, among other things. Pray shew them to captain Billop.

[Which was done.]

Billop. These were two papers that were in the paquet, and the other little one with them.

L. Preston. My lord, I would desire your lordship to observe one thing, to the best of my remembrance, captain Billop said, he only marked six of the papers.

L. C. J. Holt. How many has he sworn to ?

L. Preston. I believe he has proved more.

Billop. I never said so ; I marked a great many, though not all, but I did not say how many.

Serj. Tremain. Were these papers taken in the paquet ?

Billop. Yes, all three.

L. Preston. Just now he said but two.

Sol. Gen. Have you looked upon them all, Sir ?

Billop. Yes, I marked but two of them, but the other little paper was with them ; I read them myself, I remember it very well.

Serj. Thompson. Then we pray the clerk may read them.

Clerk of Peace reads. " Lady D. 2000*l.* And 200*l.* for shop debts."
